President Hamid Karzai was under international pressure to end the case. Afghanistan's new parliament sent a letter to the Interior Ministry demanding that Rahman be barred from leaving the country, but no vote was taken, parliamentary speaker Yunus Qanooni said. Muslim clerics condemned Rahman's release and threatened to incite violent protests; Zabul province's top cleric, Abdulrahman Jan, called it "a terrible thing and a major shame."

Also, Taliban rebels attacked a coalition military base in southern Afghanistan, killing a U.S. soldier and a Canadian soldier but losing 32 of their own, British military spokesman Col. Chris Vernon said.

Vernon said the fighting was the deadliest in months. The Taliban has warned of a renewed offensive more than four years after U.S.-led forces ousted the hard-line regime.

An Indian court sentenced radiologist Anil Sabsani and an assistant to two years in prison for using ultrasound tests to determine the sex of fetuses. Sabsani is the first physician convicted of flouting a law designed to stop parents from aborting female fetuses. Sushma Saini, an information officer for the Haryana state government, said the sentence includes a $125 fine. Girls in India are often seen as burdens requiring huge dowries. The British medical journal Lancet reported that ultrasound sex-determination tests resulted in nearly 10 million female fetuses being aborted in India during the past two decades.

Fugitive Ex-Liberian President Is Captured At Nigerian Border (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon And Hans Nichols

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone — Looking unshaven and haggard, former Liberian President Charles Taylor was placed in a detention cell in Sierra Leone on Wednesday, after his early-morning arrest trying to flee Nigeria carrying large bags of cash.

He will be the first former African head of state to face international justice on war crimes charges, which include forced recruitment of child soldiers, as well as murder, rape, mutilation and sexual enslavement of civilians in a decade of civil war in Sierra Leone. More than 50,000 people were killed in the conflict, which ended in 2002.

Taylor's arrest is a further sign that the international community is catching up with the leaders of West Africa's bloodiest conflicts. Nine former leaders in the Sierra Leone conflict have been detained and await trial in that country. In addition, Thomas Lubanga, a former militia leader during the civil war in Zaire, now the Democratic Republic of Congo, is facing judgment in The Hague.

A United Nations helicopter carrying Taylor, escorted by two other helicopters, landed in the compound of the U.N. Special Court for Sierra Leone in Freetown at dusk.

Handcuffed and wearing a bulletproof vest over a white tunic, Taylor stepped out and was hustled into an SUV and driven about 100 yards to the door of the detention center.

As he emerged from the helicopter, about two dozen Sierra Leoneans on the roof of a nearby house cheered in apparent support of his arrest. Taylor gave no sign he had heard, nor did he answer a question shouted by a reporter.

Inside, away from reporters, a court official read him an amended 11-count indictment on war crimes for his role in the civil war in diamond-rich Sierra Leone, which neighbors Liberia. Taylor is due to appear in court in the coming days to enter his plea, but it will be months before he is granted a hearing.

The court's original 17-count indictment, in March 2003, was reduced by the court this month to 11 counts, prosecutor Desmond de Silva said.

"This will ensure a more focused trial," De Silva said in a statement. "The thrust and gravity of the former indictment is in no way diminished."

Analysts said Taylor's arrest was a boost for West African stability and would give Liberia the chance to break with its violent history.

President Bush welcomed Taylor's arrest in comments to journalists with Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo in Washington. "The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia and is a signal, Mr. President, of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood," he said.

Bush added later that he hoped the U.N. Security Council would pass a resolution to place Taylor under the jurisdiction of The Hague in the Netherlands.

Taylor, who wore no disguise, was arrested after 5 a.m. in a Land Rover carrying two large sacks of currency, including American dollars, at Nigeria's border with Cameroon, said Nigerian officials in the northeastern state of Borno.

Traveling in an entourage of several cars, Taylor passed through the Nigerian customs post but found the gate at the immigration post padlocked, according to reports from the scene. When immigration officials pounced, the other vehicles in the convoy fled, according to the reports.

Taylor's capture, a day after he had disappeared, saved Obasanjo intense embarrassment in his meeting with Bush on Wednesday.

Obasanjo said he felt vindicated by the arrest, adding that there was no negligence by Nigeria. "If we had been negligent then Charles Taylor would have got away," he said.

But some still raised questions about Nigeria's role.

This month, Liberia's recently elected president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, requested Taylor's extradition from Nigeria, but Nigeria took no steps to detain him.

Mike McGovern, West Africa analyst for the International Crisis Group, said the near escape was "very peculiar."

"The fact he would be miraculously found in this way is also very peculiar."

After 14 years of civil war in Liberia, Taylor accepted exile in Nigeria in 2003 and left power, vowing that he would return, "God willing." He was accused by many of breaching the conditions of his exile by trying to interfere in Liberian affairs.

In the Freetown detention center, Taylor joined nine other detainees, some former allies and some enemies: three former leaders of the Sierra Leone Civil Defense Forces, three members of a former military junta and three leaders of the rebel Revolutionary United Front.

Congress Wary Of Trade Deficit With China (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

Last year, Americans sold just $1 of goods to China for every $6 of goods flowing the other way. That imbalance is tipping the scales in Congress toward confronting China about its trade.

The growing trade gap - nearly $202 billion in 2005 - threatens the US economy, some lawmakers say. They want China to end what they call unfair trade policies and an artificially low yuan, its currency.

But others say the greater danger lies in provoking a trade war with China, which could hurt the two biggest drivers of the global economy.

Those stakes pose a delicate challenge for America: finding the right balance between assertiveness and patience.

"There's strong bipartisan concern that this growing trade deficit with China is a serious problem," says Robert Scott, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank in Washington.

So far this year, Congress and the Bush administration have leaned hard on China's leadership. One Senate bill introduced Tuesday by Charles Grassley (R) of Iowa and Max Baucus (D) of Montana outlines new consequences for trade violations and artificially low exchange rates. Sens. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina and Charles Schumer (D) of New York, meanwhile, have delayed a vote on their proposal to impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports if the yuan's value doesn't rise.

The next few weeks could reveal whether the path ahead involves confrontation or common ground. Chinese leader Hu Jintao meets with President Bush in April. And the US Treasury Department is preparing to issue an assessment of whether China is manipulating its currency.

The blend of pressure and patience with China is already a well-worn balancing act for US officials. That's because both the economics and politics of the issues are tricky.

Many US companies are developing profitable operations in China and don't want to antagonize the nation that offers superior growth prospects. Wal-Mart, for example, recently said it expects to hire 150,000 Chinese workers as it expands retail operations there during the next five years.

By some measures, China may already be the world's No. 2 economy. And forecasters estimate that it could surpass America as the world's biggest economy by about 2040.

Economists say the two nations stand to reap big rewards from their expanding ties. The low-cost goods imported from China represent a boost in the purchasing power of American consumers - a kind of "China dividend" for the US standard of living.

And trade is flowing the other way too, with US exports booming last year.

In effect, many economists say the greatest risk is not the trade deficit but the prospect that a rift over trade could result in a resurgence of protectionism.

"Personally, I can think of no faster path to a worldwide recession than for the twin engines of the global economy - the United States and China - to turn against one another," Caterpillar Inc. chairman Jim Owens said in a speech to manufacturers last week in Illinois.

The company's exports of machinery to China have grown 40 percent in the past few years, helping to support 5,000 US jobs. The company is also adding workers rapidly in China.

Although trade and economic prosperity have historically gone together, critics say the US has not done enough to defend US jobs against unfair trade practices - especially in China.

Counting the number of manufacturing jobs lost due to trade is notoriously difficult. Many economists contend that even if China cut export subsidies and boosted the yuan by 25 percent, the impact on US employment would not be dramatic. Americans might simply import more goods from other nations.

But the effect on US manufacturers might be greater. An analysis by the Economic Policy Institute concluded that since 1989, the rising trade deficit with China has displaced production that supported 1.5 million US jobs.

The Grassley-Baucus bill would address currency imbalances and trade violations through a system of "engagement." "We need to engage China and other nations firmly, but with an eye to economic opportunities as well as economic concerns," Senator Baucus said.

Currency is a primary concern for the National Association of Manufacturers. With the yuan undervalued by some 20 to 40 percent, "it does confer a very significant artificial price advantage," says Frank Vargo, who specializes in trade issues at the association. "That's huge."

He hopes that the Bush administration will work with other nations to bring joint action against China to reform the exchange rate. "There really are no quick routes," says Mr. Vargo. "It's the one we prefer."

US Adds To Pressure On China Over Trade (FT)

By Richard Mcgregor And Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

The US government on Wednesday stepped up efforts to press China into making big trade concessions before Hu Jintao, their president, visits Washington next month.

Amid a fresh salvo of criticism of Chinese recalcitrance, the Bush administration also gave its first indication that it would back a Senate bill that would require it to take a tougher line on China for not allowing its currency to appreciate.

Carlos Gutierrez, the US commerce secretary, warned in Beijing on Thursday that China would risk protectionist retaliation if it failed to open its market faster and that such measures could be “devastating” to the Chinese economy. “It is important for our colleagues in China to recognise that the voices in the US calling for protectionist policies are real," Mr Gutierrez said ahead of trade negotiations scheduled for next month.

A few hours later in Washington, Timothy Adams, US undersecretary of the Treasury, told a Senate hearing that China had been "far too cautious" in moving to greater currency flexibility. "They continue to say all the right things...they need to walk the walk," he said.

Washington is demanding action by Beijing on a range of fronts, including more stringent enforcement of intellectual property rights, the reduction of auto parts tariffs and action on subsidies of state companies and government procurement policies. Pressure also continues to mount for China to allow its currency to appreciate more rapidly.

The Senate has temporarily backed away from threats to put tariffs on Chinese imports in retaliation but is moving ahead with legislation that would threaten China with sanctions if the renminbi failed to appreciate.

Mr Adams indicated on Wednesday that the administration would endorse legislation introduced by Republican Charles Grassley and Democrat Max Baucus that would allow for some sanctions against countries deemed to have currency "misalignments" with the US. He called it "a novel approach" that "would help us".

Mr Adams said, however, that the administration was not in favour of some of the more draconian proposals put forward by lawmakers. "There are several bills in Congress that would close our markets to Chinese goods if China does not move more on its exchange rate. We do not support those isolationist approaches.

"They would damage our economy and not achieve our shared goals."

The US efforts are designed to press China into faster action by threatening consequences that the administration – and powerful US companies – would prefer not be carried out.

In spite of Mr Gutierrez's warning, he struck a much milder tone than on previous trips to China. The importance of cheap Chinese goods to US consumers and the huge investments made by US companies in China make the imposition of any penalties by Washington on Beijing problematic.

China Is Told Of U.S. Impatience On Trade (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

BEIJING, March 29 — The rise of protectionist sentiment in the United States over a $202 billion trade deficit with China could hurt the Chinese economy, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said Wednesday.

Mr. Gutierrez said at a business forum here that protectionist measures could lead to a decline in Chinese exports to the United States, its biggest international customer.

That would hurt the United States, but be even more damaging for China, he said.

Mr. Gutierrez said China could help the Bush administration counter that threat with improved market access for United States products and stricter enforcement of intellectual property rights.

He acknowledged that Chinese tariffs had fallen since the country's entry into the World Trade Organization in 2001, but he said a wide array of barriers remained that restricted sales of products from companies in the United States and other foreign countries.

"It is important for our colleagues in China to realize that the voices in the U.S. calling for protectionist policies are very real," he said. Mr. Gutierrez was on the last day of a four-day visit to China.

While Mr. Gutierrez was in Beijing for trade talks, one looming threat to its exports to the United States appeared to have eased. Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, delayed plans for a bill that would have threatened steep tariffs on Chinese imports if Chinese leaders refused to let their currency, the yuan, rise in value against the dollar.

The senators said they had become more optimistic as a result of their trip to China last week when Chinese officials emphasized their willingness to let the yuan float more freely and to address other aspects of their country's growing trade deficit with the United States.

Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, respectively the top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, are pushing a separate bill that would focus more attention on currency policies but would stop short of threatening tariffs on imported goods.

Mr. Gutierrez, in earlier talks with senior Chinese officials, including Prime Minister Wen Jiabao; the vice prime minister, Wu Yi; and the commerce minister, Bo Xilai, urged China to accelerate moves to open its markets.

In a statement posted on the Web site of the Commerce Ministry, Mr. Bo said "global economic trends," not Beijing, were to blame for the deficit.

He also said that United States consumers enjoyed the benefits of cheap high-quality goods from China.

The Bush administration is pushing China to make tangible progress on market access at the next meeting of the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade, to be held in Washington on April 11.

The outcome of the talks could set the tone for President Hu Jintao's visit to the United States later in April, according to United States and Chinese officials.

Mr. Gutierrez did not publicly raise concerns about the value of the yuan, in keeping with a longstanding policy that only Treasury officials deal with currency issues.

US Targets Chinese Piracy Of US Goods (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

BEIJING - Liu Tong is polite to a fault, speaks perfect English, majored in American studies, has loads of American friends he loves to phone - and duplicates Japanese and American high-tech goods for a living.

Mr. Liu buys unusual, specialized technology - a machine to make film subtitles is a recent project, for example. He disassembles the machine, duplicates the parts, and rebuilds a Chinese version. The process, called "reverse engineering," is the more serious side of a long-running feud between the US and China over intellectual property rights violations - one that includes mass production of pirated DVDs of movies, music, and software.

Now, as Chinese president Hu Jintao prepares to visit the US next month to discuss what Bush administration officials term "our $250 billion relationship," Washington seems to be backing away from a trade war over currency valuation that would slap an epic 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese exports.

Instead, US Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez indicated here Wednesday that the White House will focus on a more diffuse and difficult problem: intellectual property rights (IPR).

"Not currency valuation ... but intellectual property rights violations are the main threat to US industry" argues Stephen Green, senior economist for the London-based Standard Charter Bank in Shanghai, China. "It is the taking of emerging technology, the sophisticated technology that resides in the products of large Western firms, that can do the most harm in the long term."

For nearly a decade, complaints about IPR violations have been a mantra by US trade officials coming to China. Little is done, apart from occasional bonfires of illegal DVDs by Chinese police.

But as the US trade deficit with China climbed to $202 billion last year, protectionist sentiment has built in Washington. Talk of a lack of access to Chinese markets, unfair and obscure business rules that penalize foreign companies, and the recent bill, introduced by Sens. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina and Charles Schumer (D) of New York, which would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports - have seized Beijing's attention. Some 67 senators agreed to pass the bill, despite opposition by the White House. After high-level meetings last week with Vice-Premier Wu Yi and Commerce Minister Bo Xilai, Sens. Schumer and Graham agreed to delay the vote.

Secretary Gutierrez says that while China is the world's No. 2 buyer of personal computers, it ranks No. 25 in software purchasing - a result of widespread use of "pirated software" in China. In a talk to an American business audience, he noted that if China cut the use of pirated software to 80 percent from 90 percent of all software, the country would gain $6.5 billion in tax revenue.

Just around the corner from where Gutierrez spoke, one major DVD shop had removed all current Hollywood movies from its shelves, leaving an odd assortment of Alfred Hitchcock, Charlie Chaplin, exercise videos, and Korean, Japanese, and Chinese films. But at the store counter, two huge folders of movie flyers were available - Capote, Crash, Pride and Prejudice. Buyers simply pulled the flyers, paid $1 each, and a young Chinese person left the store and returned with movies under his or her coat, already wrapped.

On Treasure Street, Ya Ba Lu, hundreds of vendors who front for factories outside Beijing tell reporters that they can have name-brand coats, shoes, and purses mass-produced for shipment to Moscow, Warsaw, Bangkok, and other destinations.

Economic relations between the US and China have arrived at something of a crucial juncture, US officials say. Gutierrez said that US firms have shifted from thinking of China as a "land of opportunity" to giving its business environment a more "mixed assessment." The secretary also adjusted his criticism of piracy practices and closed markets, shifting from a tone that Chinese see as one of self-interest to an argument that greater opening and fair trade was ultimately good for the Chinese.

IPR enforcement is highly problematic, requiring China to police deeply inside a corrupt system that sprawls over local provinces and cities.

The US isn't alone in showing greater worry over China's capability as a superb duplicator of innovative products. The European Union is preparing to file a WTO suit arguing that Chinese laws requiring European auto-parts makers to create joint ventures with Chinese firms will mainly allow Chinese firms to learn to duplicate European technology and then abandon the firms.

Beijing is showing signs that it understands the sentiment behind US protectionist feelings. Last week, five Chinese agencies held a rare joint press conference arguing that China has done, and will do, much more to police IPR violations. China has shut down more than a dozen factories making illegal DVDs in the past year. Moreover, in a development also praised by Gutierrez, China has shifted IPR violations from a civil to a criminal violation - though the fine print on this is unclear. That Vice Premier Wu is handling IPR violations inside the state structure is an affirmative fact, the commerce secretary said.

"They are closing down the DVD factories, but will they remain closed?" Gutierrez asked, adding that China may need to pay more attention to the concerns of "its No. 1 customer."

"In private business, the thought of my No. 1 customer preparing to change policy ... that would have a significant impact on my thinking," Gutierrez told reporters here.

U.S. Officials Urge China On Markets, Yuan (WSJ)

By Mei Fong

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

BEIJING -- U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez warned of rising U.S. protectionist sentiments against China and told China it must do more to open up its markets.

In a speech to the U.S. business community in Beijing yesterday, Mr. Gutierrez warned of "a real protectionist sentiment" that was "creeping up" in America, in part due to the U.S.'s ballooning trade deficit with China.

Later in Washington, the Bush administration warned China that it must do more to allow its currency's value to be set by market forces.

U.S. Treasury Undersecretary Timothy Adams told a congressional committee that getting China to move toward a more-flexible exchange rate system remained his department's No. 1 priority and that the Chinese have failed to do enough since announcing last summer a small revaluation of the currency.

"To date, China's progress has been far too cautious," Mr. Adams said in testimony to the Senate Finance Committee. "China could easily move more rapidly towards greater flexibility. It should do so now."

The comments of Messrs. Gutierrez and Adams came after U.S. Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, announced Tuesday that they wouldn't force an immediate vote on a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all imports from China in retaliation for the alleged advantage that Beijing's currency policies give to Chinese firms.

Discussions on China's yuan policy and the U.S.-China trade imbalance are expected to figure high on the agenda during President Hu Jintao's planned visit to Washington next month. U.S. critics say China has been slow to open its markets to outsiders and that it has kept the yuan artificially low, making its exports unfairly cheap. The U.S. deficit with China exceeded $200 billion last year by Washington's reckoning.

Mr. Gutierrez said "China still had a lot to do" to alleviate trade tensions, including improving enforcement of intellectual-property rights and removing barriers to entry, such as a requirement that foreign telecom firms invest $241 million before they are allowed to provide basic telecom services in China. He said that amount is "24 times more than normal" compared with most other countries.

Chinese authorities say the country has been opening its markets in accordance with its World Trade Organization commitments, after it joined the international trade body in 2001. They also maintain that other factors, including profligate consumption in America and shifting global trade patterns, are to blame for the trade imbalance, not Beijing's yuan policy.

Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai, in a meeting with Mr. Gutierrez on Tuesday, said China's low-cost imports brought "hundreds of billions of dollars" in benefits to American consumers, according to the ministry's Web site.

Still, protectionist sentiment appears to be mounting in the U.S. Congress, despite the decision to delay the Schumer-Graham bill. Currently, there are at least 15 bills and amendments pending in Congress that threaten new taxes or tighter restrictions on Chinese trade, including a bill proposed Tuesday by the two top-ranking senators on the Finance Committee, Republican Charles Grassley of Iowa and Democrat Max Baucus of Montana. Their bill would leave it up to the Treasury Department to decide if China deserved retaliation and would offer much milder sanctions than the Schumer-Graham bill.

In Washington yesterday, Mr. Adams, the Treasury undersecretary, said the proposed Schumer-Graham legislation would damage the U.S. economy without helping achieve a more-flexible Chinese foreign-exchange policy. The bills amount to isolationism that "would damage our economy and not achieve our shared goals," he said.

In his testimony to the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. Adams reiterated Treasury's opposition to such legislation, arguing constructive engagement with China toward a more flexible foreign-exchange regime is working, albeit not as swiftly as the U.S. would like.

"The obstacles are no longer technical; China could easily move more rapidly towards greater flexibility," he said. "It should do so now."

In Beijing, Mr. Gutierrez also said yesterday that if China cut the proportion of pirated software used in the country to 80% from 90%, it would generate $6.5 billion in tax revenue and create 2.6 million jobs for China.

Besides Mr. Bo, Mr. Gutierrez met this week with Premier Wen Jiabao, China's top economic official and the commissioner in charge of China's State Intellectual Property Office, which enforces patents and copyrights. He declined to give details of their talks but said earlier he would bring up market access, product piracy and complaints about China's exchange-rate controls.

Open-Door Policy (WSJ)

From the Beltway panic over the Dubai ports deal to Europe's bout of merger anxiety, ambitious politicians are baring their protectionist teeth. Now would seem a good time to recall how well their countries and others have done by flinging doors open to trade, capital, services and people.

The emergence of China and India as global giants in the making dates directly to their decisions to liberalize. The current U.S. expansion is powered in part by capital from abroad. The Asian Tigers grew off trade. The singular achievement of the European Union was to create the biggest zone on the planet for the free trade of goods, capital and people.

In the past four decades, open economies (mostly from Europe, East Asia, North America) have fared far better than closed ones (Africa, Latin America, parts of Eastern Europe). Economists Jeffrey Sachs and Andrew Warner found that from 1970-1989 average annual growth in open developed economies was 2.3%, compared with 0.7% in the closed. In developing countries, those numbers were 4.5% and 0.7%. That trend hasn't changed much as trade and foreign investment have powered global growth.

As befits the dismal science, not to mention the dismal profession of politics, this evidence hasn't settled the intellectual argument. So New York Senator Chuck Schumer and French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin can make their case for "economic patriotism," to use the Frenchman's phrase, with a straight face.

But Europe is a good laboratory to test the link between market access and prosperity. Forget about old and new, south and north; the real EU divide is between open and less open economies. The former category include the "Anglo-Saxon" success stories of the past decade, Britain and Ireland. Starting with the Thatcher era, the U.K. put a "For Sale" sign out. A swath of British industry, including its car makers, is now in foreign hands. But -- Mr. de Villepin, take note -- the world didn't end. Britain focused its attention on services, turning London into a global financial center. Britain's rate of growth and employment is the envy of Europe.

The real star pupil is Ireland, which went from the bottom of the EU league tables in GDP per capita to the top in a generation by slashing taxes and barriers to investment. Of the OECD countries, Ireland has the highest share of foreign-controlled affiliates in terms of employment (nearly 50%) and turnover (78%). In Portugal, which puts up higher obstacles to foreign investment, it's 15% and 8%. Portugal is today the poorest country in Western Europe.

Less well-known is Austria. Having emerged from the Cold War with a state-dominated corporatist system, Austrian fortunes changed with the opening of the east and its own economy. Barriers to foreign direct investment went from above to below the OECD average. In 1998 Austria had the most legal barriers to investment; by 2003 Vienna had the least after New Zealand, another socialist backwater that liberalized its economy starting in the 1980s.

An open-door policy may be the only proven way that EU countries will be able to salvage their beloved "social model." Consider the Nordic states. Other Europeans envy their high economic growth and welfare spending but don't want to see what makes it possible. These countries have deregulated product and service markets and are open to foreign investment. Volvo and Saab aren't owned by "Swedes" anymore.

The human capital in those countries, often cited as one reason for their strong performance, didn't spare them the downturn of the 1990s. That's when Sweden, Denmark and Finland embraced market reforms to become the most dynamic economies in Europe. Call it "a second-generation Nordic Model," socialist mainly in the welfare sphere.

Foreign capital and free trade have also kept the more protectionist EU states afloat. No Western European country has more barriers to foreign investment than France, according to the OECD. (Britain has the least.) But investors have nonetheless moved into France. By one measure -- the stock of foreign direct investment as a share of GDP -- France (41.8%) is ahead of Britain (36%) and Germany (21.3%), according to Eric Chaney of Morgan Stanley. French multinationals are flourishing abroad. With the state eating up half of GDP, the private sector drives the little growth -- a paltry 1.4% last year -- that France has.

Imagine what a freer market for capital and services could do for France. But the government's nationalist turn of recent years is proving costly. Outside investment is dropping, amounting to half the level of 2003 in each of the past two years. French investors may in turn soon find themselves unwelcome in other countries. When the French political class vilified Indian-born steel baron Lakshmi Mittal and his hostile bid for Arcelor, the Indian finance minister warned that the French may not be so welcome in his booming economy.

Globalization is a two-way street. Nations can't take advantage of it abroad and try to protect themselves from it at home. Maybe in the halls of Congress, this message will eventually sink in. The world's prosperity depends on it.

Door Threatens To Slam On Open Skies (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, March 30, 2006

The rising tide of protectionism that killed the Dubai ports deal threatens to swamp another major transportation proposal: removal of 62-year-old limits on air service between Europe and the USA.

If European Union transport ministers approve the move at a meeting scheduled for June, any U.S. airline could fly to any of the European Union's 25 nations. Likewise, any European airline could fly from anywhere in Europe to anywhere in the USA.

Supporters of so-called Open Skies say it would allow airlines to step up competition for an estimated 17 million new passengers annually, making a trans-Atlantic market already valued at $22 billion a year even more lucrative. For travelers, Open Skies could mean more flights, more convenient routes and cheaper fares across the Atlantic.

But Open Skies has been controversial since negotiators for the U.S. departments of State and Transportation and other agencies began talking to the EU in 2003 about dropping arcane restrictions that limit air service between the continents.

In the USA, the Bush administration backs Open Skies because officials believe it would lower fares and benefit U.S. carriers. No. 2 United Airlines and No. 3 Delta Air Lines support it as a welcome step toward globalization of the industry. Just as adamantly, Houston-based Continental Airlines argues that the promised benefits are illusory. Open Skies has also drawn vehement opposition from labor groups that fear American jobs might be lost.

"Giving away another vital U.S. industry to foreign interests is one more example of globalization run amok," says the AFL-CIO's Edward Wytkind.

Open Skies was no sure thing even before the political flare-up that killed the plan to turn over management of five major U.S. ports to Dubai Ports World, a company based in the United Arab Emirates. Now some of the same arguments used to thwart that deal are being used to attack Open Skies.

Opponents are aiming criticism not at Open Skies directly, but at a proposed change in rules that govern ownership of U.S. airlines. EU transport ministers aren't inclined to approve Open Skies unless the U.S. first relaxes restrictions on foreign control of U.S. airlines to better reflect foreign ownership rules for European airlines.

The House has approved a non-binding measure to delay the DOT proposal to relax foreign ownership rules. Separately, 163 House members have co-sponsored a bill to delay or veto the DOT rule change. The Senate has similar legislation pending. If enacted, Open Skies could be stalled indefinitely.

Tight restrictions on foreign control of U.S. airlines date back to the 1920s, when memories of World War I were still fresh. Even today, no U.S. airline is permitted to have foreign interests control more than 25% of its voting stock or more than one-third of its board of directors.

In addition, foreign investors may not currently exert "actual control" over any aspect of a U.S. airline by, for example, having a majority of votes on a board committee or a company president who is American but beholden to them.

U.S. citizens must control an airline's safety, security, routes, fares — everything. To invite foreign investment and to pave the way for Open Skies, the DOT now proposes changing this rule so foreign investors could exert control over purely "commercial" decisions, such as fares and routes. Only U.S. citizens would make decisions on safety and security, the proposal says. Limits on stock ownership and board control wouldn't change. Loosening foreign-control restrictions is not formally linked to Open Skies, but EU officials say one follows the other.

Daniel Calleja, air transport director for the European Commission, said in an interview from Spain that Americans don't face the same restrictions on investments in European airlines. Companies in the EU want "the possibility to invest in the American (aviation) market." In Europe, foreigners can own up to 49% of voting stock.

If the U.S. refuses to loosen its rule on airlines, "The EU ministers would have to re-examine the situation, and I think there would be no agreement," Calleja said.

Reaction in the USA to the foreign-control proposal has been swift and severe. Changing the U.S. rule would open the door to investment not only from Europe but also from anywhere else. Critics have not forgotten that U.S. oil company Unocal was nearly sold last year to CNOOC of China before a U.S. political backlash prompted withdrawal of the Chinese offer.

U.S. labor leaders fear foreign investment could threaten airline jobs at a time when tens of thousands of airline workers already have been laid off amid heavy losses and bankruptcies. U.S. pilots on trans-Atlantic flights could be replaced with foreign pilots, or more U.S. jet maintenance could be farmed out to foreign companies. Reps. James Oberstar, D-Minn., and Frank LoBiondo, R-N.J., sponsors of the House bill to block the easing of ownership restrictions, are sounding alarms about homeland security and national defense. During war, the Pentagon pays U.S. airlines to transport troops in the airlines' jets. Critics of the rule change say foreign investors might resist allowing aircraft use in a war they oppose.

"Allowing the daily operations of our airlines to be controlled by competing — and potentially unfriendly — foreign interests could significantly undermine homeland security," LoBiondo says.

Critics also say the DOT is trying to make an end run around Congress by changing the rule administratively. “If they straight up asked Congress to amend the law, it would fail,” says Duane Woerth, national president of the Air Line Pilots Association.

But DOT officials say they have the legal authority to revise the ownership rules and are prepared to defend their actions in court.

“I am a little surprised by the ferocity” of the criticism, says Jeff Shane, the DOT undersecretary for policy. He chafes at opponents' likening the Dubai ports deal to foreign investment in airlines.

“The two cases are dramatically different,” he says. In the foreign-investment proposal, “We have walled off security issues entirely” from foreign influence.

Restrictions on trans-Atlantic air service are almost as old as those on foreign investment. In the final years of World War II, the U.S., with the world's largest commercial fleet, wanted to fly anywhere.

But at a 1944 meeting in Chicago, the United Kingdom and other nations refused, citing their competitive disadvantage. The countries agreed instead on a system of individual agreements between nations regulating air service.

Although the U.S. has since negotiated individual Open Skies agreements with 15 European countries, the United Kingdom, Ireland, Spain, Greece and several Eastern European countries are not among them. They still restrict service to protect their own interests.

For example, only two U.S. airlines, American and United, have the legal right to take off and land at London's Heathrow Airport, the world's busiest international gateway. United, however, is not allowed to fly from Heathrow to all of its U.S. hub airports: Heathrow-Denver flights are prohibited.

Open Skies would end that.

“Those would be significant openings,” says Michael Whitaker, vice president of United, which supports the changes. “It would get government out of those decisions.”

It would also lift restrictions on European airlines, allowing them to fly between the USA and European cities outside their home countries for the first time.

“Instead of just Alitalia flying to the U.S. from Rome, you might see Air France, KLM or Lufthansa offering non-stop service to the U.S.” from there, says Washington, D.C., aviation consultant Mark Gerchick.

Delta Air Lines has come out publicly for Open Skies, but No. 1 American Airlines has been quiet, as have others. Continental, the only U.S. airline to come out publicly against Open Skies, has gone so far as to threaten litigation.

Continental President Jeff Smisek calls it “ludicrous” to think an airline could wall off safety and security decisions from a major foreign investor. And he says Open Skies would not be all its supporters promise. U.S. carriers already operate so many trans-Atlantic flights that “the only thing they really need in Europe is access to Heathrow,” he says.

Open Skies would technically make it possible for any U.S. airline to fly to Heathrow, but the agreement would not automatically make it possible to land there. Heathrow is so congested that takeoff and landing times must be owned. Although slots there may be bought and sold, they are costly.

If Open Skies is signed, Continental, which now flies to London's Gatwick Airport, would be locked out of the more popular Heathrow until it could buy slots and gate facilities there. Getting enough slots might take years.

Meanwhile, London-based British Airways could launch Heathrow service to Continental's home base of Houston if it wished. British Airways already flies between Heathrow and Continental's hub airport of Newark, N.J., but Continental can't compete. “If a U.S. carrier can't actually serve Heathrow, Open Skies is a worthless piece of paper,” Smisek says.

Shane acknowledges Heathrow slots are costly and may not be readily available. But, he says, “Anyone who thinks we can live with the status quo should think long and hard.”

The next move is up to the Bush administration. The DOT is scheduled to issue its decision on foreign control next month. The EU's transport ministers are scheduled to meet on Open Skies in June, when they could ratify it. U.S. and EU leaders could sign Open Skies in August.

Meanwhile, criticism in the USA shows no sign of relenting. “Some of the rhetoric has been embarrassing, even xenophobic,” United's Whitaker says.

Protect Our Heritage (WSJ)

By Stuart E. Eizenstat And Michael C. Maibach

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- There is a clear and present danger that Congress will use the recent Dubai Ports World controversy as a platform to fundamentally change the rules governing foreign investments in the U.S. -- and do so in ways that will scare away investments that are a lifeblood for a healthy economy.

We need to be clear-eyed about our vital national interests. Little direct foreign investment comes from the Middle East: 94% of foreign assets in America are owned by companies from the 25 industrialized, democratic OECD member countries, and 73% of all foreign investments in the U.S. are made by European companies. Our traditionally open investment climate has greatly benefited the American people. At a time when concerns are raised about the "outsourcing" of jobs abroad, foreign investment represents "in-sourcing," a vote of confidence by foreign firms and investors in the openness, flexibility and strength of the U.S. economy.

In-sourcing foreign companies employ more than five million Americans, some 5% of private industry employment. At a time when U.S. manufacturing employment is hemorrhaging, almost 35% of the jobs created by foreign firms in this country are in manufacturing. Foreign direct investment often saves a struggling American company, which might otherwise be shut down or moved abroad.

Foreign-owned U.S. operations account for 21% of our total exports and in 2004 plowed $45 billion in profits back into the American economy. Foreign-owned affiliates purchase 80% of their intermediate components from U.S. firms; they also spend $30 billion on R&D and over $100 billion on plant and equipment annually in the U.S. Moreover, we also need to keep the arteries of foreign investment open to fund our record current account trade deficit and compensate for our low savings rates; foreign capital flows keep long-term interest rates lower.

As Congress looks at changing the rules for foreign investment it should recognize that its actions will reverberate around the world. Today the European Union is facing its own foreign investment debate as France, Poland and Spain seek to check intra-European investments by their own EU fellow-members. Spurred by a takeover threat to the French yogurt industry from a U.S. company, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin has restricted foreign investment in 11 "strategic" sectors. Those on the other side of the Atlantic will be watching to see what the U.S. government does if the DP World controversy spills over into new anti-investment policies. Russia, already suspicious of foreign investment, may take comfort from U.S. restrictions.

In 1988, at the height of American concerns over Japanese investments, Congress passed the Exon-Florio Amendment to the Defense Production Act, empowering the president to block proposed foreign acquisitions that threatened national security. The president assigned the 12-agency Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. (CFIUS) to review such transactions. Since then, over 1,600 investments have been reviewed, and while the overwhelming majority have been approved, several have been withdrawn, either because CFIUS told the foreign company that they would recommend the president reject the acquisition on national security grounds, or because of congressional opposition, like the DP World deal. Many others were approved only with strict security agreements. The CFIUS process works well and has found a path that addresses national security concerns while maintaining an open investment climate.

The DP World case has spawned eight congressional hearings and some 20 bills. Even without formal changes, the controversy will lead to greater scrutiny of foreign investment, with more "split" decisions between agencies, and thus more decisions landing on the president's desk, subjecting him to case-by-case lobbying.

One set of bills would give Congress a greater role in overseeing individual investments by unprecedented, intrusive reporting requirements of all filings with CFIUS, including reports which identify disagreements by agencies. This could politicize foreign investment decisions, encourage agencies to go on record in opposition to foreign investment deals, and potentially lead to leaks of propriety information. But confidentiality is central to acquisitions. Another legislative initiative would transfer congressional jurisdiction over CFIUS from the Banking Committee, which has traditionally balanced security concerns with a recognition of the importance of foreign investment, to the Homeland Security Committee, tilting the balance away from investment.

Most troubling are proposals to require a mandatory 45-day investigation -- now reserved for only the most controversial deals with genuine national security concerns -- for all foreign investments, even by purely private firms, in "critical infrastructure." This would include a dozen sectors, from agriculture to telecoms and banking. The effect would be to chill foreign investment in some 25% of the U.S. economy: It might even have required the European firm that acquired Ben & Jerry's to go through an additional 45-day review! This is a virtual duplication of the French decree, and could lead to mirror-image bills by other countries, restricting U.S. investment in their countries. Increasing the time for approval of many CFIUS filings would drastically curtail the willingness of American firms to go through an acquisition process with any foreign firm, even from our closest friends and allies. Time is money; the longer a deal takes to approve, the more it costs and the more variables can affect the underlying transaction. Together these bills would threaten America's proud heritage of openness to foreign investment.

In an age of terrorism, foreign investments in U.S. assets must be carefully scrutinized for national security concerns. The current CFIUS process already provides such protection. More effective oversight and communication between the administration and Congress can be done under current law. Members of Congress from both political parties should avoid fundamentally changing the rules of foreign investment in ways that would create a less inviting climate for such investment at the very time we need more of it. If they do not, this would be an excellent choice for President Bush's first veto, because America must remain open for business.

Mr. Eizenstat, a former trade official in the Carter and Clinton administrations, is the American chairman of the European American Business Council (EABC), a group of 55 U.S. and European companies with transatlantic investments. Mr. Maibach is the president and CEO of the EABC.

Foreign Investment Needs (WT)

By John Castellani, Thomas Donohue And Todd Malan

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Today, reacting to the public concern about the Dubai Ports World transaction, the Senate Banking Committee will begin a legislative process in which very important national issues will be the focus -- none more than national security. But Congress needs to be careful as it moves forward in this area: National security, our economy and the health of many American's investment portfolios are at stake.

As leading business associations representing multinational companies based here and abroad, we have a strong interest in making sure the public and elected officials view the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) process as an effective national security tool. Our member companies will either have to comply with any changes to U.S. foreign investment policy or live with other nations' reaction to them.

Members of Congress are introducing legislation to "fix" the CFIUS system that many say created the storm in the first place. Some legislation focuses on refinements to CFIUS, while other bills go beyond to ban non-U.S. firms from entire sectors of our economy.

The most draconian proposal would ban non-U.S. companies' ownership of U.S. assets not only in seaports, but in energy, telecommunications, financial services and other industries viewed as "critical infrastructure." The bill would force companies based in countries that are among our staunchest allies, such as Great Britain, to sell their U.S. operations within a five-year period, the equivalent of a fire sale.

Why is it a bad idea to restrict foreign direct investment in the United States, provided it does not endanger our national security interests? Let's start with jobs. Restricting foreign direct investment would put at risk the jobs of 5.3 million Americans employed by foreign companies in the United States.

Next, let's look at the American investor's stock portfolio. Americans now hold more than $2.9 trillion in shares of foreign companies. For instance, cell phone maker Nokia may be based in Helsinki, but 40 percent of its shares are owned in America. The forced sale of U.S. assets by foreign-owned companies would hurt U.S. pensions, mutual funds and investors through falling stock prices and lower investment returns.

Foreign direct investment is also critical to the success of our capital markets, which provide the "seed corn" essential to the creation of new businesses and jobs, innovations and ideas. Our growing economy and robust capital markets attract more foreign investment than any other single country: more than $1.5 trillion. Shut off that spigot and our competitive edge and mighty economic engine will run dry.

And just think of how our trading partners would respond. While nearly 90 percent of U.S. company investments on an annual basis are made in this country, the fact is we invest more in their countries than they do in ours -- more than $2 trillion. Closing our markets would lead to retaliatory actions that would deeply harm the U.S. economy.

Clearly some changes are warranted. While we know the CFIUS process to be extremely rigorous, there is room for improvement. Congress was clearly unimpressed with the quality and depth of communication from the administration. To remedy this, there should be a focused process for dialogue between CFIUS and the committees of jurisdiction in Congress. Also, CFIUS should be especially alert in the case of wholly state-owned enterprises. One only has to look at Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's political use of CITGO Petroleum to see the reasoning for the current law's heightened review of state-controlled enterprises.

However, a congressional "veto" over CFIUS decisions would inevitably lead to politically motivated interference in a national security process. This would depart from every other administrative procedure in law regarding specific commercial transactions. Congress does not have a procedure for second-guessing anti-trust reviews, anti-dumping decisions or patent and trademark awards. It should not start here.

Nor should Congress tinker with the law's flexible definition of national security or, worse, expand CFIUS' mission to include "economic security." One of the strengths of the current law is its flexibility to adjust with the times: The Internet was barely known in 1988 when the law was written, but CFIUS now reviews most cross-border telecom transactions because the Internet backbone is part of critical communications infrastructure. Including "economic security" in the definition of the law is protectionism masquerading as national security policy. This charade emulates the very worst of other nations' policies.

As Congress debates how to respond to the Dubai deal, it should keep the Hippocratic oath in mind: First, do no harm. America enjoys the world's strongest economy, the most open and transparent markets, and one of the highest standards of living in the world, thanks in no small measure to international investment. Let's not put those benefits at risk now.

Belarus Plans To Charge Defeated Candidate Who Led Protest (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

MOSCOW, March 29 — Prosecutors in Belarus said Wednesday that they would bring criminal charges against a defeated presidential candidate who led an antigovernment march last week, and that they were considering lesser charges against a second candidate who organized a rally.

The announcement, during which prosecutors also said the police had arrested more than 500 demonstrators last week, continued the crackdown on the opposition to President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, who is often called Europe's last dictator.

It was also an unmistakable snub to the West. The United States and the European Union have demanded the release of the candidate, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, and of demonstrators arrested last week during peaceful protests against Mr. Lukashenko's re-election, which the opposition says was a fraud.

Mr. Kazulin, who was arrested Saturday as he led a march toward a detention center where opposition members were being held, faces charges of organizing group actions and hooliganism, Belarus's federal prosecutor said, according to the Belapan news agency. The first charge could carry a prison term of up to six years.

Mr. Kazulin received 2.2 percent of the officially tabulated vote on March 19.

In an interview Friday, he said an honest count would show he received roughly a third of the votes cast. The next day, he led a group of demonstrators who were attacked by an elite riot police unit, SOBR, which has been widely accused of human rights abuses.

His wife, Irina Kazulin, said the charges were retaliation for his daring to challenge Mr. Lukashenko's authoritarian rule. "It is personal revenge," she said by telephone. "It is purely a political case."

Ms. Kazulin also said her husband had been kicked and beaten, and had a back injury that had not been examined by a doctor. The prosecutor said Mr. Kazulin had not filed a complaint. Neither claim could be independently verified.

Prosecutors also said they were considering charges against Aleksandr Milinkevich, who received 6.1 percent in the official vote count and who has called for peaceful acts of public assembly. The potential charge, disturbing public order, could carry a sentence of 15 days.

Mr. Milinkevich, in a telephone interview as he prepared for meetings in Poland, said that he expected to be jailed, and that the announcement on Wednesday was part of a mounting campaign against him. "At first, it is usually a P.R. action," he said. "It is only beginning."

He added that the government's pressure was counterproductive.

"I think they would very much like me to emigrate, fearing imprisonment, but I am not going to do that," he said. "The more repression they bring against the protesters and the organizers of protests, the more protests they will have. They are losing their supporters."

The United States warned Belarus's prosecutors not to proceed with charges.

In a telephone interview, David J. Kramer, the deputy assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said officials involved in these cases risked personal sanctions in the West.

The European Union is expected to discuss sanctions against Belarussian officials when foreign ministers of its 25 nations meet on April 10. The United States, which has its own process for applying sanctions, including bans on travel and asset freezes, has been adding names of Belarussian officials on an almost daily basis since last week, Mr. Kramer said.

Gas Deal Roils Ukraine And May Have Cut Leader's Vote (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Andrew E. Kramer

KIEV, Ukraine, March 29 — The official residence of the managing director of a company now set to control Ukraine's supply of natural gas is a one-story, clapboard house in a tumbledown village bordering a defunct collective farm outside Moscow. A dirty rug covers the floor, a bare light bulb hangs from the ceiling and scraps of plywood plug gaps in the wall.

Olga P. Sakharova, 49, lives there with her mother and a German fox terrier called Lyusa and has never heard of the director, Oleg A. Palchikov, who operates a business worth $7 billion a year.

"What boss would want to live here?" Ms. Sakharova asked, surprised to learn that she occupied one of the few known addresses of any of the executives of the shadowy gas trading company involved in a deal between Ukraine and Russia that continues to roil politics here in Kiev, nearly 400 miles away.

The company, RosUkrEnergo, became a broker in a deal to resolve a New Year's confrontation between Russia and Ukraine over the price of natural gas — a deal that has prompted accusations of corruption and almost certainly contributed to President Viktor A. Yushchenko's poor showing in parliamentary elections last Sunday, when his party finished a distant third.

The mysteries surrounding the company — ranging from the identity of its owners and the circumstances of its selection, to even the places its executives live and work — reflect the post-Soviet combustion of politics and business that still afflicts Ukraine despite the significant progress that Mr. Yushchenko and his allies have made in making the country a freer, more democratic society.

Yulia V. Tymoshenko, Mr. Yushchenko's erstwhile ally in the mass protests that swept him to the presidency in 2004, campaigned fiercely against the deal, citing it as an example of the corruption and untrustworthiness of the leadership of Mr. Yushchenko's party, Our Ukraine.

With her party having won significantly more votes than Mr. Yushchenko's, according to nearly complete results announced Wednesday, she has now claimed the right to lead the coalition in Parliament representing the reformist, Western-leaning forces who took part in what came to be known as the Orange Revolution.

And she has promised that one of her first acts as prime minister, should she return to the post she held for the first eight months of Mr. Yushchenko's presidency, would be "by all means" to scuttle the deal and RosUkrEnergo's part in it.

"These are the standards preached by Kuchmaism," she said of the deal in an interview on Wednesday, referring to the scandal-tainted presidency of Ukraine's previous leader, Leonid D. Kuchma.

Ms. Tymoshenko's fierce opposition to the deal echoes her zeal in revisiting scandalous privatizations that took place during Mr. Kuchma's tenure, and could complicate efforts to reunite the coalition that swept Mr. Yushchenko to power.

Already, Mr. Yushchenko and his aides have met with his bitter rival, Viktor F. Yanukovich, whose party won the largest bloc of votes, 31 percent, raising speculation that he would seek a parliamentary alliance that would exclude Ms. Tymoshenko. Mr. Yushchenko's party announced Wednesday that it would not commit to any coalition until at least April 7.

Reopening the deal could provoke a new conflict with Russia over the supply of natural gas, only months after the New Year's showdown, which resulted in a disruption of supplies across Europe, deeply rattling countries that rely heavily on Russian and Central Asian gas that passes through Ukraine's pipelines.

"Any agreement that is unstable is one that is undesirable from the point of view of Europe," said Thane Gustafson, a senior analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates.

The deal's critics say the instability comes from the murky nature of the arrangement, which granted substantial control over Ukraine's gas market to a little-known company with links to Russia's state energy monopoly, Gazprom, and unknown investors.

Even now, nearly three months after the deal was announced, the ownership and operations of RosUkrEnergo remain murky. Registered in Zug, Switzerland, it is owned half by Gazprom and half by Centragas, an umbrella corporation run by Austria's Raiffeisen bank for a group of investors whom the bank will not identify, despite pressure from American and European officials.

Officials in Russia and Ukraine have accused one another of having beneficiaries in the company and have provided contradictory accounts of who suggested that RosUkrEnergo be included in the first place.

"This is the Ukrainian part and you need to ask them," President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia told journalists earlier this month. Mr. Yushchenko, by his own accounting, knows no more. "I have personally turned several times to the Russian side to receive this information," he said at a news conference earlier this month. "Unfortunately, as of today, I do not have any information about the founders of this structure."

Executives of the company, some of whom also work for Gazprom itself, declined to discuss the matter in detail. Aleksandr I. Medvedev, the director of Gazprom's export arm, Gazexport, and one of eight members of the board of RosUkrEnergo, has denied knowing the unknown investors.

Konstantin A. Chuychinko, the head of Gazprom's legal department and a longtime associate of Mr. Putin, is a co-director of RosUkrEnergo with Mr. Palchikov. The head of Gazprom's banking subsidiary, Andrei I. Akimov, also sits on the board.

Little else is known about the company. There is an office of a company called RosUkrEnergo on Saksagansky Street here in Kiev, but it operates a series of gas stations, and according to a woman there, has no connection to the company with its name.

Wolfgang Putschek, a member of RosUkrEnergo's board representing Centragas, said in a telephone interview that the company had an office in Moscow, but he referred questions about it to a public relations agency in London, Merlin PR.

Michael Rummel, a spokesman for the agency, could not provide an address for any office, and said officials would not comment. At the same time, he defended the company's role. Only a company like RosUkrEnergo, he said, could handle the complicated transactions necessary to supply natural gas from Russia and Turkmenistan to Ukraine and onward to Romania and Hungary.

The vacuum of information has led to reports, so far unsubstantiated, that RosUkrEnergo's beneficiaries have links to Mr. Yushchenko's top advisers. Mr. Yushchenko himself was forced to deny any involvement by his brother, Petro, who has been involved in the gas-trading business.

Although much remains unclear, there is little doubt the deal has weakened Mr. Yushchenko politically, tarnishing his reputation as an uncorrupted reformer. Mychailo Wynnyckyj, a professor of sociology at the University of Kiev-Mohyla Academy, attributed the electoral failure of Mr. Yushchenko — and Ms. Tymoshenko's success — to the gas deal.

"Yushchenko came to power on the whole idea of transparency," he said. "And he was pushing a deal that obviously had some corrupt aspect to it."

Date For Compulsory ID Cards In Britain Put Back To 2010 (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 29, 2006

The target date for compulsory ID cards in Britain was pushed back to January 2010 when the House of Lords accepted a compromise deal with Prime Minister Tony Blair's government.

By a vote of 287-60, the upper chamber of parliament agreed that Britons renewing or applying for a passport will not be obliged to take out an ID card as well in 2008, as originally proposed in the Identity Cards Bill.

Those people, however, will nevertheless have to have their personal details included on a National Identity Register -- something that Britain has never maintained before.

"The amendment preserves the integrity of the National Identity Register by ensuring that everyone who applies for or renews a passport or other designated document has their biometric information and other identity details placed on the register," said Home Office Minister Andy Burnham.

"However, it also goes towards meeting the concerns of those who have argued that the card itself should not be compulsory at this stage, by allowing those who apply for or renew their passport before 1 January 2010 to 'opt-out' of being issued the ID card itself, even though their identity details will be entered onto the register."

Unlike its continental European neighbours, Britain has never had a mandatory ID card scheme other than in wartime, but the idea has gathered momentum since the deadly July 2005 suicide bombings in London.

Critics of the scheme have argued that it would be next to useless as a weapon in the war against international terrorism and that it infringes cherished civil liberties.

In a vote on May 14, the House of Commons handed Blair its approval for the principle of linking the issue of biometric ID cards to passport applications and renewals -- a political bone of contention with the Lords.

Silvio's World As Italy Votes, Golden Career Of Berlusconi Is At Crossroads (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

ROME -- When Italy's prime minister, Silvio Berlusconi, addressed a joint meeting of the U.S. Congress earlier this month, he recounted how he was inspired by a boyhood visit to the graves of American soldiers who had died in the fight to liberate Italy from fascist oppression.

Minutes later, in an informal gathering with lawmakers, he hailed another American icon that guided him in his youth: Playboy. Mr. Berlusconi said he would rent out a copy, sent to him by an uncle, at 10-minute intervals to classmates at his Milan high school run by Salesian monks. "Of course," he said, "we were still good Catholics."

From his start with the monks, Mr. Berlusconi went on to one of the most glorious records of success of any man in Europe. Time and again he has broken into fields that in Italy had been the domain of an established elite -- from construction to television, sports to politics.

Along the way, he has amassed a fortune of close to $12 billion, almost twice that of Rupert Murdoch, mostly from his commercial television network, Mediaset SpA. He owns one of the most successful soccer teams in Europe, A.C. Milan, and he is the longest-serving prime minister in the history of the Italian republic. In his spare time, he has created a world-class collection of exotic flowers and cactuses, which he tends himself on his estate in Sardinia.

"It's not a superiority complex; it's an objective fact," he said once during a news conference aboard a cruise ship he rented for an election campaign. "No one is as valuable as Berlusconi."

Yet the man with the golden touch has proved a surprisingly leaden leader during his five years in power. Even on this sluggish continent, Italy is an underperformer. Growth last year was zero. Though nominally a free-market conservative, Mr. Berlusconi has done little to break monopolies, including those that keep Italians paying among the highest energy prices in Europe and impose steep fees for opening a business.

His detractors say adroit manipulation of his media empire explains his political success. "He has represented a giant step backward for democracy," says former Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi, who is running against Mr. Berlusconi in national elections on April 9-10. Critics say Mr. Berlusconi's legislative achievements are few because he has spent so much energy pushing laws to help himself avoid criminal charges from bribery to false bookkeeping.

Mr. Berlusconi has said it is a "disgrace" for anyone to suggest that his government has passed laws to benefit him personally. He denies wrongdoing in the criminal cases against him. His office didn't respond to requests for an interview.

Now, a few months short of his 70th birthday -- though he looks much younger after a face-lift and two hair transplants -- Mr. Berlusconi faces an uphill re-election battle. Polls say his coalition trails Mr. Prodi's by five percentage points. Mr. Berlusconi has been stumping throughout the country insisting that the economy is booming. Surely, he says, a nation that has more cellphones than people must be called prosperous. He also cites laws that made it easier to hire workers and overhauled the bloated pension system.

But businessmen and shopkeepers, once his core constituency, have begun to tire of his ebullient promises. "Considering all he has been able to achieve in his life I had expected much more," says Lucia Lolli, who runs a small stationery store in Rome. "I'm profoundly disappointed."

Should he lose, it may be the last great act in one of the most fascinating political careers ever seen in the land of the Medicis and Mussolini. Yet Mr. Berlusconi has often succeeded against seemingly unbeatable odds. In both business and politics, he has understood the market better than his adversaries.

He has long ignored all boundaries, whether between business and politics, between the appropriate or inappropriate, or between personal and public. A pioneer of commercial television in Italy in the early 1980s, Mr. Berlusconi cultivated a close friendship with Socialist Prime Minister Bettino Craxi, whose government provided crucial support that allowed his television network to stay on the air. In 1994, when Italy's political order was collapsing under a bribery scandal, he used the money, men and means of his advertising company to create a new party, Forza Italia, or "Go Italy." Two months later, his coalition won parliamentary elections.

Even his personal schedule knows few bounds. He often sleeps four hours a night and schedules appointments for 1 a.m., associates say. Most Saturdays, he travels to his villa in Sardinia, where a personal musician is frequently on hand to play the guitar as Mr. Berlusconi sings songs of his own composition. On Sundays, he flies to Milan to watch his soccer team play. On Mondays, he's back in Rome in his rented apartment in a 17th-century palazzo.

One of Their Own

Despite his glamorous lifestyle, many Italians still perceive him as one of their own, a regular guy. He is prone to gaffes, tells bawdy jokes in public and suggests it's acceptable to cheat on one's taxes, or one's wife. When he was asked in a recent radio interview whether he is faithful to his second wife, Veronica, Mr. Berlusconi answered: "I've frequently been faithful." In a speech two years ago to Italy's tax police, he said people shouldn't "feel guilty" about evading tax rates that were too high. On the campaign trail this week, he sparked a minor diplomatic incident when, trying to make a joke about the left-wing opposition, he said Communists in China would boil babies for fertilizer.

"He's not a snob. He's on the same wavelength as the average Italian," says Fedele Confalonieri, Mr. Berlusconi's best friend from grade school, who is chairman of the Mediaset broadcaster and a confidant. "He's a bit of a braggart, though."

On a recent television show, Mr. Berlusconi said "only Napoleon has done more" than he has as prime minister. Two days later, as newspapers poked fun at his hubris, he corrected himself: "I'm the Jesus Christ of politics, a victim, patient. I put up with everything. I sacrifice myself for all."

Mr. Berlusconi dismisses the potential conflicts of interest that outrage his critics by noting that he has relinquished day-to-day control of his media empire to two of his children. The prime minister owns Mondadori SpA, Italy's largest book and magazine publisher. Mediaset is by far the dominant force in commercial television, controlling 63% of the advertising market. Mr. Berlusconi's brother, Paolo, controls one influential daily newspaper and his wife controls another.

Since entering politics, Mr. Berlusconi has accumulated a long list of criminal indictments, any one of which might have forced a lesser man into retirement. The charges have included bribing tax police and judges, false accounting and illegal donations to political parties. On some he was acquitted or the statute of limitations expired before a trial was completed. On others, he was initially convicted and even sentenced to prison, but the convictions were overturned on appeal.

Judges had to throw out charges against him alleging false accounting after Mr. Berlusconi's government pushed through a law decriminalizing the offense. Parliament also approved a law that granted the prime minister and other top state officials immunity from prosecution, even for crimes committed before taking office. The law was later deemed unconstitutional.

Mr. Berlusconi has boldly turned his weaknesses into advantages. He claims to be the victim of communist prosecutors and a left-wing media conspiracy. Many in Italy believe him. These themes are echoed frequently in some of his magazines and on some of the news shows on his television network.

On the campaign trail, he often stages show-stealing moments that turn the tables on his adversaries. Earlier this month, he arrived unexpectedly at the annual conference of Italy's powerful business lobby, strutted onto the stage and took the microphone to deliver a blistering attack on the nation's leading newspapers. "Don't believe the newspapers that speak of decline," he shouted, traversing the stage and pumping his fists. "Where is this crisis? It exists only on the left and in their newspapers."

He boasts of building a strong alliance with the U.S. during the war on terror, in contrast to France and Germany. The Italian military has been a key component of allied forces in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Winning Over Skeptics

Mr. Berlusconi's charisma often wins over skeptics. Before meetings, he studies up on the personal details of someone he's scheduled to meet. He is generous with friends and allies. Last Christmas, he gave digital cameras to the 72 male senators in his Forza Italia party and bracelets to the five female senators. The 166 Forza Italia members of the lower house received hand-held computers.

Emilio Fede, a former top anchor with state broadcaster RAI, joined one of Mr. Berlusconi's television stations in 1989 after a visit to the tycoon's 145-room estate in Arcore, just outside Milan. Mr. Berlusconi acquired the villa after its previous owner, a marquis, shot his wife and her lover before turning the gun on himself there in 1970.

Mr. Berlusconi gave Mr. Fede and his wife a tour and sang them a song from the piano. They traveled by helicopter to Milan's soccer stadium to watch Mr. Berlusconi's A.C. Milan beat A.S. Roma. Later, in his office, Mr. Berlusconi slipped Mr. Fede a piece of paper with a handwritten salary figure. Mr. Fede accepted and has been one of the prime minister's most loyal fans ever since, earning him the nickname "Fido" in the media. On his office wall are pictures of himself with Mr. Berlusconi. Mr. Fede points to one: "In this one, we're dressed alike."

Mr. Berlusconi sums up his own life story in "Una Storia Italiana," a 129-page photo-filled booklet sent to every voter before the last elections in 2001. There, he describes himself as a typical Italian born to a family of modest means in Milan before World War II. But he says he had big dreams and the good fortune to have been born under a lucky star. The book includes his horoscope.

His talents emerged at an early age, he says. In high school, he would always finish his work first, then help his classmates -- for a fee, according to the book. He earned extra money during university by singing and playing guitar in bands and on cruise ships with Mr. Confalonieri, who accompanied him on piano. In 1961, during university, Mr. Berlusconi forged another lasting friendship. Though he usually sold copies of his lecture notes, he lent a copy free to fellow student Marcello Dell'Utri, who had come to Milan from Sicily, Mr. Dell'Utri recalls.

For many years, Mr. Dell'Utri served his friend as chief executive of Publitalia 80, the advertising arm of Mediaset, and later became a senator in the Forza Italia party. In December 2004 he was convicted of having contacts with elements of the Mafia. Prosecutors accused him of acting as a go-between in alleged dealings between Sicilian organized crime and Mr. Berlusconi's business empire. Mr. Dell'Utri has also been convicted of tax fraud stemming from his role as an executive in Mr. Berlusconi's companies. He has appealed the conviction on Mafia association and calls the accusations politically motivated.

In 2004, Mr. Berlusconi appointed Mr. Dell'Utri to the Council of Europe, an international body, based in Strasbourg, France, that promotes peace and democracy. The post gives Mr. Dell'Utri protection from arrest and from serving prison time.

Mr. Dell'Utri describes his friend as "a person who does not have limits." One day, 40 years ago, Mr. Berlusconi took Mr. Dell'Utri to a foggy field outside Milan. "I'm going to build a city here," he recalls Mr. Berlusconi saying. "You're crazy," answered

Mr. Dell'Utri. That field became the site of Milano 2, a revolutionary housing project in Italy that replicated an American suburb. The Milanese middle class snapped up the apartments, which were built around a duck pond, restaurants and boutiques.

Shortly after the Milano 2 project, Mr. Berlusconi sensed that television could be his next big moneymaker. In the 1970s, Italian television was dominated by the stodgy state broadcaster, RAI, which didn't start broadcasting until the afternoon, kept tight limits on how many commercials aired and handpicked which companies could advertise. Mr. Berlusconi believed there was a fortune to be made if he could find a way break RAI's monopoly.

He devised a clever strategy to sidestep a law that blocked the creation of private national TV networks. He bought up local broadcast rights around the country, and then had all his local stations broadcast the same program at the same time. This allowed advertisers that had been shut out of RAI to reach a nationwide audience.

Mr. Berlusconi's programming was geared toward the masses, with soap operas for stay-at-home mothers and cartoons for children. But in 1984, judges in Turin and Rome, calling the national network illegal, ordered Mr. Berlusconi's network to broadcast only local content. Mr. Berlusconi responded by pulling all his programming off the air in those cities in protest.

'Revolt of the Smurfs'

That sparked what came to be called the "Revolt of the Smurfs," named after the cartoon show broadcast on his network. Many children complained to their parents when the station suddenly went dark. Angry families demanded that the broadcasts be resumed. Mr. Berlusconi appealed to the prime minister, Mr. Craxi. The leader, who would later serve as best man at Mr. Berlusconi's wedding to his second wife, signed a government decree that allowed the stations back on the air.

Mr. Berlusconi's network soon stole audience share from RAI, while dominating its nascent private competitors. One struggling rival private station, Rete 4, tried to gain an audience by spending heavily on the rights for the miniseries "Winds of War," starring Robert Mitchum. For much less money, Mr. Berlusconi's station aired "The Thorn Birds," a miniseries in which Richard Chamberlain plays a priest who frolics with a young woman. "The Thorn Birds" destroyed "Winds of War" in the ratings, almost driving Rete 4 out of business until Mr. Berlusconi bought it.

As a businessman, say associates, Mr. Berlusconi could obsess over the look of a new show, while paying little attention to the financial details of his business empire. "I could never get him to look at more than a page of figures," says Franco Tatò, who has served as chief executive of Fininvest, Mr. Berlusconi's holding company. "But he can follow the rollout of a new product in minute detail."

During the Gulf War in 1991, Mr. Berlusconi called up Mr. Fede, the anchorman, at 5 a.m. one day. He complained that the marker used on the previous evening's newscast to highlight newspaper headlines was the wrong color. "He told me, 'Don't use a yellow highlighter, use a green one,' " Mr. Fede says.

Though Mr. Berlusconi's television venture was popular with viewers, it ran up debt equivalent to more than $2.4 billion by 1993. The entire business empire was at risk, recalls Mr. Tatò. He says he tried to warn his boss about the risk of banks closing their credit lines, to no avail. "Having so much debt is a good thing. It means that the banks trust me," retorted Mr. Berlusconi, according to Mr. Tatò, adding, "Besides, I'm lucky."

Around the same time, Italy's political order was collapsing under a bribery scandal in which Mr. Berlusconi would later be implicated. Mr. Craxi became one of the chief targets and later fled to Tunisia to avoid prosecution. Mr. Berlusconi had relied heavily on Mr. Craxi's support to keep his television network running smoothly and feared repercussions if a left-wing coalition dominated by Italy's former communist party took power.

In late 1993 and early 1994, Mr. Berlusconi summoned top executives and editors from his television stations and print publications to his Milan estate to discuss strategy. His idea: create a new political party with himself at the helm. "It seemed absurd to us," says Federico Orlando, who was deputy editor of the Milan daily Il Giornale, which Mr. Berlusconi owned at the time. But Mr. Berlusconi's understanding of the market proved to be spot-on. "The voters were exactly as he understood them to be, not as we thought they were," Mr. Orlando says.

Mr. Berlusconi came up with the name Forza Italia, after the popular soccer chant, "Go Italy." He wrote the lyrics to the party anthem, say several colleagues. He also designed an intensive training course for prospective Forza Italia candidates, many of whom were sales executives in Publitalia. Known as "the kit," it included a necktie, videos and a manual with advice on politics and grooming.

Just as the bribery scandal had decimated Italy's traditional governing parties, Mr. Berlusconi set out to create a new movement that appealed to a consumer-savvy middle class. "It was as if all the products on the shelf that people had used for years suddenly disappeared," says Mr. Dell'Utri, his old friend. "He invented the political equivalent of the formula for Coca-Cola."

On Jan. 26, 1994, in an address from his Milan estate broadcast on his television stations, Mr. Berlusconi announced his candidacy, promising "a new Italian miracle." He was voted into office two months later.

Fading Fortune

His good fortune didn't last long. In November, while presiding over a conference on international crime in Naples, Mr. Berlusconi received his first formal notice from prosecutors that he was under criminal investigation for alleged corruption. One of the parties in his governing alliance jumped ship, and his government collapsed after only seven months in office.

Many assumed that Mr. Berlusconi, who had promised to bring a new, clean type of politics to scandal-tarred Italy, was finished. But they underestimated his resilience. "He's an incredible fighter. He's the only politician capable of completely reversing his fortunes with one grand coup de théâtre," says Stefano Folli, a political commentator for the business daily Il Sole/24 Ore.

Indictments against Mr. Berlusconi continued to roll in during the 1990s, but each time he would describe it as fresh evidence that he was the victim of a political witch hunt. His battle against prosecutors became a central plank of his campaign in 2001 parliamentary elections, along with lowering taxes and creating new jobs. He won convincingly and once again became prime minister.

To date, Mr. Berlusconi has been the target of more than 90 investigations and he has been indicted more than 10 times. This month, prosecutors asked that he be indicted for allegedly bribing a British lawyer, David Mills, to make favorable testimony in a case. Mr. Berlusconi said the timing of the prosecutors' request, on the eve of elections, was further proof that they were out to get him.

At his annual year-end news conference in December, Mr. Berlusconi summed up his last term. "I'm convinced that no one in the history of the republic has ever done what we did," he said, "and that no one could have done better."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Sentencing Case Goes To The Jury (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 29 — The jurors in the case of Zacarias Moussaoui began deliberating Wednesday whether he is eligible for the death penalty, after prosecutors told them that he had been in the thick of the Sept. 11 plot and his lawyer portrayed him as a feckless "Al Qaeda hanger-on."

In a reflection of the unusual roads the trial has taken, the prosecutors based their closing argument largely on Mr. Moussaoui's own testimony to bolster their case that he should be executed. Mr. Moussaoui's chief court-appointed lawyer, in turn, relied mostly on the testimony of a prosecution witness, an F.B.I. agent, to argue that the defendant should instead be given a life sentence.

Mr. Moussaoui has already pleaded guilty in connection with the conspiracy; only the sentence is at issue in the trial. But the nine men and three women of the jury are not deciding even at this stage whether he should be executed. Under federal law, they must first consider whether Mr. Moussaoui, who was in jail at the time of the attacks, is eligible for the death penalty.

To reach such a finding, Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told them, they must consider whether his actions led directly to any deaths on Sept. 11, 2001. If they decide unanimously that the answer is yes, they will hear evidence of any aggravating factors like the large number of victims, and of mitigating factors like Mr. Moussaoui's mental health. After that phase, the jurors would decide whether to recommend execution. The death sentence would require another unanimous vote, and Judge Brinkema would be obliged to impose it.

In trying to convince the jury that Mr. Moussaoui was responsible for at least some of nearly 3,000 fatalities that day, David Raskin, a federal prosecutor, said that when Mr. Moussaoui was arrested for immigration violations three weeks before the attacks, he used training he had received from Al Qaeda to protect the other plotters by lying to investigators.

"Zacarias Moussaoui came to this country to kill as many Americans as he could," Mr. Raskin told the jury, citing the defendant's startling testimony on Monday that his arrest had kept him from flying a plane into the White House on Sept. 11. "So instead, he killed people by lying."

Mr. Raskin referred repeatedly to Mr. Moussaoui's testimony, in which he acknowledged the essence of the government's case: that he had known much about the plot and had concealed that knowledge.

"How do you know the defendant lied?" Mr. Raskin said to the jury. "Well, because the defendant admitted it here in the courtroom."

Had Mr. Moussaoui told the truth when he was arrested, Mr. Raskin said, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Federal Aviation Administration would have thwarted much of the plot if not all of it. For example, he said, the F.B.I. would have obtained from Mr. Moussaoui's belongings a list of American flight schools — two of them in Venice, Fla., that were marked on the list with Arabic notations. Those two schools trained two of the Sept. 11 hijackers.

But Edward B. MacMahon Jr., the chief defense lawyer, said Mr. Moussaoui was clearly being driven by a desire for notoriety in asserting plans for him to crash a plane into the White House, changing his earlier account that he had been uninvolved in Sept. 11.

"He was never slated, except in his dreams, to be part of the plot," Mr. MacMahon said. "Now he wants to write a role for himself in history when the truth was he was an Al Qaeda hanger-on."

Moreover, the defense argued, it is entirely speculative to say that if Mr. Moussaoui had told the truth, the government would have thwarted the plot.

Mr. MacMahon cited the testimony of Harry Samit, an F.B.I. agent in Minneapolis who arrested Mr. Moussaoui and became convinced that he was a terrorist involved in some imminent hijacking. Mr. Samit said under Mr. MacMahon's cross-examination that his supervisors in Washington had been "criminally negligent" in bungling the case.

"Agent Samit's work was tremendous," Mr. MacMahon told the jury, but he was repeatedly obstructed by superiors at the bureau. There is no evidence, the lawyer said, that if Mr. Moussaoui had disclosed what he knew, the F.B.I. "would have transformed itself into a flawless institution." He asked the jurors to frustrate Mr. Moussaoui's expectation that they will move to have him killed simply because they are Americans.

"Show him we are not the hate-filled vengeful Americans Zacarias Moussaoui thinks you are," Mr. MacMahon said.

During Mr. MacMahon's final argument, Mr. Moussaoui, who does not speak to his lawyers, slumped low in his chair at the side of the courtroom, his eyelids heavy. When the prosecutors spoke, he seemed more attentive.

In Closing, Moussaoui Trial Rests On His Lies (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Zacarias Moussaoui is an arrogant, hate-filled, wannabe terrorist who lied in court about his involvement in the Sept. 11, 2001, plot because he is incapable of telling the truth, jurors were told during closing arguments yesterday at his death penalty trial.

And that was Moussaoui's attorney talking.

Moussaoui is, indeed, a liar who misled the FBI when he was arrested a month before Sept. 11, 2001, prosecutors asserted -- until he told the truth when he testified that he planned to crash a hijacked airplane into the White House on that day of terror.

The role reversals have almost become routine in the death penalty trial of Moussaoui, 37, the only person convicted in the United States in connection with Sept. 11. The jury began deliberating late yesterday after both sides finished closing arguments. Jurors will consider whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty, then reconvene for a second phase of the trial if they decide he is.

Moussaoui's attorneys spent much of their closing trying to undo the damage their client did to his case with his testimony Monday, when he calmly told jurors that he wanted to kill all Americans, starting with a White House attack that was to include "shoe bomber" Richard Reid.

"Mr. Moussaoui displayed his absolute contempt for every one of us," defense attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said at the outset. Speaking directly to the 17-member jury, including five alternates, he said: "He believes that all of you sitting in that box, just because you are Americans, that you want to kill him."

MacMahon said Moussaoui's version of his Sept. 11 role was "a tall tale, a whopper even for a convicted felon, an al-Qaeda member who believes it's his obligation to lie to you." He said that the government's massive investigation never showed Moussaoui was involved and that Moussaoui had no contact with the 19 hijackers who toppled the World Trade Center, damaged the Pentagon and crashed a plane into a field in Pennsylvania.

Pointing to statements by top al-Qaeda leaders that disputed Moussaoui's account, MacMahon said his client "was trying to write a role for himself into history when the truth is, he was an al-Qaeda hanger-on and a nuisance to everybody."

Prosecutors might have gained the upper hand in the case with Moussaoui's testimony, especially when he admitted to a key government argument for his execution: that he lied to the FBI when he was arrested to allow the plot to go forward.

Yet prosecutors had to walk a delicate line yesterday. Their entire case that Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty is based on how, they say, the Sept. 11 attacks could have been prevented had he told the truth. And when Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda, he told a different story, saying that his White House assault was to be part of a second wave of attacks.

As they summed up their case, prosecutors said the Moussaoui who appeared on the witness stand Monday was telling the truth, and they quoted extensively from his testimony. "Zacarias Moussaoui came to this country to kill as many Americans as he could," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Raskin said as he began his closing. "In this trial, you have learned from the defendant himself that that is exactly what he did."

Raskin said Moussaoui's version of events was backed up by other evidence showing his activities in August 2001 paralleled those of the hijackers. Moussaoui received about $14,000 from al-Qaeda in early August, bought two of the same type of short-blade knives the hijackers used and was rushing to complete his training on a 747 simulator.

Legally, prosecutors argued, Moussaoui's precise role is irrelevant because his lies still make him eligible for the death penalty. "Whether he was part of the first wave, the second wave or the 20th wave, he still had the same evidence in his head," Assistant U.S. Attorney David J. Novak said in his rebuttal.

The closing arguments came after a series of unusual developments in a case already known for them. A day after Moussaoui's testimony, prosecutors introduced evidence that he had met with them on the eve of the trial and offered to testify for them and against himself, in exchange for better jail conditions before his execution. Moussaoui withdrew the offer when he realized he had a constitutional right to testify on his behalf, despite his attorneys' objections.

Moussaoui's actions and history of courtroom outbursts have long raised questions about his mental state. When he tried to fire his attorneys and represent himself in 2002, he was evaluated by a court-appointed psychiatrist. U.S. District Judge Leonie

M. Brinkema found him mentally competent and allowed him to represent himself, though she later revoked that right after Moussaoui filed blistering handwritten motions from jail.

Brinkema also allowed Moussaoui to enter a guilty plea last year, after his attorneys argued he was mentally incompetent to make it. When he initially notified the government that he intended to plead guilty, Moussaoui said he was willing to accept the possibility of a death sentence, sources familiar with the case have said.

Richard Moran, a professor of sociology and criminology at Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts, said that although Moussaoui's recent actions "probably seal his fate with the jury," his insistence on testifying is rational.

"He's asserting his right to be taken seriously and offer an explanation for his actions," Moran said. "He doesn't want to be dismissed as a kind of two-bit troublemaker whose actions can only be explained by mental instability or illness."

Asked whether he thought Moussaoui wanted to die, Moran, who has testified in more than two dozen death penalty hearings, said: "I would think he prefers death and the attention and martyr status he might achieve to rotting in a cell for the rest of his life."

Jury Begins Deliberating Fate Of Moussaoui (LAT)

By Richard Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The jury in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial began deliberating today on whether he is eligible for the death penalty after prosecutors said his silence kept the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist plot under wraps and defense attorneys said a dysfunctional federal law enforcement system never would have stopped the hijackers anyway.

Both sides agreed that Moussaoui was a liar and a manipulator. Prosecutors said he lied when he was arrested just 25 days before the terrorist attacks on New York and Washington. Defense lawyers said he was "now trying to write a role in history for himself, when the truth is he's just an Al Qaeda hanger-on."

Even more remarkable, the two sides switched their positions about the 37-year-old Frenchman, who was apprehended while taking jet simulator lessons in Minnesota.

Prosectors said they believed Moussaoui when he testified that he was in the United States to pilot a fifth plane into the White House on the morning of Sept. 11. At the same time, prosecutors branded him a liar who tried to deceive FBI agents.

Defense lawyers also took an oddly untraditional tack in their closing arguments. Faced with a client they could not control, they repeatedly castigated him as untrustworthy; someone who was trying to manipulate the jury. And they all but accused Moussaoui, who in the past has claimed he was to be part of a second wave of attacks, of committing perjury when he testified about being the fifth Sept. 11 pilot.

Seventeen potential jurors had heard the evidence. Judge Leonie M. Brinkema randomly chose 12 — nine men and three women — as the jury. The five others are alternates.

Wednesday concluded the first phase of the sentencing trial, convened when Moussaoui pleaded guilty to two capital murders last April.

The jury must now decide several key questions:

Did Moussaoui lie to FBI agents in Minnesota on Aug. 16 and Aug. 17, 2001, when he claimed he was merely a tourist visiting this country?

If so, did he lie "contemplating" that someone would die as a result?

Did his lies lead to any of the 2,792 deaths on Sept. 11?

The jury's verdict must be unanimous. If the jury comes down on the side of prosectors and determines that Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty, then the trial will move into a second phase.

Then, the two sides will spend several weeks presenting evidence trying to persuade the jury to give him the death penalty or life in prison with no parole.

If the jury decides he is not eligible for the death penalty, the case will end and Moussaoui will be sentenced to life without parole.

As the judge told the jurors: "I will sentence the defendant upon your conclusion."

The jury deliberated about 90 minutes late this afternoon and is to return Thursday morning.

Prosecution Says Moussaoui Killed With His Lies; Defense Points To Federal Blunders Before 9/11 (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 30, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Virginia-The death-penalty case against al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui went to the jury Wednesday after the prosecution asserted his lies were responsible for deaths Sept. 11, 2001, and the defense argued he had no part in the plot.

The nine men and three women on the jury will decide whether Moussaoui bears blame for at least one death that day. If so, a second phase of the trial, which could last weeks, will open that will determine whether he deserves to be executed.

If not sentenced to execution, the 37-year-old Frenchman will spend the rest of his life in prison.

"Zacarias Moussaoui came to this country to kill as many Americans as he could," prosecutor David Raskin said, wrapping up a case that saw Moussaoui make the startling claim - disputed by his own lawyers - that he was to have piloted a fifth hijacked plane Sept. 11 and flown it into the White House.

"Instead he killed people by lying and concealing the plot...that resulted in the worst terrorist attack in the country's history."

Raskin said Moussaoui lied "with lethal intent" when he failed to tell federal agents after his arrest in August 2001 about his al-Qaida membership and the plot to kill Americans using hijacked aircraft.

Defense lawyer Edward MacMahon countered that his client was merely an "al-Qaida hanger-on" who had nothing to do with Sept. 11. He accused the prosecution of trivializing bureaucratic blunders that might have prevented the Sept. 11 plot from being exposed.

"Moussaoui was never involved other than in his dreams," MacMahon said, trying to minimize damage that Moussaoui might have done to himself when he claimed on the stand that he was to have crashed a plane into the White House on Sept. 11.

"The government cannot prove a hypothetical, what would have happened if Moussaoui had not lied," he said. "We will never know what could have happened in the 25 days between Moussaoui's arrest and Sept. 11."

He said of his client: "He's now trying to write a role for himself in history when in reality he's an al-Qaida hanger-on."

Moussaoui watched the closing arguments impassively but shouted "Victory to Moussaoui, God curse America," during a recess after the judge and jury had left the room. The recess preceded U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema's instructions to the jury.

Prosecutors contended that if Moussaoui had told the truth after his arrest, investigators could have tracked down 11 of the 19 hijackers. "The FBI would have had the names, the phone numbers, and their addresses in some cases," Raskin said.

The bottom line, he said, was that, "He chose Osama bin Laden and because of that, 2,900 are dead."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with al-Qaida, which bin Laden leads, to hijack airplanes.

MacMahon challenged the assertion that Moussaoui had led investigators on a goose chase with his deceptions. He said, for example, that the government had the identities of two of the hijackers 18 months before 9/11 when they were on U.S. soil - men who had been previously under CIA surveillance in Malaysia - and still did nothing.

The arguments followed a disclosure Tuesday that Moussaoui offered last month to testify for prosecutors against himself at his death penalty trial, the firmest evidence yet that he was seeking to derail his own defense to try to gain martyrdom through execution.

The jury must decide whether he will be executed or imprisoned for life. If jurors find he is eligible for the death penalty, the question now in their hands, a second phase would involve another round of testimony, probably focusing on the nearly 3,000 Sept. 11 victims.

Prosecutors want a mistrial declared if the jury does not agree unanimously, which could mean a new trial with a new jury. Defense attorneys argued any hung jury should end the trial with a sentence of life in prison. Brinkema appeared to lean toward the defense argument, but did not immediately resolve the issue.

According to Tuesday's testimony, Moussaoui offered in February during a jailhouse meeting with prosecutors to testify for the government that he planned to hijack and pilot a fifth plane on Sept. 11.

FBI agent James Fitzgerald testified that Moussaoui told him - in a meeting requested by the defendant - that he did not want to die behind bars and it was "different to die in a battle ... than in a jail on a toilet."

Moussaoui dropped his effort to testify for prosecutors after he learned that he had an absolute right to testify in his own defense.

On Monday, he stunned the court by asserting publicly for the first time that he was to fly a 747 jetliner into the White House on Sept. 11, despite having claimed for three years that he had no role in the plot. Instead, he had said he was to be part of a possible later attack.

The defense presented evidence from three high-ranking al-Qaida operatives, including the chief organizer of Sept. 11, that cast doubt on Moussaoui's claim of involvement in the attacks.

Associated Press writers Michael J. Sniffen and Pete Yost contributed to this report.

Moussaoui Wanted To Kill People, U.S. Prosecutor Says (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Cary O'reilly Nadine Elsibai

Bloomberg, March 30, 2006

March 29 (Bloomberg) -- Zacarias Moussaoui wanted to kill as many people as possible in the Sept. 11 conspiracy, a prosecutor told jurors before they began deliberating on whether to let the government continue seeking a death sentence.

``Zacarias Moussaoui came to this country to kill as many Americans as he could," prosecutor David Raskin said in closing arguments in the sentencing trial's initial phase in Alexandria, Virginia. ``That is exactly what he did."

Defense lawyer Edward McMahon criticized his own client, saying jurors ``saw an arrogant, dangerous, stubborn person" when Moussaoui testified two days ago that he plotted to fly a plane into the White House on Sept. 11. The lawyer said Moussaoui's only involvement in the plot ``was in his dreams."

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last April to conspiracy charges linked to the attacks. He testified this week that he knew about the Sept. 11 plot when he was arrested on immigration charges Aug. 16, 2001, and that he lied to FBI agents because he wanted the attacks to go forward. He is the only person charged in the U.S. in connection with the attacks.

Jurors recessed for the day after deliberating for an hour and a half on the initial phase of the case to decide whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty. If he is, the trial will continue so jurors can decide whether he will be sentenced to death. A decision that he is ineligible for capital punishment would lead to a life prison sentence without parole.

No-Fly List

Raskin said that if the government had known what Moussaoui knew the month before the attacks, three of the four hijacker pilots would have been put on a no-fly list. Hijacker Mohamed Atta ``wouldn't have gotten out of Boston," where his fatal flight originated, the prosecutor said.

``There are 3,000 people dead and the question is whether the information he had would have stopped it," another prosecutor, David Novak, told the federal court jury.

McMahon said Moussaoui's testimony this week was ``a tall tale, a whopper even for a convicted felon, a liar." The lawyer said, ``Moussaoui is obligated to lie to you because he's at war."

His beliefs about the U.S. are the result of ``ignorance and prejudice," said McMahon, who said his client ``believes all of you, just because you are Americans, want to kill him." The defense lawyer said the government failed to prove its case and there was no evidence that Moussaoui was involved in the Sept. 11 plot, ``whatever he says."

Moussaoui Laughed

Moussaoui, sitting in the courtroom, laughed and shook his head when McMahon said that statements read to the jury from captured al-Qaeda leaders said he had no involvement in the Sept. 11 plot.

Moussaoui testified two days ago that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid planned to hijack a jetliner and fly it into the White House on the day of the Sept. 11 attacks.

``I was supposed to pilot a plane to hit the White House," Moussaoui said. He said he also knew in advance that the World Trade Center in New York would be hit.

Federal agents arrested Moussaoui, a French citizen of Moroccan descent, in 2001 in Minnesota after FBI agents discovered he was taking lessons to become a pilot.

Prosecutors said his lies to federal agents prevented them from uncovering the Sept. 11 plot. They said he is responsible for the deaths of almost 3,000 people when 19 terrorists hijacked commercial airliners and flew two of them into the World Trade Center and a third into the Pentagon outside Washington. A fourth plane crashed near Pittsburgh.

Six Counts

Moussaoui pleaded guilty to six counts that included conspiracy to commit acts of international terrorism, to commit aircraft piracy resulting in death, and to destroy an aircraft resulting in death.

At the time of his guilty plea, he maintained that his plan to fly a commercial jetliner into the White House was separate from the 2001 attacks. That changed when Moussaoui took the witness stand and said his plan was to have been part of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Sentencing in federal death penalty cases is held in two parts. Jurors first are considering whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty. Prosecutors must prove his actions directly led to at least one death in the Sept. 11 attacks.

If Moussaoui is found eligible, the trial would move to a second stage in which the jury would consider factors weighing for and against capital punishment to decide whether to sentence him to death. A verdict of death must be unanimous.

The case is U.S. vs. Moussaoui, 01cr455, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia (Alexandria).

Former U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino Indicted (FREEP)

By DAVID ASHENFELTER, FREE PRESS STAFF WRITER

Detroit Free Press, March 30, 2006

The former lead prosecutor in Detroit's ill-fated 2003 terrorism trial was indicted Wednesday along with a State Department official on charges that they conspired to mislead the jury about evidence in the case.

The indictment said former U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino, 44, and Harry Raymond Smith, former security official assigned to the U.S. Embassy in Amman, Jordan, misled the jury about the existence of photographs that would contradicted so-called targeting sketches of the Queen Alia Military Hospital in Jordan.

The men were charged with conspiracy to obstruct justice, obstructing justice and making materially false declarations before a court.

The photographs, had they been presented at trial, would have shown that a dead tree said to be depicted in the sketch in the day planner didn't show up in the photographs.

Two men were found guilty in June 2003 of conspiring to aid terrorists at the trial. But the charges were thrown out in September 2004 at the request of the U.S. Attorney's Office, which said Convertino had withheld key evidence from the defendants and allowed witnesses to mislead the jury.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Convertino Over Handling Of Terrorism Case (DEN)

By Ronald J. Hansen

Detroit News, March 30, 2006

DETROIT -- Richard G. Convertino, the one-time federal prosecutor who triumphantly won two convictions in the nation's first terror trial after September 11, was formally indicted today on charges that he built that case on perjury and deception.

The four-count indictment, which had been expected for weeks, alleges Convertino obstructed justice and sought false statements under oath in an effort to win the case against four immigrants.

Also indicted was Harry Raymond Smith III, a U.S. State Department security officer, who is charged with conspiring with Convertino to help bolster the case against the men.

The indictment marks another low point for the government in the disastrous Detroit "sleeper cell" terror case.

Convertino led the government's legal attack on four immigrants charged with conspiring to support terrorism.

In June 2003, a jury convicted two of the men of the most serious charges and another man of less-serious document fraud. The fourth man was acquitted.

John Ashcroft, then the U.S. attorney general, trumpeted the verdict as a victory in the nation's ongoing war on terror. Legal scholars called the case a victory for the criminal justice system because it validated that even sensitive national security matters could be handled by traditional juries.

But by 2004, the government had discovered enough evidence withheld from defense lawyers and other problems in the case that it abandoned the terror convictions against two of the men and instead focused on wrongdoing by Convertino and others in the investigation.

Prosecutor, Agent Indicted In Detroit (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

A former federal prosecutor and a State Department security officer were indicted yesterday on charges that they lied during a bungled terrorism trial in Detroit and then sought to cover up their deceptions once the case began to fall apart.

Former assistant U.S. attorney Richard G. Convertino, 45, and State Department special agent Harry R. Smith III, 49, were charged with conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false statements in connection with the 2003 prosecution, according to an indictment handed up by a federal grand jury in Detroit.

The charges mark the latest embarrassment for the government in a case that was once hailed by former attorney general John D. Ashcroft as one of the most important terrorism prosecutions since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. It disintegrated after a federal judge ordered an investigation of Convertino's conduct.

Legal experts said yesterday that an indictment of a prosecutor for improper conduct in a federal courtroom is extraordinarily rare, if not unprecedented, in modern times.

"The charge is essentially that he prosecuted too aggressively and crossed the line," said Stephen Gillers, a New York University law professor who specializes in legal ethics. "This is simply astonishing."

Convertino also is charged with presenting false information at a sentencing hearing in a separate drug case to gain a light prison term for an informant.

He resigned from the Justice Department last year and has filed a civil suit alleging that he was the target of a smear campaign by the Justice Department that resulted in the exposure of a valuable counterterrorism informant.

Convertino led the prosecution of Karim Koubriti and three other North African immigrants, who were alleged to be part of a "sleeper operational combat cell." The government gained three convictions -- including two on terrorism charges -- but they were dismissed in 2004 after the Justice Department announced it had uncovered serious prosecutorial misconduct.

A report by a special Justice Department attorney assigned to review the case found that the prosecution had failed to turn over dozens of pieces of evidence to the defense. The "pattern of mistakes and oversights," along with possible misconduct, was so egregious that the government had little choice but to withdraw its case, his report said.

William Sullivan, Convertino's attorney in the criminal case, said in a prepared statement yesterday that the indictment is "another example of government reprisal" against Convertino for his lawsuit. A federal judge in Washington threw out part of Convertino's lawsuit in October, and delayed the rest to await the outcome of the grand jury inquiry in Detroit.

"Rick Convertino is a highly decorated and veteran former prosecutor who over a period of many years acted to preserve the safety of his community," Sullivan said. "We will demonstrate that the indictment is manifestly false."

One of Smith's attorneys, Matthew Leitman of Troy, Mich., said his client is a "dedicated public servant" falsely accused of wrongdoing. "We do not believe the charges are warranted, and we look forward to vigorously defending him in court," he said.

Convertino faces up to 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine, while Smith could be sentenced to 20 years behind bars and a $750,000 penalty.

The indictment alleges that, during the trial, Convertino concealed photographs taken by Smith and another State Department staff member of Queen Alia Hospital in Jordan. Convertino had alleged that the defendants made a casing sketch of the military hospital in preparation for a terrorist attack, and Smith testified that he had no photographs with which to compare the sketches.

But Justice investigators said later that Convertino knew U.S. officials had taken numerous photographs and that "it is difficult, if not impossible, to compare the . . . sketches with the photos and see a correlation."

Smith, stationed as a security officer at the U.S. Embassy in Amman, Jordan, from 1999 to 2002, assisted in the Detroit investigation.

The indictment notably does not contain several other allegations of misconduct by Convertino that were aired in prior court proceedings, including disputes over a second sketch alleged to depict a Turkish air base and over his failure to disclose evidence undermining a key prosecution witness.

Margaret Raben, a Detroit lawyer who represented one of the defendants, Abdel-Ilah Elmardoudi, said the government may have purposely kept its case against Convertino narrow in an attempt to prevent him from responding with his own allegations of misconduct by higher-ranking Justice officials.

Raben said the indictment was a "vindication for the defense team," but would do little to help the former defendants in the case. One of the defendants has been deported, two others are fighting fraud charges and the fourth is living in Dearborn, Mich., with his mother.

"The reality is that the government ruined these people's lives, and there is no remedy for that," Raben said. "Rick Convertino can go to prison for the next 15 years and it won't make one bit of difference for Abdel-Ilah or any of the others."

In a second criminal case, Convertino allegedly misled a judge about the defendant's cooperation with the government and "falsely suggested" that the original prosecutor had doubts about the accuracy of the amount of drugs in the case, according to the indictment. As a result, the defendant received a prison term of eight months, rather than the 108 to 135 months outlined in sentencing guidelines.

Ex-Prosecutor Accused Of Concealing Evidence In Terror Case (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — A grand jury charged today that a former federal prosecutor in Detroit who led one of the Justice Department's biggest terrorism investigations concealed critical evidence in the case in an effort to bolster the government's theory that a group of local Muslim men were plotting an attack.

The prosecutor, Richard G. Convertino, and a State Department employee who served as a chief government witness were each indicted on charges of conspiracy and obstruction of justice. The grand jury charged that they had conspired to conceal evidence from the jury about photographs of an American military hospital in Jordan that was the supposed target of a terrorist plot concocted by the Detroit defendants.

Mr. Convertino, once a rising star at the Justice Department who fell out of favor with supervisors in Washington, denied that he had ever withheld evidence, and he pledged that he would be vindicated. "These charges are clearly vindictive and retaliatory, and it's an effort to discredit and smear someone who tried to expose the government's mismanagement of the war on terrorism," he said in a telephone interview.

The indictment of the former prosecutor and one of his star witnesses marked a striking turnaround in a case once hailed by President Bush and John Ashcroft, his first attorney general, as a major breakthrough against terrorism plotted on American soil.

After four Muslim men were arrested days after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, in a dilapidated Detroit apartment, federal authorities charged that they were part of a "sleeper" terrorist cell plotting attacks against Americans overseas.

Two of the men were convicted on terrorism charges after a high-profile trial in 2003, with Mr. Convertino as the lead prosecutor. But the case soon began to unravel amid allegations of concealed evidence and government misconduct. The Justice Department ultimately repudiated its own case, leading to the dismissal of all terrorism charges against the men in 2004.

"I can't recall a case like this in recent memory where you have not only the collapse of the prosecution's entire case, but now the prosecutor himself indicted," said Brian Levin, a professor at Cal State University at San Bernardino who has written extensively on terrorism prosecutions.

"The government has made clear it's going to do everything it can to go after terrorism, but here you have a case where it appears that hubris might have intoxicated the prosecutor, and he might have taken one step over the line," Mr. Levin said.

Mr. Convertino, 45, who has left the Justice Department and opened his own defense practice in the Detroit area, faces a maximum of 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine if convicted. His co-defendant, Harry R. Smith III, 49, a security officer for the State Department who assisted in the prosecution, faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $750,000 fine.

The indictment returned by a grand jury in the eastern district of Michigan lays blame for the collapse of the case against the terrorism suspects at the feet of Mr. Convertino and Mr. Smith. It said the two men conspired "to present false evidence at trial and to conceal inconsistent and potentially damaging evidence from the defendants."

But an investigation by The New York Times published in October 2004 found that senior officials at the Justice Department knew of problems in the case almost from its inception, yet still pushed for an aggressive prosecution.

An internal Justice Department memo prepared in Washington before the 2002 indictments of the men acknowledged that the evidence was "somewhat weak," that the case relied on a single informant with "some baggage," and that there was no clear link to terrorist groups.

"We can charge this case with the hope that the case might get better," a senior counterterrorism official in Washington wrote at the time, "and the certainty that it will not get much worse."

The prosecution exposed deep rifts within the Justice Department over issues of strategy — to the point that some Washington prosecutors assigned to work on the case were barely on speaking terms with Mr. Convertino and his Detroit prosecutors.

The opening of the government's indictment against the terror suspects, drafted by prosecutors in Washington, appeared to have been lifted almost verbatim from a scholarly article on Islamic fundamentalism. And Mr. Ashcroft was rebuked by the Detroit judge hearing the case for publicly asserting — in error — that the defendants were suspected of having advance knowledge of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Ex-prosecutor Indicted In Botched Terror Trial (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

State Department official also charged with allegedly hiding evidence

DETROIT - A former federal prosecutor and a State Department official were indicted Wednesday on charges of conspiring to conceal evidence during a botched terrorism trial that proved a major embarrassment for the Bush administration.

Former Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard G. Convertino, 45, and State Department Regional Security Officer Harry Raymond Smith III, 49, were charged with conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false declarations.

The indictment stemmed from the prosecution of four North African immigrants accused of operating a terrorist cell in Detroit. The case was the nation's first major terrorism trial after the 2001 attacks, and was hailed by the Bush administration at one point as a victory in the war on terror.

Story continues below ? advertisement

Two of the four men, Karim Koubriti and Abdel-Ilah Elmardoudi, were convicted in 2003 of conspiring to provide support to terrorists.

However, a federal judge overturned the verdicts at the Justice Department's request after prosecutors discovered that documents that could have helped the defense were not turned over by the government as required.

Convertino was the lead prosecutor in the case, and Smith helped in the investigation and testified for the government at the trial.

Conspired to hide photographs

The indictment said Convertino and Smith conspired to keep from defense lawyers photographs of a Jordanian hospital that would have undermined the government's argument that the alleged Detroit cell made surveillance sketches of the place.

Convertino also elicited testimony from Smith and an FBI agent that the sketch matched the hospital and its surrounding area, even though the photographs contradicted that description, the indictment said.

"Mr. Convertino is a highly decorated and veteran federal prosecutor, who over many years consistently acted to preserve the safety of his community, and the Koubriti case is no different," said his lawyer, William Sullivan. "We will demonstrate that this indictment is manifestly false."

Sullivan said the indictment was retaliation against Convertino for a pending whistle-blower lawsuit. Convertino has said the government has mounted a smear campaign against him.

Smith's lawyer, Matthew Leitman, said that Smith is a "dedicated public servant" and that a vigorous defense is planned.

Convertino also was charged with obstruction in a second case in which prosecutors said he gave false information to a judge in an effort to reduce a defendant's sentence.

The charges against Convertino carry up to 30 years in prison, while those against Smith carry up to 20 years.

Other Convertino Cases Likely To Be Scrutinized (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, March 30, 2006

Wednesday's indictment of former assistant U.S. Attorney Richard Convertino puts a thicker tarnish on what was once a bright star of the Detroit office.

Convertino's terrorism case collapsed in 2004. His indictment on charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, obstructing justice and making false declarations before a court could put other criminal cases Convertino handled in jeopardy.

"What's very important seems to be a pattern that Mr. Convertino indulges in -- it's not just in the terrorism case," said Elizabeth Jacobs, a Detroit lawyer who plans to seek a new trial for Kenneth Andrew Jefferson, a man serving a 20-year prison sentence after he was convicted in 1999 following a trial prosecuted by Convertino.

Lawyer Carole Stanyar filed a brief in federal court Monday alleging Convertino arranged for the early release of convicts who testified against her client, Joseph Stines, in the same 1999 drug trial. She, too, is seeking a new trial.

More Convertino cases are likely to come under heavy scrutiny, Jacobs said.

"The U.S. government may not have the resources to check into all the cases that his hands have touched," Jacobs said.

Convertino's criminal lawyer, Jeffrey J. Del Fuoco, said he believes his client will be fully vindicated.

"There is no question he was a rising star in the Justice Department," Del Fuoco said of Convertino.

"He had won numerous awards from both the U.S. Attorney's Office and Main Justice," the Department of Justice's headquarters in Washington, D.C.

Del Fuoco said he thinks talk of problems with other Convertino prosecutions is an attempt to bolster a weak case to support the indictments. "They want to dig up dirt on the guy," he said.

Robert Precht, a former law professor at the University of Michigan and an expert on federal criminal law who practices law in New York City, said it is "sad and tragic that a man's career is ruined in this way."

"It's very rare for a prosecutor's misconduct to be handled as a criminal matter, but looking at this case, I can see why," Precht said.

Convertino likely saw himself as fighting a critical war against terror with insufficient resources, he said.

"I'm sure there were elements of vanity in Convertino's thinking, as well. He saw himself as a Lone Ranger who was going to vanquish these enemies."

Man Given 30 Years In Plot Against Bush (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

A federal judge in Alexandria yesterday sentenced Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, the Falls Church man convicted of conspiring to kill President Bush and of joining an al-Qaeda cell in Saudi Arabia, to 30 years in prison with 30 additional years of supervised release.

U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee denied government prosecutors' request to impose a life sentence, citing several mitigating factors, including the fact that Abu Ali "never planted any bombs, shot any gun or injured any person."

The 30-year sentence will "adequately and reasonably reflect" the seriousness of Abu Ali's offenses and "provide just punishment," Lee said, because it means the U.S.-born citizen, 25, will spend "most of his productive years in prison."

Abu Ali, dressed in a dark green jumpsuit with "Prisoner" stenciled in white on the back, showed no emotion when the sentence was announced. He declined to address the court before being sentenced.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty hailed the sentence in a statement as "strong punishment for the defendant's egregious crimes. It is important that Abu Ali remain behind bars until he is no longer a threat to the American people."

McNulty called Abu Ali's prosecution "a milestone achievement in the international effort to bring terrorists to justice."

The sentence disappointed Abu Ali's family and friends, who maintain that he was wrongly convicted on statements that they say were obtained under coercion and torture during his 20-month incarceration in Saudi Arabia.

"I think it's a sad day not only for me as a mother but for the whole country," said Abu Ali's mother, Faten Abu Ali, after the proceedings. "America is all about justice and democracy. Before we export democracy to the outside, we have to have it in our own land. My son didn't have a fair trial."

Abu Ali attorney Khurrum Wahid called the sentence "disappointing," noting that Abu Ali had testified during a pretrial hearing that "he was tortured, and that is the only reason he had made these statements."

Lee later said he found it implausible that Abu Ali was tortured, and jurors said after their verdict that they did not believe his story.

At his trial in November, the jury convicted Abu Ali of nine counts, including conspiring to assassinate the president and commit aircraft piracy, providing material support to al-Qaeda and plotting terrorist activities in the United States. Those activities included kidnapping members of Congress.

Abu Ali's attorneys have said they will appeal his conviction.

The trial was the first in a U.S. criminal courtroom to rely so heavily on evidence gathered by a foreign intelligence service. Security officers from Saudi Arabia, testifying anonymously via video from the kingdom, provided significant portions of the government's case.

But Abu Ali's conviction was based primarily on his videotaped confession to Saudi authorities after his arrest there in June 2003. He was detained as he was taking final exams at the Islamic University of Medina after other members of the al-Qaeda cell he had joined identified him to Saudi police.

Saudi authorities declined to prosecute Abu Ali, and U.S. officials did not request that the Saudis hand him over to them. His family then mounted a highly public campaign to have him brought home. They sued the U.S. government in federal court in Washington, contending that U.S. officials were complicit in the detention and torture of their son by Saudi security officers.

When that lawsuit threatened to force disclosure of information U.S. officials wanted to keep classified, the U.S. government formally asked for custody of Abu Ali.

In February 2005, Abu Ali was transferred to the Alexandria jail, where he has been in solitary confinement.

In seeking a life sentence, Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman called Abu Ali "the perfect recruit" for al-Qaeda, who "betrayed our country" by planning to form a clandestine terrorist cell in the United States.

But Lee noted that Abu Ali had no prior criminal record and had taken no steps to carry out his plots.

There is no parole in the federal prison system, though sentences can be reduced for good behavior.

Man Sentenced For Bush Assassination Plot (AP)

By MATTHEW BARAKAT, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 30, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — An American Muslim was sentenced Wednesday to 30 years in prison for joining al-Qaida and plotting to assassinate President Bush.

Prosecutors had asked for the maximum _ a life sentence _ for Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, a 25-year-old U.S. citizen who was born to a Jordanian father and raised in Falls Church, Va.

"The facts of this case are still astonishing," prosecutor David Laufman said. "Barely a year after Sept. 11 the defendant joined the organization responsible for 3,000 deaths."

But U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee said 30 years was sufficient punishment. He compared the Abu Ali case to "American Taliban" John Walker Lindh, who received a 20-year sentence.

Abu Ali's actions "did not result in one single actual victim. That fact must be taken into account," the judge said.

Abu Ali, wearing a green prison jumpsuit, declined to speak before his sentence was imposed. Defense lawyers said they plan to appeal.

Prosecutors said Abu Ali traveled to Saudi Arabia and joined al-Qaida out of hatred for the United States. The Saudis arrested Abu Ali in June 2003 as he was taking final exams at the Islamic University of Medina.

Ali was convicted in November of conspiracy to assassinate the president, conspiracy to hijack aircraft and providing support to al-Qaida, among other crimes. The charges carried a mandatory sentence of at least 20 years behind bars.

Abu Ali gave the Saudis a statement in which he said that he joined al-Qaida and discussed with some of the most senior al-Qaida members terror plots, including Bush's assassination, and plans to establish an al-Qaida terror cell in the U.S.

He claimed that the Saudis had extracted a confession from him through torture. Prosecutors denied he was mistreated.

Abu Ali said he had the scars on his back that proved he was whipped or beaten by the Saudis. Pictures were taken of his back, and doctors for both the government and the defense examined him, coming to different conclusions.

The jury in the three-week trial saw a videotaped confession Abu Ali gave to the Saudis in which he said he joined al-Qaida because he hated the United States for its support of Israel.

In February, defense lawyers asked for a review of the conviction in light of the disclosure that the Bush administration had eavesdropped on suspected terrorists' conversations without search warrants. Abu Ali's lawyers said they suspected, but had no firm evidence, that Abu Ali had been a target of the surveillance program.

The government's response was not made public, but the judge decided to go ahead with the sentencing after receiving it.

American Is Sentenced To 30 Years In Terror Case (NYT)

By David Stout

WASHINGTON, March 29 — An Arab-American student from Virginia was sentenced Wednesday to 30 years in prison for plotting with operatives of Al Qaeda to assassinate President Bush and hijack airplanes.

In November, a federal jury in Alexandria, Va., convicted the student, Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, now 25, of numerous counts of conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism. The jurors rejected his claim that his captors beat and tortured him into confessing after his arrest in Saudi Arabia in 2003.

Judge Gerald Bruce Lee of the Federal District Court in Alexandria could have sentenced Mr. Abu Ali to as little as 20 years. The Justice Department had argued for the maximum sentence, life in prison.

The department has described Mr. Abu Ali as "one of the most dangerous terrorist threats that America faces in the perilous world after Sept. 11, 2001: an Al Qaeda operative born and raised in the United States, trained and committed to carry out deadly attacks on American soil."

Mr. Abu Ali, who was born to a Jordanian father and grew up in Falls Church, Va., was arrested in June 2003 at a university in Medina, Saudi Arabia, as the Saudi authorities were investigating a wave of bombings.

Prosecutors said that Mr. Abu Ali went to Saudi Arabia in 2002 hoping to become a terrorist because he saw Mr. Bush as "the leader of the infidels," and that he eventually met a high-ranking leader of Al Qaeda and was trained in weapons, explosives and document forgery.

Mr. Abu Ali's lawyers have insisted that he was just a student who went to Saudi Arabia to pursue religious studies. They said they would appeal the conviction.

Defense Questions Informant's Credibility In Lodi Terror Case (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 30, 2006

SACRAMENTO - Attorneys representing a father and son facing federal terrorism-related charges opened their defense by challenging the credibility of a paid government informant.

The informant, a 32-year-old former convenience store clerk from Oregon, said in previous testimony that he saw three al-Qaida operatives in the Central Valley town of Lodi in 1998 and 1999.

At the time, the three were suspects in the bombings of U.S. government buildings in Saudi Arabia and Africa and were being sought aggressively by authorities. Terrorism and law enforcement experts previously told The Associated Press that it was highly unlikely the suspects were inside the U.S. when the informant said they were.

Defense attorneys pursued that angle Wednesday with two FBI agents they called to the stand.

Attorney Johnny Griffin III asked whether agents thought the informant, Naseem Khan, was lying to them when he claimed to have seen the terror suspects in Lodi. The Pakistani community in the agricultural hub south of Sacramento became a focus of federal agents shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"If he was lying as opposed to being mistaken, that would have a great bearing" on whether Khan was a suitable informant, said Eric Barnhart, an FBI agent based in Oregon.

He said he notified the FBI's Sacramento bureau of Khan's story but did not try to verify it.

DOJ_NMG_0024070

Sacramento agent Rachel Pifer, also testifying Wednesday, said she checked FBI databases and other sources before deciding that Khan's claim "was probably highly unlikely." Pifer said she believed Khan was truthful in telling agents "what he thought he saw."

But after court, defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said the testimony showed that the FBI and prosecutors "continue to use an informant they didn't believe. That's a problem."

The FBI agents were the first witnesses called by attorneys representing Umer and Hamid Hayat, a father and son from Lodi who have been in federal custody since last June.

Hamid Hayat, 23, is charged with attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and lying about it to the FBI. The government says he returned home in 2005 to await orders for attacking grocery stores, banks, hospitals and other targets.

His father, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver, faces two counts of making false statements to FBI agents. Both have pleaded not guilty.

The defense was beginning to call witnesses after roughly six weeks devoted to the government's case.

The statement by the government informant that he saw the three operatives in Lodi came after he was approached by the FBI in October 2001. The agency was investigating an alleged money-laundering scheme involving Islamic charities.

Khan denied knowledge of the money laundering but consented to an FBI interview in his apartment in Bend, a fast-growing former timber town in central Oregon.

Khan told agents he had lived in Lodi during the late 1990s and recalled seeing Osama bin Laden's physician, Ayman al-Zawahiri, attending a local mosque.

He also told Barnhart that he saw Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali in Lodi in 1998 and 1999. At the time, Ali was suspected in the bombing of a U.S. embassy in Africa and al-Nasser was wanted in the bombing of a U.S. military housing complex in Saudi Arabia.

Under questioning by Griffin, Barnhart said he considered Khan's claim as "historical information. I didn't see it as the focal point of his information."

Government agents around the country were receiving similar reports of suspected terrorist sightings - many of them unreliable - in the months immediately following the 2001 terrorist attacks, Barnhart said. In that context, the agent said he didn't consider Khan's claims particularly intriguing.

Much of the questioning Wednesday was contentious.

The agents repeatedly said they could not recall details of their interactions or conversations with Khan, even when they were shown their own reports.

Griffin, a former FBI employee and federal prosecutor, suggested the agents were deliberately feigning ignorance. He asked how trained agents who expected to be called as trial witnesses could fail to recall an informant telling them that a close deputy to Osama bin Laden was living in Lodi.

"Do you consider yourself a competent agent?" a frustrated Griffin asked Barnhart at one point.

"Yes sir," Barnhart replied.

The FBI hired Khan as an informant, sent him to Lodi in late 2001 and paid him nearly $230,000 over the next few years.

Khan, one of the government's key witnesses, befriended Hamid Hayat and secretly recorded hundreds of hours of conversations between the two, some by telephone while Hayat was in Pakistan between 2003 and 2005.

'Highly Unlikely' Bin Laden's Top Man Visited Lodi, Agent Says (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 30, 2006

Testimony about key terror figure questions informant's credibility

SACRAMENTO — It is "highly unlikely" that Osama bin Laden's right-hand man was in Lodi in 1998 and 1999, an FBI agent testified Wednesday afternoon.

The acknowledgment, elicited by the defense attorney for a Lodi man charged with attending a terror training camp, calls into question the credibility of informant Naseem Khan, who became a key government witness in the case.

Khan told a federal jury earlier this month that Ayman al-Zawahiri had spent at least a month in Lodi, making countless trips to the Muslim mosque. Khan originally made the claim to FBI agents who visited him in October 2001 to ask him about a multi-million-dollar money laundering scheme.

"I thought that the probability that he saw al-Zawahiri at that time was probably slim," special agent Rachel Pizer said Wednesday.

She communicated with officials higher up in the FBI, who said it was "highly unlikely." Pizer didn't recall who gave her the information, but believed it came from New York, which was also involved in post-9/11 investigations.

"So at some point you came to the conclusion that it was likely not true, correct?" asked defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents Lodi resident Hamid Hayat.

Pizer replied: "That's correct."

The agent did not confront Khan with the information "because I believed that's what he thought he saw," she testified.

For Mojaddidi and co-counsel Johnny Griffin III, who represents Hayat's father, Umer Hayat, the information casts doubt on the reliability of the man who went on to secretly record their clients and ultimately testify against them — to the tune of salary totaling about $230,000.

"They continued to use an informant they didn't believe," Mojaddidi said after trial ended for the day.

Attorneys had spent much of the day questioning the agent who first contacted Khan in Bend, Ore.

After meeting Khan and learning that he had once lived in Kentucky, agent Eric Barnhart remembered it so distinctly that he gave Khan the code name of "Wildcat," after the University of Kentucky's mascot.

However, though that first meeting was mere weeks after 9/11, Barnhart said has no memory of Khan giving him the tip that al-Zawahiri had been in Lodi.

Barnhart repeatedly said he has almost no recollection of his first contacts with Khan, even after Griffin showed the agent copies of his own reports.

Forgetting details is sometimes a way of halting the defense in trial, even though part of an agent's job is to remember details and later testify in court, a former FBI agent later said.

"He's being paid to remember stuff, and his notes are written so that he can remember that stuff," said James Wedick, who received multiple honors during his 34-year career with the FBI before retiring.

Wedick, who has been hired by the defense in the Hayat case, said outside court that some agents find they can simply say they don't recall things.

"There is a subset of folks who use that tactic in court to throw off the defense," he said of agents in general, clarifying that Barnhart was not necessarily using that tactic.

Barnhart testified that he remembers mention of Taliban members possibly being in Lodi in 1998 and 1999, but that he doesn't recall mention of al-Zawahiri, who is the FBI's second most wanted terrorist and has a $25 million bounty on his head.

Al-Zawahiri's photo appeared next to Osama bin Laden on the bureau's list of most wanted terrorists, which was released Oct. 10, 2001, exactly one week before Barnhart met with Khan.

Despite Khan's claims that he had seen Taliban members in Lodi when he lived in the city for a time, the FBI quickly made him a source and sent him to work in Lodi.

Before long, the FBI was paying him $3,000 a month plus bonuses, and he got a raise the following year, according to previous trial testimony and documents. Pizer, however, testified Wednesday that Khan was not paid a salary and was only given cash payments.

Khan grew close to local Muslim religious leaders, then befriended Hamid Hayat in summer 2002. He secretly recorded conversations, often asking the 23-year-old man if he was going to attend terror camps in Pakistan.

Ultimately, Hamid Hayat was arrested on allegations of lying to the FBI and denying that he had allegedly attended terror training camps in Pakistan. Hayat also faces a charge of providing material support to terrorists.

His father, 48-year-old Umer Hayat, is charged with lying to the FBI about his alleged knowledge of the camps.

Prosecutors wrapped up their case Tuesday after five weeks of trial, and Barnhart was the first defense witness, who testified that he interviewed Khan at the request of the Sacramento office.

Barnhart, who joined the FBI in April 1996, continuously said he had no recollection of most of his conversations with Khan.

"Do you consider yourself a competent agent?" Griffin asked him at one point.

Barnhart replied: "Yes sir."

Defense Calls First Witness In Hayat Trial (KXTV-TV)

KXTV-TV, March 30, 2006

Just weeks after the 9-11 terrorist attacks, you'd think information about Osama Bin Laden's number two man being in Lodi would be big news. But in the terrorism trial against two Lodi men, an FBI agent said when an informant claimed Ayman Al-Zawahiri had spent time in Lodi in 1999, the agent didn't alert his superiors about the information.

"In my mind, (it) was historical information," said Agent Eric Barnhart (shown above outside of court).

The defense in the Lodi terror trial is opening its case by trying to show a paid FBI informant was untrustworthy from the first time he received money in exchange for information. Part of that information from informant Naseem Khan included his claims that three top men connected to the Taliban, including Al-Zawahiri, spent time in and around the Lodi mosque in 1999.

Khan, who was being interviewed by the FBI in Bend, Oregon, also claimed to have information about alleged money laundering and fundraising for terrorism in Lodi, where he once lived.

Khan is a key prosecution witness in the case against Hamid Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat. The father and son, both Lodi residents and U.S. citizens, are charged with lying to the FBI about Hamid Hayat's alleged training in a Pakistani terrorist camp in 2003 and 2004. The younger Hayat also faces a charge of providing support to terrorism by his alleged training to commit violent jihad against the United States.

After his recruitment as a full-time FBI informant, Khan move back to Lodi, befriended Hamid Hayat, and secretly recorded several conversations they had about Pakistani politics, terrorist leaders and Hayat's purported desire to go to Pakistan to train for violent jihad.

Under questioning by defense attorney Johnny Griffin, Agent Barnhart confirmed he paid Khan $650 for his information given between October and November of 2001. Barnhart admitted he didn't know if Khan was lying or not but said if he had known, "I wouldn't have paid him."

At the time Khan made those claims about Al-Zawahiri, the terrorist was and still is on the FBI's most wanted list. Barnhart testified he was aware of that but didn't made a big deal about Khan's claims.

There's been no independent confirmation that Al-Zawahiri, nor the other two men, Ahmed Hamed Ali and Abdel Al Nassar, ever spent any time in Lodi.

Barnhart repeatedly answered, "I don't recall" to most of the defense's questions regarding how and why Khan was recruited. Khan was working at a Circle K store making low wages when first contacted by Barnhart in October, 2001. According to a receipt brought into evidence, Khan received money for his information beginning after the second meeting.

Obviously exasperated at the agent's apparent poor memory on the stand, Griffin once asked him pointblank, "Do you consider yourself a competent agent?" Barnhart replied, "Yes, sir."

The defense has begun calling witnesses after prosecutors rested their case Tuesday afternoon. Defense attorneys moved to have the case dismissed, claiming prosecutors haven't proven their case, but Judge Garland Burrell denied the motion. He's still considering another motion, however, to drop two of the three lying counts against Hamid Hayat.

FBI Agent Doubts Informant Saw Al Zawahri In Lodi (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 30, 2006

The account of an FBI informant, a critical government witness, about seeing one of the world's most wanted terrorists in Lodi in 1999 is probably not true, an FBI agent testified in Sacramento federal court Wednesday.

Naseem Khan, who already has testified against two Lodi men on trial on terror-related charges, said in his first meeting with FBI agents four and a half years ago that he saw two men on the bureau's most-wanted list at the Muslim mosque in Lodi in 1999.

According to an FBI report on that meeting between Khan and two agents, Khan positively identified photographs of Ayman al Zawahri and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali as the two men he saw at the Lodi mosque.

Al Zawahri is Osama bin Laden's chief deputy and is wanted in connection with the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya. Ali also is a suspect in those bombings.

FBI Special Agent Rachel Pifer testified Wednesday that after investigating Khan's claim, she concluded it "probably was not true."

Khan gave a truncated version of his story from the witness stand three weeks ago while testifying in the trial of Hamid Hayat, 23, who is charged with supporting terrorism by undergoing training at a camp in Pakistan, and initially lying to the FBI to conceal what he did.

Hayat's 48-year-old father, Umer, is charged with initially lying to the FBI to cover for his son and to hide his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training.

Much of the government's case against the Hayats rests on secretly recorded conversations the pair had with Khan in 2003. Khan wore a concealed recording device while acting as an FBI informant.

The Hayats are being tried at the same time, but with separate juries.

Both juries were in court Wednesday to hear testimony on the first day the defense presented its case.

Under examination by Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, Agent Pifer, who is assigned to the bureau's Sacramento office and who worked with Khan from November 2001 to September 2002, testified that she began checking Khan's claim about the infamous terrorist after hearing of it from a fellow agent.

"I thought the probability he saw al Zawahri at that time was slim," Pifer recalled.

She said she checked the bureau's internal databases and caused inquiries to be made at the agency's New York office, and perhaps other offices.

She said the feedback made Khan's story appear "highly unlikely."

Asked by Mojaddidi why she didn't confront Khan, Pifer said, "Because I believed that he believed that's what he saw."

Two FBI agents wrote, in a report of an interview with Khan on Oct. 17, 2001, that he "could still picture the priest-like al Zawahri standing up in front of the audience (at the Lodi mosque), speaking Urdu, and lecturing about Allah." That interview was conducted in Khan's apartment in Bend, Ore.

The agents stumbled upon Khan, who at the time was managing a Circle K mini mart in Bend, in the course of an unrelated investigation. He was quickly signed up as a paid informant and has since received nearly $230,000 in salary and expenses.

One of the agents who discovered him, Eric Barnhart, was the defense's first witness Wednesday, but he testified he doesn't remember much about his encounters with Khan.

Under questioning by Umer Hayat's attorney, Johnny Griffin III, the agent said he doesn't recall Khan telling him about seeing the two top terrorists.

Griffin showed the agent the report on the interview, which Barnhart helped prepare, but he said that didn't refresh his memory.

Asked if he later told an agent in Sacramento about the Khan interview, Barnhart again testified that he doesn't remember.

"Did you advise your superior immediately after the interview?" Griffin asked.

"I don't recall, sir," Barnhart replied. "I don't recall what importance I attached to it."

"Sir, do you consider yourself a competent agent?" a frustrated Griffin then asked.

"Yes, sir," the agent said.

Griffin asked Barnhart if he had been coached by prosecutors not to recall what Khan had told him about al Zawahri. He denied that had occurred.

When Griffin questioned Pifer, she too could not recall details of her early dealings with Khan.

Shown a report on her first meeting with Khan in a Sacramento park on Nov. 15, 2001, Pifer said, "I don't recall, but that's what I wrote, so that's what happened."

Griffin asked if her poor memory was brought on by prosecutors' coaching. Pifer answered that prosecutors told her to tell the truth.

Griffin, a former state and federal prosecutor, said outside of court: "At no time in my entire career have I witnessed such a spectacle as two seasoned FBI agents simultaneously afflicted with an inability to recall significant events."

Al Qaeda In Lodi 'Unlikely' (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

An FBI agent in the terrorism case testifies for the defense that an informant's claim wasn't credible.

SACRAMENTO — Within weeks after an Oregon convenience store clerk told the FBI he had seen Al Qaeda's No. 2 leader worshipping at a Lodi, Calif., mosque, agents determined the report was "highly unlikely," according to testimony Wednesday in a Northern California terrorism case.

Despite serious doubts about the information from Pakistani immigrant Naseem Khan in a series of interviews shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, the FBI hired Khan as an undercover operative, paying him nearly $230,000 in salary and expenses to secretly infiltrate the Lodi Muslim community from 2001 until 2005.

Khan, a key witness in the terrorism case against a Lodi father and son, shocked a federal courtroom here earlier this month when he testified that he had seen Al Qaeda leader Ayman Zawahiri — the man believed to be behind the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania — in Lodi in 1998 and 1999.

Most terrorism experts believe Zawahiri did not travel to the United States after 1995.

Sacramento FBI Agent Rachel Pifer testified Wednesday that a quick check of Khan's assertion showed that it was probably false.

"I thought the probability that he saw Zawahiri during this period of time was probably pretty slim," Pifer said. But Pifer also said the agency decided to make him an informant because he appeared sincere, if mistaken. Defense attorneys contend that Khan would never have been hired if he had not made his sensational claim.

The prosecution in the trial of Lodi ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat, 48, and his son Hamid Hayat, 23, rested its case Tuesday with satellite photographs of what the government says is a terrorist training camp in Pakistan that the son attended in late 2003. Hamid Hayat is charged with "providing material support to terrorism" by attending the camp. Both men are charged with lying to the FBI.

Hoping to impeach Khan's key testimony by showing that he lied in his very first meetings with FBI agents, defense attorneys called to the stand Pifer, who was Khan's handler in 2001-2002, and Eric Barnhart, who initially contacted Khan on Oct. 17, 2001.

"The problem is that they continued to use an informant they didn't believe," defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said.

Pakistani Militant Leader Is Beaten (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

Fazlur Rehman Khalil, an ally of Osama bin Laden, was dragged from a mosque by assailants who held him for five hours, aides say.

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Gunmen on Wednesday attacked and seriously injured a longtime ally of Osama bin Laden whom U.S. authorities have linked to an alleged terrorist sleeper cell in California.

Fazlur Rehman Khalil, a signatory to Bin Laden's 1998 declaration of war on the United States and its allies, was severely beaten by eight armed men, supporters said.

The assailants dragged Khalil and his driver from a mosque in Tarnol, about three miles northwest of Islamabad, Pakistan's capital, as they attended evening prayers, said his spokesman, Sultan Zia.

Khalil is a former leader of Harkat Mujahedin, a militant group linked to Al Qaeda that he founded as Harkat Ansar to fight Soviet forces in Afghanistan in the 1980s. The U.S. labeled Khalil's group a terrorist organization in 1997, but it has continued its anti-Western jihad, or holy war, under the new name, Jamiat ul Ansar.

Khalil's attackers held him for five hours, tying a rope around his neck and beating him with rifle butts before dumping him in front of a mosque on Islamabad's outskirts, his spokesman said. "He was left in a very serious condition with a severe head injury. However, he has survived with the grace of God," Zia said. Khalil was taken to a hospital in Rawalpindi, adjacent to the capital.

In June, the FBI arrested Lodi, Calif., ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat, 48, and his son Hamid, 23, and charged them with training in one of Khalil's camps in Pakistan for attacks in the U.S. The men are on trial in a Sacramento court. The prosecution rested its case Tuesday.

Khalil co-signed Bin Laden's 1998 fatwa, or religious edict, that declared it "an individual duty" for Muslims to kill American civilians and troops, or their allies, anywhere they could be found in the world.

Bin Laden's deputy, Egyptian physician Ayman Zawahiri, and two other Egyptian and Pakistani extremists also signed the declaration by the so-called World Islamic Front for Jihad against the Jews and the Crusaders.

That same year, then-President Clinton ordered an attack with Tomahawk cruise missiles on targets in Afghanistan to kill Bin Laden after Al Qaeda attacks on two U.S. embassies in East Africa left at least 224 people dead. The strikes also targeted Khalil's camps near the eastern Afghan town of Khowst.

Intelligence assessments concluded that the missile strikes missed Bin Laden by a few hours, but Khalil claimed several of his fighters were killed in the airstrikes.

In testimony before the 9/11 Commission in 2004, Clinton's national security advisor, Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, said an undisclosed number of agents from the Pakistani military's Inter-Services Intelligence agency also died in the strikes on the camps. The powerful ISI was long associated with Khalil and other militant groups.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf banned Khalil's militant group in 2001, after he ended support for the Taliban regime in neighboring Afghanistan and joined the U.S.-led war on terrorism after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Pakistani authorities arrested Khalil in 2004 when he was accused of aiding militants crossing into Afghanistan to attack U.S.-led forces.

He was detained at least two more times but was released each time under what Pakistan's government insisted was close supervision to ensure he didn't engage in militant activities.

As late as 2004, Khalil continued to raise funds and rally militants to wage jihad against the U.S. in a magazine called Al Hilal, published from his headquarters, in a mosque next to a school and across from an army base in Rawalpindi.

A November 2003 edition of the magazine featured an advertisement on the back page, announcing the "All-Pakistan Training Convention of Jamiat ul Ansar Activists," at Khalil's headquarters.

Times special correspondent Zaidi reported from Islamabad and staff writer Watson from New Delhi.

Feds Say Smuggling Ring Helped Fund Hezbollah (FREEP)

By JOE SWICKARD, FREE PRESS STAFF WRITER

Detroit Free Press, March 30, 2006

A smuggling ring operating in Michigan helped fund Hezbollah with profits from bootlegged cigarettes, counterfeit tax stamps, phony Viagra tablets and hijacked toilet paper, according to a federal indictment unsealed in Detroit on Wednesday.

The indictment, issued almost two years ago, names 18 men and alleges the leaders were bound together by their support of Hezbollah. Federal authorities say the men levied a surcharge on the cigarettes they smuggled as a tax on behalf of the organization, which is characterized as a terrorist group by the U.S. government.

They were indicted on charges of being part of a global racketeering conspiracy.

Ten of the suspects have been arrested or are expected to surrender to federal officials. The others are believed to be outside the United States.

Arrested Wednesday morning by the Detroit Joint Terrorism Task Force were: Karim Hassan Nasser, 37, of Windsor; Fadi Mohamad-Musbah Hammoud, 33, of Dearborn; Majid Mohamad Hammoud, 39, of Dearborn Heights; Jihad Hammoud, 47, of Dearborn; Youssef Aoun Bakri, 36, of Dearborn Heights; Ali Najib Berjaoui, 39, of Dearborn; Mohammed Fawzi Zeidan, 41, of Canton; Imad Majed Hamadeh, 51, of Dearborn Heights and Adel Isak, 37, of Sterling Heights.

Theodore Schenk, 73, of Miami Beach, is expected to voluntarily surrender for arraignment on April 10.

The gang's operations, according to U.S. Attorney's office, stretched from the Detroit area to New York, North Carolina, the Ivory Coast, China, Lebanon, Brazil and Paraguay.

18 Charged In Smuggling Case (DEN)

Detroit News, March 30, 2006

U.S. attorney says group illegally brought in cigarettes, fake Viagra to raise funds for Hezbollah.

DETROIT -- The U.S. Attorney's Office on Wednesday indicted 18 people it alleged took part in a multimillion-dollar international conspiracy to smuggle cigarettes, counterfeit Viagra and other goods to raise money for the Mideast terrorist group Hezbollah.

The tobacco-smuggling operation was based in Dearborn and shipped up to $500,000 a week worth of untaxed and low-tax cigarettes, according to a grand jury indictment unsealed Wednesday in federal court in Detroit. Part of the fundraising effort also involved the sale of counterfeit Viagra shipped from China and Eastern Europe, the indictment alleges.

"The enterprise operated from Lebanon, Canada, Brazil, Paraguay, China, North Carolina, Florida and the Dearborn, Mich., area, perpetrating crimes in the states of Michigan, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, North Carolina and West Virginia (and points in between)," the indictment alleges.

The federal government estimates the state of Michigan lost $20 million in taxes as a result of the smuggling. There is no estimate of how much money went to Hezbollah, officials said.

Some smuggled cigarettes were supplied by Cattaraugus Indian Reservation residents near Irving, N.Y., the indictment alleges. Also, thousands of cartons were bought after they were stolen from the R.J. Reynolds tobacco company in Kentucky, the indictment alleges.

Tens of thousands of generic virility tablets were sold as if they were name-brand Viagra manufactured by Pfizer, the indictment alleges.

The alleged scheme, operated from 1996 to 2004, also involved the manufacture and purchase of counterfeit stamps placed on cigarette packages to show taxes had been paid on them.

"This indictment represents a major effort of our office," U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said.

Though no specific terrorism counts were part of the indictment, Murphy said the case is a key one in his agency's fight against what has become its No. 1 priority. Hezbollah, a group founded in 1982 to fight the Israeli occupation in southern Lebanon, is seen as a legitimate resistance force by many in Lebanon and elsewhere, but is deemed a foreign terrorist organization by the State Department.

The smuggled cigarettes were sometimes subject to a "resistance tax," which customers said would be sent to Hezbollah, the indictment alleges.

Imad Hamad, Michigan regional director of the American Anti-Discrimination Committee, said he objects to the stamp of terrorism being routinely placed on criminal cases involving Arab-Americans or people of Muslim faith.

"An indictment does not mean a conviction," Hamad said.

Nine men were arraigned in U.S. District Court in Detroit on racketeering charges Wednesday. The charges could bring up 20 years in prison and fines of up to $250,000 for each accused. All but two were released on unsecured bonds and ordered to surrender their passports. A 10th man, Theodore Schenk, 73, of Miami Beach, Fla., is to be arraigned on April 10. The other eight men indicted are fugitives now living in Canada, Lebanon or elsewhere outside the country, Murphy said.

"The family is denying everything," said Maurice Herskovic, a lawyer for Imad Majed Hamadeh, 51, of Dearborn Heights, one of the men accused in the alleged conspiracy and arrested Wednesday. Friends and relatives of the men who attended the arraignment declined to comment.

Among those arraigned were three Hammoud brothers: Fadi Mohamad-Musbah Hammoud, also known as Fadi Musbah Hammoud, 33, of Dearborn; Majid Mohamad Hammoud, also known as Mike Hammoud, 39, of Dearborn Heights; and Jihad Hammoud, also known as Jay Hammoud, 47, of Dearborn. A fourth brother, Imad Mohamad-Musbah Hammoud, also known as Jacob Hammoud, 37, formerly of Dearborn, is a key figure in the conspiracy and a fugitive now believed to be living in Lebanon, assistant U.S. Attorney Kenneth Chadwell told the court.

Also arraigned Wednesday were Karim Hassan Nasser, 37, of Windsor; Youssef Aoun Bakri, 36, of Dearborn Heights; Ali Najib Berjaoui, 39, of Dearborn; Mohamad Fawzi Zeidan, 41, of Canton Township; and Adel Isak, 37, of Sterling Heights.

Indicted, but not yet arraigned, in addition to Imad Hammoud, were Hassan Ali Al-Mosawi, 49, of Lebanon; Hassan Hassan Nasser, 36, of Windsor; Ali Ahmad Hammoud, 64, of Lebanon, who is an uncle of the Hammoud brothers; Karim Hassan Abbas, 37, formerly of Dearborn; Hassan Mohamad Srour, 30, of Montreal; Naji Hassan Alawie, 44, of Windsor; and Abdel-Hamid Sinno, 52, of Montreal.

U.S. Breaks Up Michigan-based Smuggling Ring That Sent Profits To Hezbollah (CP)

Canadian Press, March 30, 2006

DETROIT (CP) - Federal authorities said Wednesday they have broken up a smuggling ring that sent some of its profits to the Lebanese guerrilla group Hezbollah.

Eighteen people have been indicted in the Michigan-based ring, which sold contraband cigarettes, counterfeit Zig-Zag rolling papers, and counterfeit Viagra, U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said in a statement.

Nine of the suspects, from the Detroit and Windsor, Ont., areas, were arrested Wednesday on an April 2004 indictment that had been sealed by court order. A Miami Beach, Fla., man was to surrender in April, and authorities were seeking eight others who now live out of the country.

The suspect arrested in Windsor was identified as Karim Hassan Nasser, 37. Also named in the indictment, but not arrested, were Hassan Hassan Nasser, 36, and Naji Hassan Alawie, 44, of Windsor and Hassan Mohamad Srour, 30, and Abdel-Hamid Sinno, 52, of Montreal.

The indictment alleges that from 1996 to 2004, the group ran a multimillion-dollar cigarette-trafficking ring out of Dearborn. It purchased low-taxed or untaxed cigarettes from North Carolina or a New York Indian reservation and resold them in Michigan and New York, making profits by evading state cigarette taxes, prosecutors said.

Sometimes the group made counterfeit state tax stamps to make it appear as if the state taxes had been paid, authorities said.

Some members charged a tax on the cigarettes to fund Hezbollah, which has been classified as a terrorist group by the federal government, the statement said. They also solicited money for Hezbollah's program to support the families of those killed in suicide bombings and other terrorist operations, the statement said.

US Charges 19 With Selling Smuggled Cigarettes To Aid Hezbollah (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 30, 2006

US prosecutors have charged 19 people with trafficking in smuggled cigarettes and other contraband and using some of the profits to aid designated terrorist organization Hezbollah.

The indictment, which was unsealed Wednesday following the arrest of nine people in Michigan and Canada, alleges that a Dearborn, Michigan man ran a multi-million dollar a year contraband cigarette trafficking organization which also dealt in stolen and counterfeit goods.

Some members of the enterprise charged a "Resistance Tax", a set amount over the black market price of contraband cigarettes, which their customers were told would go to Hezbollah, the justice department said in a statement.

The US has officially labelled the Lebanese Shiite militia Hezbollah a terror organization.

The traffickers also solicited money from cigarette customers for the orphans of martyrs program run by Hezbollah in Southern Lebanon to support the families of persons killed in Hezbollah suicide and other operations, the statement said.

"Fighting terrorism and keeping our citizens safe from its reach are the number one priorities of this office," US Attorney Stephen Murphy said in a statement.

"We will use all of the legal tools available to us to disrupt criminal activity that funds terrorist organizations."

The enterprise operated from Lebanon, Canada, China, Brazil, Paraguay and the United States, and its members were bound together by their shared Lebanese heritage, blood relations, allegiance to Hezbollah and "a common purpose of generating large sums of cash illegally," the indictment said.

The criminal organization operated between 1996 and 2002. One leader pleaded guilty in 2003 in federal district court in Detroit to racketeering and providing material support to Hezbollah.

He was not named in the latest indictment, which was returned by a federal grand jury on April 14, 2004 and was sealed pursuant until Wednesday.

Specter: Censure Could Reach Floor (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) on Wednesday left open the possibility that Sen. Russ Feingold's (D-Wis.) bill to censure President Bush could get its day before the full Senate, a move certain to ignite an intense partisan showdown with election-year stakes.

Specter said he doesn't know how the controversial resolution will play out before his Judiciary Committee, but suggested it could be brought to the floor under a rare procedural move. The panel could vote to defeat the bill, but send it to the floor anyway with an unfavorable recommendation.

"I think this one may well be the exception" to regular order, Specter said. "We'll have a hearing on it. We'll take in do course what the committee action will be."

Feingold's motion seeks to censure President Bush for authorizing what the Wisconsin Democrat believes is an illegal domestic wiretapping program and then misleading the public about its existence. The highly charged measure has given Republicans a new rallying cry against Democrats even as the minority claims to be making headway with the public on national security matters.

The Judiciary Committee is expected to hold a hearing on Feingold's bill Friday. Specter reiterated Wednesday that he plans to keep to that schedule, despite some suggestion earlier in the week that it might be postponed.

"Friday is a work day for me," Specter said. "I'll be here. We'll have a hearing."

Feingold said Wednesday he still believes censuring Bush over the wiretapping program is "a modest approach to a very serious constitutional crisis." He said he is ready for the hearing, and would welcome floor consideration even if it comes without the backing of the Judiciary panel, but noted "It is an unusual step."

A Senate GOP aide said: "Certainly this is an issue where all Senators should go on record."

Only two other Senators, Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) and Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), have signed on to the bill so far.

Many Democrats have argued the move is premature, especially at a time when the Senate is seeking to fully investigate the surveillance program. Privately, some also fear the bill goes to far and could curb Democrats' momentum to make gains as Republicans drop in the polls.

Feingold said that even if his bill doesn't advance this year, he's not going to give up: "If censure doesn't succeed this time, we'll come back again next year."

Bill Would Speed Challenge To Surveillance (NYT)

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 29 — Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, introduced a bill Wednesday that would put lawsuits challenging the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program on a fast track to the Supreme Court.

With Congress and the Bush administration at odds over the legality of eavesdropping on Americans without court warrants, the legislation could produce a timely ruling by the court on the program's constitutionality, Mr. Schumer said.

"We have a system of checks and balances," he said, "and, in this case, when the stakes are so high, the Supreme Court should be the ultimate check."

The bill would permit lawsuits by scholars, journalists and others who assert that they have refrained from calls or e-mail messages to Iraq, Afghanistan and other countries because of "a reasonable fear" of N.S.A. eavesdropping.

Such suits would be heard by a panel of three federal judges, whose decision could be appealed immediately to the Supreme Court.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Area Still Unprepared For Terror Attacks, Senate Panel Is Told (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Nearly five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the Washington region still lacks a strategic plan to guide preparations for any future attacks or to effectively spend hundreds of millions of homeland security dollars, federal and local officials told a U.S. Senate panel yesterday.

The lack of a comprehensive regionwide communication system was repeatedly cited by senators as a case of poor planning and coordination. For example, Prince George's County does not have radios that are fully compatible with neighboring jurisdictions.

An oversight panel for the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs took emergency response officials from the District, Maryland, Virginia and the federal government to task for bureaucratic foot-dragging and a lack of agreement on a long-term plan for protecting millions of residents in the region.

"What do we have today? What's in place today?" asked Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Local homeland security officials did not give a definitive answer. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, they said, strategies have been developed that make the region better prepared to deal with attacks, but they realize that more needs to be done.

"That's not too good after all these years, I have to tell you," Warner said.

Senators questioned why the Capital Region Homeland Security Strategic Plan has not been completed. The plan was promised last September but will not be available until August at the earliest, officials said. The plan would establish goals and priorities for enhancing disaster response and for efficiently spending federal preparedness dollars.

"Six months since the proposed release date, the region has yet to release a final version of the strategic plan. This is unacceptable," said Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio), chairman of the subcommittee on oversight, which held the hearing.

Yesterday was not the first time that lawmakers expressed frustration over the pace and progress of emergency planning in the region. Although the Washington area is designated as high-risk, last year it had not spent $120 million of the federal anti-terrorism grants it received from 2002 to 2004. Officials said yesterday they have boosted the spending rate.

Warner and other senators said the poor federal response to Hurricane Katrina and the confusion and lack of communication when a small plane violated the District's airspace in May underscored the need for effective regional coordination.

Edward D. Reiskin, the District's deputy mayor for public safety and justice, assured the panel that local jurisdictions are prepared to respond to individual emergencies.

"If a big, bad thing happens, we have a response plan," he said after the hearing. "That's not at all what is the issue here. It's about strategic planning and about what is the vision."

Thomas Lockwood, the DHS director for the capital region, said leaders are working hard to come up with a consensus plan. But he said the effort is hampered by fragmented authority among the region's 12 jurisdictions, two states and the District of Columbia, all three branches of the federal government, more than 2,000 nonprofit organizations and numerous regional business and civic groups. Nearly three dozen police departments operate in the District alone.

Lockwood said regional officials are making slow but steady progress on crafting the plan.

"The consensus process around the details takes much longer to do," he said, but "if you do it right, it's going to last."

Lockwood and Reiskin, along with Robert P. Crouch, Virginia's preparedness director, and Dennis R. Schrader, Maryland's homeland security director, said much has been accomplished in recent months.

They said enhanced cooperation with military and aviation officials has dramatically improved responses to airspace incursions. Also, additional gear has been purchased so that firefighters in the region could continue functioning if their original gear became contaminated. In addition, the region has developed an area-wide electronic surveillance system for early detection of epidemics and a plan for dealing with large numbers of casualties.

Officials are working on a secure, compatible communication network that would link local officials in an emergency. There is also a cache of 1,250 compatible radios that could be distributed to Prince George's or other jurisdictions during an incident.

But a detailed strategic plan is still vital, experts said. The problems encountered during the Katrina disaster highlighted the need for detailed evacuation plans, especially when many jurisdictions and agencies are involved.

In testimony yesterday, William O. Jenkins Jr., director of homeland security issues for the Government Accountability Office, was asked whether local officials can really know whether they are adequately prepared without such a plan.

"In a word, no," he said.

Lapses In Cargo Screening Uncovered (CSMonitor)

By Alexandra Marks

Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK - All it took were some forged documents to "smuggle" into the US enough nuclear material to make a "dirty" bomb - the kind that mixes radioactive material with conventional explosives to cause extra damage.

In a government sting, US investigators twice managed to slip the illicit materials across America's border, once at a point of entry from Canada and another time from Mexico. And that was after border agents in both instances detected the presence of the nuclear material, but were duped by Nuclear Regulatory Commission documents the investigators had faked.

Their ability to sneak nuclear material into the US has led General Accountability Office investigators to conclude that the nation needs to do much more to improve nuclear-detection and enforcement at its borders. Between 1993 and 2004, the GAO notes, there were 662 confirmed cases of illicit trafficking of radiological materials around the world - a sure sign that demand for such materials is unabated.

This week in Washington, senators on both sides of the aisle agreed with the GAO assessment. Though acknowledging some improvements in border security since 9/11, they took to task the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) for not doing a better job of protecting the nation from radiological threats.

"The ability to identify radioactive source material as it crosses our borders is meaningless if those intending to harm us can acquire counterfeit documents and transport radioactive material into our country," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota at a hearing of the Permanent Committee on Investigations on Tuesday. "The Nuclear Regulatory Commission must find a way to change its pre-9/11 mind-set in our post-9/11 world." A lot to keep track of DHS's Customs and Border Protection (CPB), working in conjunction with the NRC, is responsible for keeping illicit radiological materials out of the country, and the challenge is enormous. Each day CPB processes 64,000 containers coming into the US by truck, ship, and rail cars; 365,000 vehicles; and more than 1.1 million people at 380 border crossings, according to the GAO.

Since 9/11, DHS has spent $286 million to deploy radiation detectors, called radiation portal monitors.

The GAO report released Tuesday found that 40 percent of the cargo coming into the US is currently screened. Moreover, the technology in use is inefficient, and the goal of deploying enough monitors to screen all cargo for radiological material by 2009 probably won't be met because of bureaucratic delays, it reports. The $1.3 billion program is also expected to cost as much as $340 million more than planned. That's because the new generation of radiological monitors - which are more efficient - cost between $330,000 and $460,000 each, while today's detectors cost between $50,000 and $60,000 apiece.

"This is not getting the attention it deserves from the leadership at the department," says Michael Greenberger, director of the University of Maryland's Center for Health and Homeland Security. "The only way you get projects like this off the ground, running effectively, and implemented quickly is with a strong driving force at the top of the department, and that just isn't there."

It was a "Pyrrhic victory," Professor Greenberger says, that border patrol agents successfully identified the material smuggled in during the undercover operation, only to be duped by false documents from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

The NRC works in conjunction with Homeland Security officials to prevent illicit radioactive materials from entering the country. NRC: 'We've imposed greater controls'

The amount of radioactive material smuggled in by GAO investigators was not enough to create a dirty bomb, says David McIntyre, NRC spokesman, disputing the GAO's contention. If it had been enough, he says, more stringent licensing of the materials entering the country would have been required. He also took exception to Senator Coleman's characterization of the NRC as having a "pre-9/11 mind-set."

"We have obviously taken the security of radioactive material very seriously, 24/7 since 9/11," says Mr. McIntyre. "We have imposed greater controls, paperwork, and licensing requirements on the highest-risk sources that would cause the most contamination, injury, and the most difficult cleanup from a radiological standpoint."

Still, he acknowledges, more must be done. The NRC is now working with CPB to create a database that can be accessed 24 hours a day, so that border patrol agents can verify the validity of NRC licenses and other documents. The new system is expected to be operational within 30 days, says CPB spokeswoman Suzanne Trevino. DHS is sticking by its deadline to screen 100 percent of the cargo coming into the US by 2009, she adds.

"Our roll-out schedule is continuing at a quickened pace, and we expect to have significantly more monitors and detection equipment on line in the coming months," she says.

Ground Zero Still Lacks An Agreement On Rebuilding (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

An agreement on a major realignment of the rebuilding effort at ground zero continued to elude government officials and the developer Larry A. Silverstein yesterday, even as the Port Authority board planned to meet today to discuss the matter.

Sporadic talks continued into the evening with the hope of finding a framework for a deal that would allow construction of the Freedom Tower, the largest of five towers planned for the site, to begin next month. A new arrangement, officials say, would also allow the rebuilding of the entire 16-acre site to move more quickly.

"Talks are continuing," said Joanna Rose, a spokeswoman for Gov. George E. Pataki.

Governor Pataki has taken the lead in dealing with Mr. Silverstein, who leased the World Trade Center from the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey six weeks before it was destroyed. But when the governor and Mr. Silverstein began closing in on a tentative deal this week, Port Authority executives, Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg continued questioning many of the financial aspects.

So far, they have withheld their support for fear that the tentative deal would enrich the developer at the Port Authority's expense and fail to ensure that the entire project is completed. For one thing, according to authority executives, Mr. Silverstein, whose annual rent will rise to $125.25 million in July, wants a rent reduction worth as much as $500 million over the length of the lease. City officials and others say that is far too generous.

Yesterday, Governor Corzine, who shares control of the Port Authority with Mr. Pataki, said the financial plans "aren't encouraging to me." He said the final deal should provide about $100 million for the memorial, which is over budget and having trouble raising money.

Mayor Bloomberg has also raised the possibility that Mr. Silverstein would run out of money after building only two of the five towers, then default on his lease and realize hundreds of millions of dollars in profit.

In contrast, Mr. Silverstein continues to insist that he can and will complete the entire job. Officials point out, however, there is only $2.9 billion in insurance money available for the $7 billion project.

In one of a flurry of meetings yesterday, Mr. Bloomberg met with Governor Pataki at state offices on Third Avenue to resolve their differences over the tentative agreement that would transfer control of the Freedom Tower from Mr. Silverstein to the Port Authority. The meeting ended without a resolution, according to state and city officials.

Meanwhile, Pataki officials continued dickering with Mr. Silverstein's representatives. Even if they work out a framework for a deal in time for the board's meeting today, a number of issues would remain, ranging from Mr. Silverstein's share of the infrastructure costs to the plans for a large shopping mall. The authority and Mayor Bloomberg have sought assurances that a final deal would be contingent on resolving these matters quickly.

If Mr. Silverstein sheds the financial responsibility for the Freedom Tower, he would still retain the right to build three towers on the most valuable sites, along Church Street.

Over the last week, the Pataki administration has also sought to shore up support among its six commissioners on the authority board, who share the misgivings of their New Jersey counterparts.

"The pressure was direct," said one New York commissioner, who was granted anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks. "The governor needs to get this done. I told the governor and New Jersey that if the numbers check out, I'd support the deal."

Bush To Iraqis: Time To Get A Government (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Associated Press, March 29, 2006

President Bush expressed frustration Wednesday that Iraqis have so far failed to form a unity government, but he said withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq too early would damage U.S. security.

"I want the Iraqi people to hear I've got great confidence in their capacity to self-govern," Bush said. "I also want the Iraqi people to hear — it's about time you get a unity government going.

"In other words, Americans understand you're newcomers to the political arena. But pretty soon it's time to shut her down and get governing."

The successful creation of a unified central authority remains key to the hoped-for start of an American troop withdrawal this summer. Withdrawing U.S. troops before Iraqi security forces can protect the fragile democracy, however, would yield adverse results, Bush said.

"While it might sound attractive to some, it would have disastrous consequences for American security," Bush said in his third speech this month trying to bolster public support for the war.

If democracy fails, Bush predicted that terrorists would use Iraq as a base to overthrow moderate governments in the Middle East and launch further attacks against the United States.

Bush spoke to Freedom House, an independent organization that supports democracy worldwide, before flying to Cancun, Mexico, to meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Congressional Democrats, meanwhile, proposed a strategy on Wednesday for protecting Americans at home and abroad — an election-year effort aimed at changing public perception that Republicans are stronger on national security.

In the strategy, Democrats vowed to provide U.S. agents with the resources to eliminate Osama bin Laden and ensure a redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq in 2006. They promised to rebuild the military, eliminate the United States' dependence on foreign oil and implement the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

"The president can give all the speeches he wants, but nothing will change the fact that his Iraq policy is wrong," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

"Two weeks ago, he told Americans that Iraqis would control their country by the end of the year. Last week, he told us our troops would be there until at least 2009. These mixed messages from President Bush are taking America in the wrong direction and jeopardizing Iraq's chances for success."

Vice President Dick Cheney said the Democrats' behavior has been inconsistent with what they're now promising to do. Cheney said he did not believe the Democrats had a credible plan for tracking down bin Laden and their plan to move U.S. forces out of Iraq this year would amount to a strategic retreat.

"It makes no sense at all to turn Iraq over to the terrorists," Cheney said on Fox News Radio's "The Tony Snow Show."

Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman, responded: "The vice president's tough-talking rhetoric is no longer credible. The Republican game plan to distort and divide will fail because they can't run on their record. All they have are catchy sound bites."

The United States has been pushing Iraq to speed up the formation of a unity government, seen as the best option to subdue the violence gripping several Iraqi cities.

Hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in sectarian violence since the Feb. 22 bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Political talks remain fragile in a country with deep sectarian differences between Shiites and Sunnis. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has asked one of Iraq's most prominent Shiite politicians to seek the withdrawal of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's contentious nomination for a second term.

Bush countered critics who wonder whether toppling Saddam Hussein caused the current divisions and instability.

"In fact, much of the animosity and violence we now see is the legacy of Saddam Hussein," Bush said. "He is a tyrant who exacerbated sectarian divisions to keep himself in power."

Bush Blames Saddam For Strife (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

President Bush yesterday blamed sectarian violence in Iraq on Saddam Hussein and his legacy of oppression, but said freedom and democracy will win if all the opposing political factions can put aside their differences and form a government.

In his third speech this month to reassure Americans that his war plan is working, the president took on those who charge that the U.S. occupation of Iraq has created an unprecedented insurgency. In a question-and-answer period at Freedom House, a 65-year-old organization that supports expansion of freedom, Mr. Bush faced down critics.

"Today, some Americans ask whether removing Saddam caused the divisions and instability we're now seeing. In fact, much of the animosity and violence we now see is the legacy of Saddam Hussein," Mr. Bush said.

Iraq, he added, is "a nation that is physically and emotionally scarred by three decades of Saddam's tyranny, and these wounds will take time to heal."

He opposed the idea that sectarian violence was created solely by the U.S.-led war to oust the dictator, who he said aggravated divisions among rival sects in Iraq through deliberate policies of ethnic cleansing and targeted violence. The animosity that was created during three decades remains, and insurgents are using the same techniques to sow division, such as bombing mosques.

The president did not blame all of Iraq's strife on Saddam. He pushed for sectarian leaders to move forward with creating a unity government and taking responsibility for the nation's future.

"I also want the Iraqi people to hear: It's about time you get a unity government going. In other words, Americans understand you're newcomers to the political arena, but pretty soon it's time to shut her down and get governing," Mr. Bush said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, accused Mr. Bush of sending "mixed messages."

"The president can give all the speeches he wants, but nothing will change the fact that his Iraq policy is wrong," Mr. Reid said. "Two weeks ago, he told the American people that Iraqis would control their country by the end of the year. But last week, he told us our troops would be there until at least 2009."

Mr. Bush said the U.S. must stay the course despite recent setbacks and outbursts of violence in Iraq.

Referring to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the president said winning in Iraq is crucial to homeland security. He took aim at Democratic opponents on Capitol Hill who advocate immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops.

"While it might sound attractive to some, it would have disastrous consequences for American security," he said.

In nearly every speech on Iraq since November, Mr. Bush acknowledged that "there will be more tough fighting ahead with difficult days that test the patience and the resolve of our country."

USA Today, March 30, 2006

President Bush said a U.S. pullout from Iraq before the job is done would be a "disaster" that would embolden the global terrorist movement and make the United States less secure. "Americans will leave Iraq, but we will not retreat from Iraq," he said in an 89-minute speech and question-and-answer session at Freedom House in Washington.

It was Bush's third speech this month to boost flagging public support for the war. His comments came the same day Democrats unveiled their national security agenda. It included "eliminating" Osama bin Laden and "redeployment of U.S. forces" from Iraq this year, but it did not provide details. — Richard Benedetto

Republicans who are leading efforts in the House of Representatives to write a budget for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 dropped President Bush's proposed cuts in Medicare, Medicaid, crop subsidies and other politically sensitive programs. Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, fashioned a $2.8 trillion plan that backs Bush's call for a 7% increase in defense spending, not including Iraq war costs, and assumes $226 billion in additional tax cuts over five years. Nussle credited earlier tax cuts with reviving an economy that was in recession when Bush took office.

Democrats said the plan would create deficits of $348 billion in 2007 and more than $1 trillion through 2011. Rep. John Spratt, D-S.C., said there's "no real plan or prospect of balancing the budget."

The Homeland Security Department plans to collect digital fingerprints of merchant sailors at U.S. ports, said Robert Mocny of the department's visitor technology program. He said immigration agents at major cargo terminals would use hand-held scanners to photograph and fingerprint sailors. The data would be checked against 1.5 million names on U.S. lists of terrorism suspects, fugitives and immigration violators. Mocny spoke in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, at a meeting on biometric security. Biometrics involves unique human characteristics such as fingerprints and irises.

Beleaguered Premier Warns U.S. To Stop Interfering In Iraq's Politics (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 29 — Facing growing pressure from the Bush administration to step down, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari of Iraq vigorously asserted his right to stay in office on Wednesday and warned the Americans against interfering in the country's political process.

Mr. Jaafari also defended his recent political alliance with the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, now the prime minister's most powerful backer, saying in an interview that Mr. Sadr and his militia, now thousands strong, are a fact of life in Iraq and need to be accepted into mainstream politics.

Mr. Jaafari said he would work to fold the country's myriad militias into the official security forces and ensure that recruits and top security ministers abandoned their ethnic or sectarian loyalties.

The Iraqi government's tolerance of militias has emerged as the greatest source of contention between American officials and Shiite leaders like Mr. Jaafari, with the American ambassador contending in the past week that militias are killing more people than the Sunni Arab-led insurgency. Dozens of bodies, garroted or with gunshots to the head, turn up almost daily in Baghdad, fueling sectarian tensions that are pushing Iraq closer to full-scale civil war.

The prime minister made his remarks in an hourlong interview at his home, a Saddam Hussein-era palace with an artificial lake at the heart of the fortified Green Zone. He spoke in a languorous manner, relaxing in a black pinstripe suit in a dim ground-floor office lined with Arabic books like the multivolume "World of Civilizations."

"There was a stand from both the American government and President Bush to promote a democratic policy and protect its interests," he said, sipping from a cup of boiled water mixed with saffron. "But now there's concern among the Iraqi people that the democratic process is being threatened."

"The source of this is that some American figures have made statements that interfere with the results of the democratic process," he added. "These reservations began when the biggest bloc in Parliament chose its candidate for prime minister."

Mr. Jaafari is at the center of the deadlock in the talks over forming a new government, with the main Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular blocs in the 275-member Parliament staunchly opposing the Shiite bloc's nomination of Mr. Jaafari for prime minister.

Senior Shiite politicians said Tuesday that the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, had weighed in over the weekend, telling the leader of the Shiite bloc that President Bush did not want Mr. Jaafari as prime minister. That was the first time the Americans had openly expressed a preference for the post, the politicians said, and it showed the Bush administration's acute impatience with the political logjam.

Relations between Shiite leaders and the Americans have been fraying for months and reached a crisis point after a bloody assault on a Shiite mosque compound Sunday night by American and Iraqi forces.

Mr. Jaafari said in the interview that Ambassador Khalilzad had visited him on Wednesday morning but did not indicate that he should abandon his job.

American reactions to the political process can be seen as either supporting or interfering in Iraqi decisions, said Mr. Jaafari, the leader of the Islamic Dawa Party and a former exile. "When it takes the form of interference, it makes the Iraqi people worried," he said. "For that reason, the Iraqi people want to ensure that these reactions stay in a positive frame and do not cross over into interference that damages the results of the democratic process."

According to the Constitution, the largest bloc in Parliament, in this case the religious Shiites, has the right to nominate a prime minister. Mr. Jaafari won that nomination in a secret ballot last month among the blocs' 130 Shiite members of Parliament. But his victory was a narrow one: he won by only one vote after getting the support of Mr. Sadr, who controls 32 seats.

That alliance has raised concern among the Americans that Mr. Jaafari will do little to rein in Mr. Sadr, who led two fierce rebellions against the American military in 2004. Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, rampaged in Baghdad after the Feb. 22 bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra and after a series of car bomb explosions on March 12 in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood. The violence left hundreds dead and Sunni mosques burnt to the ground.

After the secret ballot last month, Sadr politicians said Mr. Jaafari had agreed to meet all their demands in exchange for their votes. Mr. Sadr has been pushing for control of service ministries like health, transportation and electricity.

Mr. Jaafari did not say in the interview what deals he had made, but he insisted that engagement with the cleric's movement was needed for the stability of Iraq. He said he had disagreed with L. Paul Bremer III, the former American proconsul, when Mr. Bremer barred Mr. Sadr and some Sunni Arab groups from the Iraqi Governing Council in 2003.

"The delay in getting them to join led to the situation of them becoming violent elements," he said.

"I look at them as part of Iraq's de facto reality, whether some of the individual people are negative or positive," he said.

Mr. Jaafari used similar language when laying out his policy toward militias: that inclusion rather than isolation was the proper strategy.

The Iraqi government will try "to meld them, take them, take their names and make them join the army and police forces."

"And they will respect the army or police rather than the militias."

Recruiting militia members into the Iraqi security forces has not been a problem under the Jaafari government. The issue has been getting those fighters to act as impartial defenders of the state rather than as political partisans. The police forces are stocked with members of the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, an Iranian-trained militia, who still exhibit obvious loyalties to their political party leaders.

Police officers have performed poorly when ordered to contain militia violence, and they even cruise around in some cities with images of Mr. Sadr or other religious politicians on their squad cars.

There is growing evidence of uniformed death squads operating out of the Shiite-run Interior Ministry, and Ambassador Khalilzad has been lobbying the Iraqis to place more neutral figures in charge of the Interior and Defense Ministries in the next government. That has caused friction with Shiite leaders, and some have even accused the ambassador of implicitly backing the Sunni Arab-led insurgency.

But Mr. Jaafari said he supported the Americans' goal.

"We insist that the ministers in the next cabinet, especially the ministers of defense and the interior, shouldn't be connected to any militias, and they should be nonsectarian," he said. "They should be experienced in security work. They should keep the institutions as security institutions, not as political institutions. They should work for the central government."

In the first two years of the war, Mr. Jaafari emerged as one of the most popular politicians in Iraq, especially compared with other exiles like Ahmad Chalabi, the former Pentagon favorite. A doctor by training and well-versed in the Koran, Mr. Jaafari comes from a prominent family in Karbala, the Shiite holy city. But since taking power last spring, Mr. Jaafari has come under widespread criticism for failing to stamp out the insurgency and promoting hard-line pro-Shiite policies.

Extra Troops' Exit Contingent On Iraqi Unity (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Top U.S. commanders in Iraq will not recommend the next stage of U.S. troop withdrawals before the Iraqis form a new unity government, say senior defense officials.

The officials also said that a 700-soldier reinforcement unit, brought into Iraq from Kuwait for the annual Shi'ite pilgrimage, will remain until the unity government is in place, or at least announced.

"I don't think you'll see a recommendation before then," said one official, who asked not to be named.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Army Gen. George Casey, his top commander in Iraq, have spoken publicly of anticipating more reductions this year below the current 132,000 troops. U.S. strength in Iraq peaked at 160,000 military personnel during the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections.

But two sources said those expected reductions will not be recommended before a unity government is formed and that Gen. Casey has yet to make a formal proposal to the defense secretary, although the two talk frequently via secure teleconferences.

"Right now, he is not in a position to make that assessment," the official said. This official declined to discuss specific troop scenarios, but other defense sources have mentioned 100,000 as the level they would like to see announced before year's end.

Forming a new government and maturing the 240,000-strong Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) are the principal factors driving talks of troop reduction. Shi'ites, Sunnis and Kurds resumed negotiations yesterday, but no side is predicting when a unity government will be agreed upon. They face a May deadline, which could be extended.

In that vein, the recent Shi'ite Arbaeen pilgrimage of more than 1 million to holy sites in Karbala and Najaf is being cited by the Pentagon as an example of the ISF's becoming more proficient.

In 2004, insurgents killed more than 120 Iraqis during the trek. Last year, 33 were killed. This year, 12 Iraqis were killed in a religious exercise long banned by Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Muslim who regularly cracked down on Shi'ite towns throughout the south.

"It's estimated that more than a million Shia traveled across the country, across Iraq, for the pilgrimage," Mr. Rumsfeld said Tuesday. "Many slept in tents along the road. Many wore black robes and held banners. Some walked with their children.

"They were thought to be easy and very visible targets for terrorists. ... Iraqi security forces -- benefiting from their increased numbers ... and their additional training and experience -- performed well and took the lead in protecting their fellow Iraqis."

Pentagon officials also think the ISF performed well controlling violence in the aftermath of the Feb. 22 mosque bombing in Samarra. They said, however, that some units, especially the national police, have been infiltrated by militias or insurgents who carry out revenge attacks and put out false reports of U.S. atrocities.

Gen. Casey said on NBC's "Meet the Press" earlier this month that he is doing monthly assessments of the ISF, but has made no decision on when to make the "fairly substantial" reductions that he has predicted.

In Iraq, Frontline Patience Wears Thin (CSM)

By Charles Levinson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

MOSUL, IRAQ - In a middle-class neighborhood on the bank of the Tigris River, Charlie Company's 4th Platoon dismounts from their armored vehicles and starts banging on doors. They're going house to house, talking to residents, looking for information on insurgents in this city of 1.8 million.

While the soldiers' reception varies, one Christian family welcomes them with smiles. But misunderstanding quickly ensues.

"Please don't take our weapon," the mother of four pleads in Arabic when US Army Staff Sgt. Josh Clevenger comes across an AK-47. "We need it to defend ourselves. It is not safe, anything can happen."

As he stands in the living room, Sergeant Clevenger has no intention of confiscating their rifle - nor any comprehension of the woman's plea. With his platoon's lone interpreter elsewhere, he is effectively rendered speechless.

"Your weapon is filled with blanks," Clevenger, from Muncie, Ind., says to the woman, his voice unwittingly rising as he tries to convey helpful information. "These aren't real bullets - they won't protect you."

For US soldiers who don't grasp the language or the culture here, a central part of their mission - generating goodwill and support - remains far more difficult than capturing insurgent leaders. While their officers remain largely on message and outwardly optimistic, many of the front-line men like Clevenger, who patrol "outside the wire" twice daily, say that their patience is wearing thin.

"I don't want to stay here too much longer. The Iraqi Army is getting to where they can get a hold of things now," says Clevenger. "The longer we're here and the more times they attack us, the more they're going to figure out how to better their attacks."

More than a few soldiers of the US Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team stationed in this Sunni-Kurdish city in northern Iraq, shuddered last week when President Bush said total withdrawal of US troops "will be decided by future presidents and future governments of Iraq." Three years after the invasion, many soldiers say it's time to hand over control to Iraqis. Most of those interviewed echoed a recentZogby poll of 944 military respondents throughout Iraq, that found that 72 percent of US troops favor withdrawal within the next year.

"I think we're doing good things here, but I think we need to start pulling it out," Spc. Mathew Merced, a jovial infantryman from Mcinnville, Ore., says, scanning Mosul's al-Karama neighborhood from a trash-strewn rooftop.

"The Iraqi Army here has come a long way in just the short time we've been here."

More than 2,300 US servicemen have lost their lives in the longest US armed conflict since Vietnam. American support for the war, 62 percent three years ago, has dwindled today to just 43 percent, according to a recent CNN/Gallup/USA Today poll. How much longer?

For those soldiers with years left on their contracts, for young fathers, and newlyweds, the prospect of the war dragging on is disconcerting. Divorce rates in the Army have risen at least 25 percent since the war began.

"In the back of your mind you wonder how much longer is this going to go on, how many more times am I going to have to come back over here," says 1st Lt. Michael McCasland of Spokane, Wash., who spent just two weeks with his newborn daughter before returning to Iraq. "There has to be a point when Iraqis take responsibility for their own country."

Compared with much of Iraq, the city of Mosul is relatively calm today, sidestepping the sectarian dueling that is roiling much of the country.

Still, two IEDs struck the battalion's armored eight-wheeled Strykers Sunday, though there were no casualties. In the city's eastern half alone, Lieutenant McCasland's battalion (one of four in the Stryker Brigade operating in Mosul) endures an average of 50 IED attacks each month, and a handful of car bombs.

The insurgents' attacks have grown less effective with time, but now they seem to be adapting, officers say. In recent weeks those attacks have become more sophisticated as some here worry a catastrophic attack could be imminent.

"The enemy has gotten very well- organized and very well-versed in what they're doing, as if they've gotten new leadership in the area," intelligence officer Capt. Mark Awad told a gathering of Iraqi Army and police officers in Mosul Saturday.

While US soldiers are practiced in the art of firepower, the sort of counterinsurgency campaign under way at the moment has demanded a far more nuanced approach to battle. Defeating the insurgency is as much about reaching ordinary Iraqis as it is about capturing terrorists.

"The fight is really for the people and their mind-set," says Lt. Col. Richard Greene of Germantown, Md., the battalion's executive officer. Beanie Babies and candy

Even as they're frustrated at the often-tense relationship with Iraqis, the soldiers here take solace in the swarms of children that come out to greet them wherever they go. Though the children are often after the Beanie Babies and candies that the soldiers dole out, for troops, their response offers much-needed reassurance.

"When we roll into a neighborhood, it's like a parade with all the young kids running out," says Clevenger. "I think we're definitely making a difference here."

But in the leafy front yard of a well-to-do Kurdish family, three women spew vitriol in the face of platoon leader 1st Lt. Raymond Maszarose of Vicksburg, Md. Last year, they say, US troops accidentally killed their father and two of their nephews.

"We hate the Americans," says one of the women, calling herself simply Om Omar. "They destroyed our country. They can't protect this country, can't provide electricity, why'd they come here? It's a nightmare."

The women say their father was caught in the crossfire during a firefight between US soldiers and insurgents. "How do you know it was the Americans that killed him?" Lieutenant Maszarose asks again and again. But it's no use. For these women, the blame lies squarely on US shoulders.

And they are not alone. A recent poll by WorldPublicOpinion.org of 1,150 Iraqis showed that nearly half of all Iraqis and nine out of 10 Sunni Arabs support attacks on US forces.

"We're up to over 2,300 US military deaths and it sucks that they feel like that," says Clevenger.

After the encounter with the angry Kurdish family, members of Maszarose's Charlie Company 4th Platoontake over an Iraqi home for an evening stakeout of an oft-targeted police station. Khaled Saleh, the father whose home has been temporarily commandeered, and his young children sit wearily among them.

As the evening drags on uneventfully, the soldiers complain about new rules of engagement, meant to limit the sort of accidental killings and indiscriminate shootings that can alienate communities overnight. In recent months, they've been ordered to keep their vehicles' rear-mounted machine guns unloaded, to drive slowly down streets that are likely mined with IEDs, and to hunker down in their vehicles when approached by a possible suicide car bomber rather than open fire. Their efforts are unappreciated

To these soldiers, they are bending over backward to keep the peace, and they are confounded that Iraqis don't seem to appreciate that.

"Why do they blame us?" wonders US Army Spc. Brandon Beard, of Arkadelphia, Ark. "The terrorists are wreaking more havoc on this city than we are."

"I don't hate all Arabs just because a few of them blew up the World Trade Center, so why should they hate all US soldiers just because one shot their father?" asks US Army Cpl. Joshua Hedges, of Warrensburg, Mo., a father of three.

The bleary-eyed Saleh looks on uncomprehending. When asked about the US soldiers in his country, and now in his living room, he shrugs, and barks down to his wife to bring another round of tea.

"What can I do?" he wonders. "We adapt and we survive and we give tea to our guests. But I would like an option beside the murderer Saddam Hussein or the lawlessness and humiliation of foreign occupation."

Back on base, Pvt. Isaac Ussery, of Naples, Fla., offers an explanation as he plays Blackhawk Down on a Sony PlayStation.

"Saddam had [things] under control and we don't basically," he says. "Iraq was safe under Saddam. You weren't safe from him, but you were safe from your neighbor and you were safe from Syrian people trying to come in and blow things up."

Despite their stated frustrations, soldiers say they are prepared to keep coming back. Many here have reenlisted for another four years and throughout the Army reenlistment rates are up.

It beats managing a gas station back home, says Private Ussery.

"I expected to be living in tents in the desert," he says after he rescues the virtual downed Blackhawk. "But I got here and I have electricity, heating, air conditioning, Playstation, TV, surround sound. It's not that bad." How US troops see Iraq

According to a Zogby poll of 944 US troops stationed in Iraq:

· 72% said the US should leave Iraq within one year.
· 29% said US forces should leave Iraq immediately.
· 58% said the US mission in Iraq is clear.
· 85% believe the US invaded Iraq to retaliate for 9/11 attacks.
· 24% said a major reason for invading was to establish a model democracy.

The Cost Of Invading Iraq: Imponderables Meet Uncertainties (NYT)

By Alan B. Krueger

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

THE question of whether it was worth invading Iraq is being asked with increasing frequency and fervency.

A Gallup poll this month found that 60 percent of Americans said they did not think it was worth going to war in Iraq, up from 29 percent at the start of the invasion in March 2003.

Fundamentally, deciding whether war is worth it involves weighing the benefits and costs, both tangible and intangible. The many estimates of the cost of the Iraq war that are available are uninformative absent a comparison with the likely benefits, or a comparison with the costs and benefits of the best alternative to invasion.

Unfortunately, cost-benefit comparisons of such weighty issues are more art than science. One problem is that the counterfactual situation — meaning the outcomes that would have occurred had another policy been pursued — cannot be known for sure. In addition, it is often unclear how to value the outcomes of the policy that is pursued.

One of the earliest cost-benefit comparisons was done by Steven J. Davis, Kevin M. Murphy and Robert H. Topel of the University of Chicago on the eve of the invasion in 2003. They explicitly considered a continued policy of containment — enforcing the no-fly zone and other operations to hem in Saddam Hussein — as an alternative to invasion and regime change.

Assuming that containment and invasion would protect the United States equally well, the question of whether invasion is worth it turns on which policy is less costly, after discounting all likely future costs.

Allowing for a 3 percent chance that the Iraqi regime would evolve into a benign government in any future year and a 2 percent real interest rate, the economists reckoned that the cost of pursuing a containment strategy was $258 billion to $380 billion. "This dwarfs any reasonable estimate of U.S. war costs," they wrote at the time. Their anticipated price tag for the war, which they considered conservative, was $125 billion.

Professors Davis, Murphy and Topel have revised their figures in a new National Bureau of Economic Research working paper, "War in Iraq Versus Containment." Their estimated war costs have increased to a range of $410 billion to $630 billion, reflecting reality there.

William D. Nordhaus, an economist at Yale who warned in 2002 that past war cost forecasts had turned out to be too low, said the updated work is "economics at its best and worst — quantifying the almost-unquantifiable."

In the fog of war accounting, one thing is clear: all costs and benefits can be contested as wildly inaccurate — in either direction.

Consider what the cost of containment would have been had the United States not gone to war. The University of Chicago study now says it is in "the range of $350 billion to $700 billion." This range is arguably grossly inflated because it counts virtually all of the American military forces in the Middle East as dedicated to containing Iraq.

While containing Iraq was a central focus, these troops also served many other purposes. They conducted rescue operations in Somalia; performed humanitarian missions in Nigeria, Ethiopia, Eritrea and Jordan; responded to terrorist bombings in Nairobi and Tanzania; and were responsible for military activities in the five Central Asian republics of the former Soviet Union.

Additionally, Iran was considered a greater potential long-term threat than Iraq, according to the official command history. It is hard to believe that the United States would not have a substantial military presence in the region even if Iraq was not regarded as a threat.

Ideally, only incremental costs would be counted in deciding whether something was worth it; that is, the extra costs of resources used to achieve an objective.

Another study of Iraq war costs, by Linda J. Bilmes of Harvard and Joseph E. Stiglitz of Columbia, comes up with an eye-catching estimate of $2.2 trillion, assuming the United States is no longer in Iraq in 2015. This is arguably too high for several reasons. First, it counts future interest payments on the debt created by military spending as well as the direct expenditures. (This is analogous to counting both the sale price of a house and the cost of future mortgage payments as the cost of buying the house.)

Second, it counts elevated military recruitment costs that incorporate a premium for higher risk of death or injury because of the war as well as the predicted direct cost of the deaths and injuries; this is double counting if the risk premium is adequate. Finally, it ascribes a big increase in the price of oil to the war, and, as a result, a loss to the American economy of almost half a trillion dollars.

A menu of cost estimates is thus available, depending on the counterfactual situation that one chooses.

"The question of whether the war was worth it hinges not on budget costs or economic costs," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who until recently was director of the Congressional Budget Office, "but on what do we gain in the way of genuine security and international standing." The costs, he said, were manageable.

The benefits, however, are much harder to quantify than the costs. To Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, "the benefits have been, in fact, very few, beyond the obvious one: the removal of Saddam Hussein." Offsetting that, he said the war "undermined our international legitimacy," "destroyed our credibility" and "tarnished our morality with Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo."

The Chicago economists argue that anticipated improvements in Iraq's living standard, once the country stabilizes, tip the balance in favor of invasion over containment, which in their view had costs that were "in the same ballpark." They also argue that the number of Iraqi fatalities since the invasion is probably no greater than would have been the case under Mr. Hussein.

But even if one accepts all of their estimates, their results implicitly raise another question: Why intervene in Iraq and not a country like Sudan, where genocide and oppression are at least as much an affront as they were in Iraq, and where the cost of intervention and prospects for improving lives may offer a better benefit-to-cost ratio than is likely in Iraq?

Credible estimation of counterfactual outcomes of alternative policies for cost-benefit comparisons has been a hallmark of modern economics. When it comes to judging whether war is worth it, however, cost-benefit analysis is little more than educated guessing by other means. But at least it provides a framework for where to put the guesses.

The Case for Iraq

Seeking to buoy public support for the Iraq war, the Bush administration hopes tens of thousands of boxes of captured Iraqi documents now being made public will buttress their case for invading. On Fox News Talk's Tony Snow Show today, Vice President Cheney predicted that over the next few months, as researchers comb through the records, "we'll see a pretty complete picture that Saddam Hussein did, in fact, deal with some pretty nefarious characters out there. And he was legitimately labeled by our State Department as a state sponsor of terror."

That likely includes dealings with Osama bin Laden, Cheney suggested, while adding that he wasn't making a "hard and fast prediction." In the past, the administration has been embarrassed over suggestions that Iraq aided the 9/11 attackers.

Cheney conceded yesterday that an early report that lead hijacker Atta met with Iraqi intelligence officials in Prague "has been pretty well knocked down." But he said that "that's a separate proposition from the question of whether or not there was some kind of a relationship between the Iraqi government, Iraqi intelligence services and the al Qaeda organization." Conservatives also hope to find evidence that Iraq was actively pursuing development of various weapons of mass destruction. – John D. McKinnon

Gunmen Storm A Baghdad Store, Executing 8 (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 29 — Gunmen in Iraqi commando uniforms burst into an electrical supply shop in Baghdad on Wednesday, rounded up all the employees and riddled them with machine-gun fire, Iraqi officials said.

The attack, which killed eight people and seriously wounded six in the Mansour neighborhood during morning rush hour, provoked an extensive military response, with the Iraqi Army shutting down large swaths of Baghdad.

The shop, the Ibtikar Company, may have been a target because it worked in the past for the American-led occupation government, one of the wounded employees said. The employee, who identified himself only by his first name, Bakar, said that when the gunmen stormed into the shop, they brought a masked cameraman with them to record the killings on videotape.

The gunmen lined up all the employees against a wall and shot them one by one at point-blank range, Bakar said. He survived, he said, because a heavy-set colleague fell on him after he was shot and knocked him to the ground, making it look as if he were dead, too. He said the gunmen drove off afterward.

Despite additional American troops in Baghdad and increased patrols, violence in the capital has continued unchecked. Dozens of bodies are found nearly every morning, and the rate of killings has reached a record of 33 a day.

On Wednesday, at least nine bodies were found in Baghdad apart from the Ibtikar attack. And American military officials said Iraqi soldiers discovered the bodies of 13 people alongside a highway in Baghdad on Tuesday.

Many witnesses have accused Shiite-led police and commando units of running death squads, but the Shiite-led government insists that foreign terrorists in stolen uniforms are the killers. On Wednesday, Iraqi Army units were stopping commando units on the street and questioning them about the shooting at the electrical supply shop, hinting at rising suspicion and tension between the two branches of the security forces.

Also on Wednesday, three Iraqi police officers were killed by a roadside bomb near Kirkuk, a northern Iraqi city that has grown increasingly violent in the past weeks. And seven more people, a mix of police officers and civilians, died in other insurgent attacks.

The Education Ministry issued a warning to students across the country to not accept candy from strangers because it "might contain explosives." Last week, several people were killed after a box of sweets blew up in a Baghdad tea shop.

Still, Iraqi politicians on Wednesday delayed, once again, talks to iron out political differences.

American officials have recently complicated the political situation by insisting that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari step down, according to Iraqi politicians.

Eight Killed, Six Hurt At Baghdad Business (AP)

AP, March 29, 2006

For the third time in as many days, gunmen stormed a Baghdad business Wednesday, this time lining 14 employees against the wall and shooting them all. Eight were killed, and at least 26 others were reported dead in violence elsewhere.

Politicians working to form a new government, meanwhile, canceled their multiparty talks for the day, saying they needed time to consult with their political blocs over the critical issue of what powers the next prime minister would have over security issues.

It was the second time this week political leaders shunned a session meant to overcome the government stalemate that is in its sixth week.

The attack on the al-Ibtikar electronics trading firm began when gunmen drove up in five black BMWs shortly after 8 a.m., said police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq. The attackers set a fire in the office but took no money.

Survivors told police some of the attackers wore police uniforms and said they were intelligence agents of the Interior Ministry, which oversees police. Survivors said the gunmen asked for the company manager, who was not there, and then opened fire on the 14 workers. Six were wounded.

The motive for the attack, the second on a firm in the upscale Mansour neighborhood this week, was not clear, but a key lawmaker blamed al-Qaida or Saddam loyalists.

"These are concentrated efforts to paralyze the country. They are either from al-Qaida or the remnants of Saddam's regime. They want to tell the people that there is no government," said Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman.

The political talks appeared stalled again after a series of meetings over the past two weeks brokered by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad. The major stumbling block is the nomination of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, for a second term.

Al-Jaafari faces deep opposition from Kurdish and Sunni politicians. On behalf of President Bush, Khalilzad has asked other top Shiite leaders for help in persuading al-Jaafari to step aside.

While al-Jaafari was not known to have formally responded to the U.S. request, he said in an interview Wednesday that there was "concern among the Iraqi people that the democratic process is being threatened."

Speaking with The New York Times, he implied the threat arose from what he viewed as the involvement of "some American figures (who) have made statements that interfere with the results of the democratic process."

The United States has been pushing Iraq to speed the formation of a unity government, seen as the best option to subdue the violence gripping several Iraqi cities — and to allow for the start of a U.S. troop withdrawal this summer.

There has been no breakthrough in the government deadlock since results of the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections were certified Feb. 12. Parliament has met only once, in a 40-minute session so new members could be sworn in.

The March 16 meeting, however, set in motion a 60-day clock for electing a president, approving the prime minister and signing off on his cabinet.

Wednesday's attack on the trading company came a day after masked gunmen, again many in uniform, hit a currency exchange and two electronics shops, seized 23 people and made off with tens of thousands of dollars.

"All these operations have one aim: to freeze life in Iraq and sabotage the democratic process. They want to take us back to the dictatorship," said Maj. Gen. Ahmed al-Khafaji, a deputy interior minister. He, too, blamed al-Qaida and said "we will work day and night to arrest them."

Gunmen Target Baghdad Firm, Killing 8 Workers (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

BAGHDAD — Men dressed as police commandos Wednesday killed eight employees of an electronics import company in an upscale neighborhood of Baghdad, the latest in a wave of strikes against businesses in the Iraqi capital.

Interior Ministry officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak with the media, said that witnesses who survived the attack on the Ibtikar trading company provided this account: The assailants drove up in two Mercedeses and a third car about 11 a.m. and stormed the building. The gunmen gathered the employees in one room and shot them with automatic rifles.

Three young women and five men were killed. Six wounded workers were taken from the company's office in a large house to Yarmouk Hospital in Baghdad.

The attack stood out among the many acts of violence here because it occurred in the Dawoodi neighborhood, a modestly wealthy area of town where embassies and other international missions are located. The district has seen kidnappings, but not attacks of this scale.

The officials said the assailants were wearing the familiar green camouflage uniforms of the Interior Ministry's Majhaweer, an elite force that has taken the lead in a number of operations against insurgents in and around Baghdad.

The attack by uniformed gunmen underscored one of the major issues here — violence that appears linked to the security services.

The question of who will control Iraq's security forces is a major point of contention in talks aimed at forming a new government. Those negotiations were put on hold Wednesday as Shiite Muslim and Sunni Arab blocs tried to work out their differences.

Since the Feb. 22 bombing of the Shiite Golden Mosque in Samarra, Iraq has been convulsed by a wave of sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites. The bloodshed has brought the nation to the brink of all-out civil war.

Sunni leaders have accused the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry of operating death squads that have been involved in many of those attacks.

But police and army uniforms have been stolen and used by insurgents and by criminal gangs to bluff their way past guards in a number of attacks, officials said.

Sunni parties, mistrustful of the Shiite-dominated police, want the police and armed forces to be under the control of a Sunni deputy prime minister, who would report to a Shiite prime minister. But Shiites, who are a majority and now have political power after decades of Sunni domination, don't want to yield any authority.

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish negotiator, said the government talks had not broken down over that issue.

Sounding less optimistic, Shiite spokesman Haider Abadi said the Sunni proposal was unconstitutional. "The prime minister is the head of the armed forces, and the security issues can't be handed over to someone else," he said.

Othman and Abadi said the parties would probably return today to the negotiating table.

In other incidents across Iraq, two policemen and two commandos were killed in the Jihad neighborhood of Baghdad when gunmen opened fire on their vehicles.

A roadside bomb near Abu Ghraib, on the old highway between Fallouja and Baghdad, struck an Iraqi army convoy, killing one soldier.

A policeman died in another roadside bomb attack, this one targeting a police convoy patrolling between Mashtal and Baladiyat, east of Baghdad. Two other policemen and three civilians were injured.

And three people were killed in Nasiriya by a roadside bomb placed outside the home of a reporter for Radio Sawa, hospital officials said. The reporter, Mohammed Noor, was not injured, officials said.

Iraq War Changing With Attacks On Cos. (AP-Y2)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP2, March 29, 2006

Fourteen shot at a trading company. At least 90 kidnapped at other businesses. Bodies dumped nightly, bound hand and foot, some tortured. A new brand of violence — a deadly mix of organized crime and sectarian murder — is tearing at Iraq.

Its origins are murky. But the savagery has turned March into a pivotal month in the three-year war — a month of gruesome news, mixed with some good. A sharp decline in American deaths appears to be the payoff for handing more duties to the Iraqi army, leaving U.S. forces less exposed to attack.

At the same time, there has been the rise in the slayings of civilian Iraqis, the reasons for which are hard to find.

Not so many weeks ago, this was a conflict with straightforward, if brutal, terms. Sunni insurgents and al-Qaida terrorists used car bombs, roadside bombs, suicide bomb belts and sniper rifles to target U.S. troops, Iraqi soldiers, police and civilians — mainly Shiites, the newly ascendent majority after years of Saddam Hussein's oppression.

Those groups still operate and still kill. But their war has been dwarfed by the shadowy and incipient terror stalking the capital of Baghdad and its adjoining provinces.

Or perhaps — as some Iraq officials believe — the insurgents simply switched their targets, moving from American and Iraqi troops to targeting businesses and Iraqi civilians as a way to cause chaos or to fund their terror work.

Either way, the staggering shift makes it difficult to predict how the U.S. military will or can react to the new climate of violence, and what it might mean for hopes to begin a troop pullout this summer.

Bombs still rattle the capital and elsewhere, but far less regularly. U.S. helicopters still thunder through the sky, darting here and there and raising a racket that disturbs sleep and sends packs of wild dogs into a howling nighttime frenzy.

The tanks in the streets these days aren't American, by and large, but old Russian T-72s driven by Iraqi soldiers. Faces at military checkpoints are increasingly Iraqi.

As of Wednesday, 27 U.S. military personnel had died in March — the lowest monthly American death count since February 2004 and the second-lowest of the war, according to an Associated Press count.

Coincidental with the sharp drop in American deaths was the huge rise in the number of execution-style killings among Iraqis. Since the beginning of the month, at least 385 people — an average of more than 13 a day — have been found slain, the apparent victims of sectarian hatred and settling of old scores after a Shiite shrine was bombed Feb. 22.

The count climbs to at least 486 when the last six days of February are added, according to figures compiled from daily AP reports based on police accounts.

Also since the start of March, gunmen — mostly masked, many wearing police uniforms — have stormed at least six Baghdad businesses. On Wednesday, eight people were killed at the al-Ibtikar trading company when they were lined up against a wall and shot, and six others were wounded. At least 90 workers have been kidnapped and tens of thousands of dollars stolen in the five other assaults.

Execution-style killings and kidnappings of civilians happened before late February, of course — but not nearly in such big numbers.

In one rough accounting of the rise, for example, the AP reported 36 bodies found in Iraq in December, 150 in January and 195 in February. To date in March, the AP has reported 374 bodies found.

It is not always easy in war zones to separate criminal thugs from political thugs, and Iraq's insurgency has always been made up of several disparate groups.

"These are concentrated efforts to paralyze the country. They are either from al-Qaida or from the remnants of Saddam's regime. They want to tell the people that there is no government," Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman said after Wednesday's attack.

"All these operations have one aim: to freeze life in Iraq and sabotage the democratic process. They want to take us back to the dictatorship," said Maj. Gen. Ahmed al-Khafaji, a deputy interior minister. He, too, blamed al-Qaida and said "we will work day and night to arrest them."

The violence that has hit Iraqi businesses may be aimed at old-line Sunni business moguls. It could be the work of either common criminal gangs, or of death squads operating in or tolerated by the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, which controls the police.

Organized crime may now account for a majority of the violence in the country, said Matthew Sherman, who just finished a two-year stint advising the Interior Ministry.

That, he notes, in a recent interview with an online publication of the Council on Foreign Relations in New York, "really falls outside of what traditional military counterinsurgency operations cover."

Across this critical month, meanwhile, Iraqi politicians struggled but failed to form a government that might — U.S. officials hope — help put a lid on skyrocketing sectarian violence. The successful creation of a unified central authority remains key to the hoped-for start of an American troop withdrawal this summer.

Yet compromise has proved impossible so far.

U.S. Troops Repel Blitz By Taliban (WP)

By Rahim Faiez

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, March 29 -- Taliban fighters on Wednesday launched a rare concerted attack on a base used by multinational forces in southern Afghanistan, killing an American soldier and a Canadian soldier and sparking fierce U.S.-led retaliation that killed 32 insurgents in the bloodiest fighting in months.

Assaults by the radical Islamic militia have grown in intensity recently, and the group has warned of a renewed offensive this year.

The most recent assault was directed at a remote forward operating base in the Sangin district of Helmand province. A small contingent of American and Canadian troops are stationed at the base with Afghan soldiers.

The violence began late Tuesday, when Taliban insurgents ambushed an Afghan convoy as it returned to the base, killing eight Afghan soldiers, said Col. Chris Vernon, a spokesman for the British military.

U.S. and British warplanes and helicopters were called in to provide air support and a Canadian quick-reaction force was sent from Kandahar to the base.

Early Wednesday, the base came under a "significant Taliban attack" that killed the Canadian and American soldiers, Vernon said. At least five coalition troops were wounded, including three Canadians and an American, officials said.

Twelve Taliban fighters died in the attack, while 20 others were killed after coalition aircraft and artillery fire forced them to flee into the desert.

The U.S. military said that coalition troops who overrran a Taliban base in Helmand found two "headquarters buildings" containing large caches of weapons, bombs and ammunition. All were blown up, the military said.

"The capturing of these two compounds with boots on the ground produced significant intelligence and allows us to continue to put pressure on the enemy," U.S. Brig. Gen. Anthony J. Tata added.

The American's death brought to 223 the number of U.S. service members killed in and around Afghanistan since the Taliban was driven from power in 2001. Twelve Canadians have been killed in the country since 2002, according to the Canadian Press news agency.

In other violence, suspected Taliban rebels attacked a police checkpoint in Kandahar late Tuesday, killing two officers and wounding four, according to a police.

DOJ_NMG_0024092

Also Tuesday, a roadside bomb killed six Afghan soldiers in Helmand province. Four private security workers -- a Namibian and three Afghans -- were killed elsewhere in the south in attacks blamed on Taliban rebels.

Pakistani Militant Leader Is Beaten (LAT)

By Mubashir Zaidi And Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Gunmen on Wednesday attacked and seriously injured a longtime ally of Osama bin Laden whom U.S. authorities have linked to an alleged terrorist sleeper cell in California.

Fazlur Rehman Khalil, a signatory to Bin Laden's 1998 declaration of war on the United States and its allies, was severely beaten by eight armed men, supporters said.

The assailants dragged Khalil and his driver from a mosque in Tarnol, about three miles northwest of Islamabad, Pakistan's capital, as they attended evening prayers, said his spokesman, Sultan Zia.

Khalil is a former leader of Harkat Mujahedin, a militant group linked to Al Qaeda that he founded as Harkat Ansar to fight Soviet forces in Afghanistan in the 1980s. The U.S. labeled Khalil's group a terrorist organization in 1997, but it has continued its anti-Western jihad, or holy war, under the new name, Jamiat ul Ansar.

Khalil's attackers held him for five hours, tying a rope around his neck and beating him with rifle butts before dumping him in front of a mosque on Islamabad's outskirts, his spokesman said. "He was left in a very serious condition with a severe head injury. However, he has survived with the grace of God," Zia said. Khalil was taken to a hospital in Rawalpindi, adjacent to the capital.

In June, the FBI arrested Lodi, Calif., ice cream truck driver Umer Hayat, 48, and his son Hamid, 23, and charged them with training in one of Khalil's camps in Pakistan for attacks in the U.S. The men are on trial in a Sacramento court. The prosecution rested its case Tuesday.

Khalil co-signed Bin Laden's 1998 fatwa, or religious edict, that declared it "an individual duty" for Muslims to kill American civilians and troops, or their allies, anywhere they could be found in the world.

Bin Laden's deputy, Egyptian physician Ayman Zawahiri, and two other Egyptian and Pakistani extremists also signed the declaration by the so-called World Islamic Front for Jihad against the Jews and the Crusaders.

That same year, then-President Clinton ordered an attack with Tomahawk cruise missiles on targets in Afghanistan to kill Bin Laden after Al Qaeda attacks on two U.S. embassies in East Africa left at least 224 people dead. The strikes also targeted Khalil's camps near the eastern Afghan town of Khowst.

Intelligence assessments concluded that the missile strikes missed Bin Laden by a few hours, but Khalil claimed several of his fighters were killed in the airstrikes.

In testimony before the 9/11 Commission in 2004, Clinton's national security advisor, Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, said an undisclosed number of agents from the Pakistani military's Inter-Services Intelligence agency also died in the strikes on the camps. The powerful ISI was long associated with Khalil and other militant groups.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf banned Khalil's militant group in 2001, after he ended support for the Taliban regime in neighboring Afghanistan and joined the U.S.-led war on terrorism after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Pakistani authorities arrested Khalil in 2004 when he was accused of aiding militants crossing into Afghanistan to attack U.S.-led forces.

He was detained at least two more times but was released each time under what Pakistan's government insisted was close supervision to ensure he didn't engage in militant activities.

As late as 2004, Khalil continued to raise funds and rally militants to wage jihad against the U.S. in a magazine called Al Hilal, published from his headquarters, in a mosque next to a school and across from an army base in Rawalpindi.

A November 2003 edition of the magazine featured an advertisement on the back page, announcing the "All-Pakistan Training Convention of Jamiat ul Ansar Activists," at Khalil's headquarters.

Christian Convert Given Asylum In Italy (WT/AP)

By Maria Sanminiatelli, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

ROME -- The Afghan man who faced the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity received asylum in Italy yesterday, despite requests by lawmakers in Afghanistan that he be barred from fleeing the conservative Muslim country.

Abdul Rahman arrived in Rome days after he was freed from a high-security prison on the outskirts of Kabul after a court dropped charges of apostasy against him for lack of evidence and suspected mental illness.

The case has attracted wide attention in the West and led to calls by the U.S. and other governments for the Afghan government to protect the 41-year-old convert.

It also inspired an appeal by Pope Benedict XVI to Afghanistan President Hamid Karzai and efforts by the United Nations to find a country to take him in after Muslim clerics in Afghanistan threatened his life, saying his conversion was a "betrayal to Islam."

Mr. Rahman was in the care of Italy's Interior Ministry, Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi said yesterday evening. "He is already in Italy," he said. "I think he arrived overnight."

The Italian Interior Ministry said Mr. Rahman was "under protection."

Conversion is a crime under Afghanistan's Islamic law. Mr. Rahman was arrested last month after police discovered him with a Bible. He was brought to trial last week and faced the death penalty for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

Under heavy international pressure from the United States and other nations that helped oust the hard-line Taliban regime and provide aid and military support for Mr. Karzai, Mr. Rahman was released from prison Monday.

President Bush and others had insisted Afghanistan protect personal beliefs. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Mr. Karzai last week and appealed for a "favorable resolution" of the case.

Afghanistan's new parliament debated Mr. Rahman's case yesterday and demanded he be barred from leaving the country. But no formal vote was taken on the issue.

Some 500 Afghans, including Muslim leaders and students, also gathered at a mosque in the southern town of Qalat, in Zabul province, to demand the convert be forced to return to Islam or be killed.

"This is a terrible thing and a major shame for Afghanistan," Zabul's top cleric, Abdulrahman Jan, said.

Italy has close ties with Afghanistan, whose former king, Mohammed Zahir Shah, was allowed to live with his family in exile in Rome for 30 years. The former royals returned to Kabul after the fall of the Taliban regime.

Italian troops were sent into Afghanistan after the U.S.-led invasion of the country in 2001 to help with reconstruction, and Italy still has 1,775 troops there.

Mr. Rahman's ordeal began as a custody dispute over his two daughters, now 13 and 14. The girls had lived with their grandparents their whole lives, but Mr. Rahman sought custody when he returned to Afghanistan in 2002 after living in Germany for nine years.

Afghan Convert Arrives In Italy As Protests Mount In Homeland (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

ROME, March 29 -- Abdul Rahman, the Afghan convert to Christianity who faced a possible death sentence in his homeland for rejecting Islam, has arrived in Italy and will be granted political asylum here, Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi said Wednesday.

Berlusconi told Italian journalists that Rahman, 41, had probably arrived overnight and was now in the hands of the Interior Ministry. It was not immediately clear how he had traveled to Italy from Afghanistan, and his exact whereabouts were being kept secret.

"We are very glad to be able to welcome someone who has been so courageous," Berlusconi said.

Rahman departed for Europe as a confrontation was building between the Afghan government and the Christian world. Political and religious leaders in Europe, including Pope Benedict XVI, had condemned Rahman's prosecution on charges of apostasy, a capital offense under sharia , or Islamic law. The Bush administration, which has about 20,000 troops in Afghanistan, called on the Afghan government to respect religious freedom.

Rahman was released late Monday from a high-security prison outside Kabul after a public security court dismissed the charges against him, citing a lack of evidence and suspicions that he is mentally ill.

On Wednesday, Western governments welcomed Rahman's release. German Chancellor Angela Merkel said it was a "sensible signal to the international community but also for the situation in Afghanistan." Germany is a major donor to Afghanistan with about 2,000 troops in the NATO security force there.

But controversy continued to boil in Afghanistan, where Islamic clerics and members of parliament strongly objected to Rahman being freed from prison and allowed to leave the country. Demonstrators in several cities continued to protest foreign interference, and critics accused President Hamid Karzai of giving in to international pressure.

Under Islamic law, rejection of Islam is a grave offense, punishable by death if the convert does not repent. Afghanistan is a deeply traditional Muslim country where there are no publicly practicing Afghan Christians. Both proselytizing and conversion are viewed by most people as anathema.

On Wednesday, 500 clerics gathered in a mosque in the southern city of Qalat to protest Rahman's release, news services reported from Kabul. Abdulrahman Jan, the top cleric in the Qalat region, said the government should either force Rahman to convert back to Islam or kill him.

"This is a terrible thing and a major shame for Afghanistan," he said.

The Afghan parliament also condemned Rahman's liberation as a breach of Islamic law, but did not take a formal vote on the issue.

"We sent a letter and called the Interior Ministry and demanded they not allow Abdul Rahman to leave the country," Yonus Qanooni, the speaker in the lower house and a leading political rival of Karzai, told reporters in Kabul. During debate, several other legislators said Rahman should be executed.

The case has highlighted the contradictions that remain between Afghan society and the Western powers that in 2001 helped topple the Taliban, the extremist Islamic movement that ruled most of the country. Although Afghanistan is now a democracy with an elected president, its constitution enshrines sharia as well as international human rights conventions.

Rahman converted 16 years ago while working with a Christian refugee aid group in Pakistan. He then moved to Germany. Only recently had he returned home to Kabul, where he was arrested for possessing a Bible after his relatives informed police. He was embroiled in a child custody battle with his estranged wife, an Afghan Muslim.

His arrival in Italy came in the middle of a hotly contested election campaign, in which some groups in Berlusconi's ruling coalition are running on a platform that opposes immigration and portrays Western civilization as on the defensive against an onslaught of Muslim intolerance.

Rahman told La Repubblica newspaper he was unrepentant. "I have done nothing to repent, I respect Afghan law as I respect Islam. But I chose to become a Christian, for myself, for my soul. It is not an offense."

Italy has close ties with Afghanistan, whose former king, Mohammed Zahir Shah, was allowed to live in exile in Rome with his family for 30 years. The former royals returned to Kabul after the Taliban fell.

Italy Grants Asylum To Afghan Christian Convert (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

ROME, March 29 — A man who faced the death penalty in Afghanistan for converting to Christianity was secretly flown to Italy, where he was granted asylum under round-the-clock protection by the government, the Italian prime minister said Wednesday evening.

"He's already in Italy," Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi told reporters.

Mr. Berlusconi was vague about when the convert, Abdul Rahman, 41, had arrived here, saying he believed that it happened "overnight." The Italian news service ANSA reported that he landed in Rome on Tuesday night, accompanied by Italian secret service agents.

His arrival culminated several days of strong pressure on the American-supported government in Afghanistan, where Mr. Rahman had been jailed for weeks for his conversion. Many in Afghanistan called for his death, while Western nations demanded his release.

The differing reactions here and in Afghanistan to Mr. Rahman's release and his arrival in Italy seemed to underscore the continuing tension between the West and the Islamic world on issues like freedom of religion, freedom of expression and democracy.

"I say that we are very glad to be able to welcome someone who has been so courageous," Mr. Berlusconi told reporters here earlier in the day, before making Mr. Rahman's arrival public.

Later he said Mr. Rahman had "asked for asylum and it has been granted," after his cabinet took the unusual step of immediately approving it.

But in deeply conservative and religious Afghanistan, politicians were outraged on Wednesday amid confusion about Mr. Rahman's whereabouts and fears that he might be taken from Afghanistan. Clerics called for him to be tried under Islamic law, which under conservative interpretations applies execution as a punishment for apostasy, and they led hundreds of people in demonstrations that also protested Western interference.

"We must call on the authorities in charge right now to stop him from going out," Muhammad Dawood Zarif, an Afghan legislator and businessman, said in Kabul before Mr. Berlusconi's announcement.

Abdul Rab Rasool Sayaf, a conservative legislator, accused outside nations of plotting against Islam and Afghanistan.

"This is a net of conspiracies," he said. "I am sure there are people behind this who want to create problems between Afghanistan and the West from which they themselves would get their benefit."

Accordingly, Mr. Rahman's departure created the prospect of increased pressure on Mr. Karzai domestically even as it eased pressure from Western nations, including the United States, which holds out Mr. Karzai as the model of a moderate and modern Muslim leader.

Mr. Rahman, said to have converted to Christianity after working for an international Christian aid group, was jailed in Afghanistan after being accused of apostasy for abandoning Islam, although he was never formally charged. He was released to his family on Monday night, said the justice minister, Sarwar Danish.

The Bush administration pressed Mr. Karzai to resolve the case, but he resisted, citing separation of executive and judicial powers. Germany, Italy and Canada, which have troops serving in Afghanistan, and other countries voiced their concerns to Mr. Karzai's government.

On Saturday, Pope Benedict XVI, long outspoken about religious freedom for Christians in predominantly Muslim countries, sent a letter asking Mr. Karzai to pardon Mr. Rahman. The next day, the pope spoke at St. Peter's Square about his worries about "communities who live in countries where there is a lack of religious freedom, or where despite claims on paper they in truth are subjected to many restrictions."

The choice of Italy as a place of refuge for Mr. Rahman seemed to be a result of a combination of factors, including Italy's ties to the Vatican and to Afghanistan, along with close national elections here in which the Catholic vote is substantial.

Bush Tries Outreach To Bolster Standing, But Iraq Counts Most (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

President Bush is engaged in an extensive new outreach campaign to Members of Congress, the media and the public to bolster his flagging political fortunes. But White House aides admit that events in Iraq are likely to control his destiny — and GOP fortunes in November.

In Iraq, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad is striving mightily to get the Iraqis to put a unity government in place as quickly as possible, which would restore confidence in the political leg of Bush's "victory" strategy.

In a reprise of a strategy that lifted his poll ratings from the 30s into the 40s last November and December, Bush is also back on the speechmaking circuit to convince the public that progress is being made on the military and reconstruction fronts, as well.

Last year, Bush used as a foil Democrats who accused him of lying about how the United States got into the war and who were calling for immediate troop withdrawals. Now, he's playing off the media, maintaining that overall conditions in Iraq are much better than is being reported.

At the same time, Bush is inviting various news organizations to off-the-record briefings in the family quarters of the White House, and other groups are being invited to backgrounders with high-ranking officials.

On Tuesday, Bush had his Cabinet briefed via teleconference by Khalilzad and U.S. military commanders, after which Bush urged his top appointees to help him talk up Iraq progress when they travel around the country.

He also urged them to encourage young people in their departments to travel to Iraq to assist the fledgling Iraqi ministries in providing services to the population.

And the same day, he met with Congressional delegations back from visits to Iraq, including such critics of his policy as Sens. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.). He held another session on competitiveness policy that included Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.).

These sessions come on top of a series of small group meetings with Congressional Republicans that are designed to quiet restiveness in his own ranks and silence charges that the White House "doesn't listen" or is "tone deaf."

Improving relations with Congress and bolstering the GOP base are seen as two of three key tasks facing the White House between now and the November elections. The third is re-establishing the administration's record on the "competence" issue.

Replacing White House Chief of Staff Andy Card with Budget Director Josh Bolten is described as a major step to tighten the administration's performance, which is now a central rhetorical target for Democrats, who charge the administration with being "dangerously incompetent."

Bolten is said to have a "free hand" in reshaping the White House staff — and perhaps other parts of the administration — to ensure that there are no repetitions of the Dubai ports fiasco and Hurricane Katrina confusion.

On the base-bolstering front, GOP leaders are mindful of the fact that the 1994 GOP landslide victory — 52 House and six Senate seats — resulted partly from low morale among Democratic base voters and from low turnout. There's been some weakening in Bush's GOP base in 2006, partly due to negative comments by Republicans in Congress.

Even though Bush is at odds with the GOP base on immigration policy, House Republican leaders think it helps their Members — at least in the short run — to have illegal immigrants staging huge demonstrations protesting their enforcement-only border security bill.

"Every poll I've ever seen supports the notion that Americans want stronger border security," one leader told me. "We're getting lots of notice now for passing that kind of bill, and our Members will benefit from that."

Democrats think they will gain if the GOP is seen as heartless or Draconian on immigration.

But Republicans are pushing back by reminding journalists that last December, all but 10 Democrats voted against a GOP effort to soften penalties for being in the country illegally, from felony to misdemeanor status. Democrats wanted the GOP bill to be as cruel-seeming as possible.

To bolster the base, GOP leaders also are determined to "play offense, not defense" in the November elections and to make it "a choice" between Democratic and GOP candidates, not simply a referendum on Bush.

Republicans say they will fight Democratic attempts to "nationalize" the campaign by "localizing" it — pointing to differences that are of concern in specific states and districts.

But the GOP also will do some "nationalizing" by pointing to Democratic leaders such as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), arguing that a given Senate or House candidate will be "part of that team" and subject to its discipline.

Vice President Cheney signaled anew last week that Republicans will attack Democrats on national security, declaring that party leaders "have demanded a sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq — the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting."

Another version of the attack is to charge that Democrats "want to raise a white flag in the face of terrorism — and also raise your taxes." Senate Republicans charge that Democratic amendments to the fiscal 2007 budget bill would cost taxpayers nearly $170 billion over a five-year period.

But, as important as it is for the administration to reach out, get its White House in order, communicate better and bolster the base, aides acknowledge that Iraq is the chief factor governing Bush's fortunes and that of his party.

Only 35 percent of Americans approve of Bush's Iraq policy, according to an NBC/Wall Street Journal poll. By a 50 percent to 39 percent margin, voters said they'd prefer a Congressional candidate who favors withdrawing all U.S. troops in the next three months over one who favors remaining as long as necessary to establish a democracy.

Bush, to his credit, will not withdraw prematurely. But if significant troop withdrawals are not possible before November, it's likely that Republicans will suffer.

NEW: Attorney General Announces New Initiatives During Stop (YAKHR)

Yakima (WA) Herald Republic, March 30, 2006

TOPPENISH — U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced new federal initiatives to fight drugs and solve old homicide cases on tribal land during a visit today to the Yakama Reservation.

Gonzales first spoke about drugs and gangs to several hundred students at White Swan High School. Later he held a closed-door roundtable discussion with Yakama tribal leaders about federal, state and tribal law enforcement regarding methamphetamine and other tribal justice issues.

"I think it is important to get a first-hand view of the tribal justice system on the Yakama Reservation," he said in a statement released by his office. "The tribe is doing good work to preserve the heritage of this special place and protect those who call it home from the threats of violence and drug abuse, but there remain serious problems that require additional attention."

Gonzales said the Yakama Nation will be the first tribe to benefit from a cold case review initiative for Indian Country nationwide. As part of the initiative Gonzales announced today, the FBI and U.S. Attorneys Office will review the Yakama Nation's unsolved homicides to learn which might benefit from new investigative resources and advancements in forensic science.

Mystery surrounds what happened to more a dozen women who have been killed or disappeared on the Yakama reservation since the early 1980s.

As part of the cold case review initiative, the Federal Bureau of Investigation will make available the services of both its Violent Crime Apprehension program and its National Center for Analysis of Violent Crime.

Also, Gonzales announced funding for a methamphetamine investigation training for tribal law enforcement.

"The use, production and distribution of methamphetamine on Indian reservations has increased significantly during the past 10 years. At the winter session of the National Congress of American Indians in Washington, D.C., methamphetamine's dramatic impact within Indian Country was perhaps the biggest issue of concern amongst tribal leaders," according to a statement from the Attorney General's Office.

Gonzales Vows Reservation Crimes Review (AP)

By SHANNON DININNY, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 30, 2006

WHITE SWAN, Wash. (AP) - Federal authorities plan to re-examine unsolved criminal cases on American Indian reservations to see whether they can be solved using new investigative tools, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday.

He said the first cases to get new federal scrutiny will be at the Yakama Indian Reservation, where more than a dozen women were slain or disappeared in the 1980s and early 1990s in what some people speculated could have been the work of a serial killer.

"Hopefully we can be successful in bringing closure to some of these families," Gonzales said after a private meeting with tribal officials.

Between 1980 and 1993, authorities found the remains of 13 women on the reservation. Eleven of the victims were Indian, and most were in their 20s. Most were stabbed, beaten or shot to death.

At the time, some officials complained about a lack of coordination between law enforcement agencies. The FBI has jurisdiction over major crimes on Indian lands.

Also, during a meeting with about 500 students from the reservation's Mount Adams School District, Gonzales was asked his opinion on the immigration debate before Congress. Roughly 70 percent of the district's students are American Indian. About 20 percent are Hispanic.

The attorney general said Americans live in a different world since the 2001 terrorist attacks, and the country needs to know who has crossed its borders. At the same time, he said, the United States must offer some kind of legal status to those workers who are already here, or risk serious consequences to the economy.

"America is great because of its immigrants. It is what represents a great part of what is America. That needs to be protected," Gonzales said, evoking applause.

US Attorney General Visits Yakama Nation (KIMA-TV)

By Tim Lewis

KIMA-TV, CBS 29, Yakima, WA, March 30, 2006

White Swan - After two practice assemblies and plenty of security checks, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales came to White Swan.

"What I'm here to tell you is there is no future in avenues like gangs," he told a students at White Swan High School, "There is no future in avenues like drugs."

Just like every other teenager, White Swan senior Adrian Espindola has already heard this message before.

"I hear it all the time."

But this time there's something different.

"I probably paid more attention than I would have if anybody else would have told me," he said. "I swear there are at least 100 kids in the crowd that are around drugs everyday. I'm sure it influenced them to hear someone like that come speak to them."

"Just the entourage and the level of security puts it in a whole different light than someone who just walks in to give a presentation," says Dr. Mary Hall, Superintendent of the Mt. Adams School District.

Gonzalez isn't only talking the talk, he's also walking the walk.

More people are using methamphetamine on Indian reservations than they have over the past 10 years.

That's why the Justice Department will give money to the Tribal Police to train officers on how to spot meth problems.

"It'll be a slow process, we understand that, but I think we are on our way and there are a number of efforts underway -- including the school district -- that show the more we work together, the more power we have together," said Hall after being asked if she thinks things will change after the visit.

Gonzales also announced a new program to investigate cold cases on Indian reservations.

The Yakama Nation will be the first tribe to benefit from the initiative.

House Approves Comp Time For Justice Department Lawyers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

The House has approved a bill that would ensure that Justice Department lawyers are eligible to receive compensatory time off for travel during their off-duty hours, like other federal employees.

Congress approved legislation in 2004 creating comp time for travel, and the Office of Personnel Management issued a regulation in 2005. The law permits federal employees to claim time off when they travel on official business during off-duty hours, such as flying on a Sunday to attend a meeting Monday morning. Previous rules had made it difficult for employees to qualify for compensation while traveling outside normal business hours.

But the Justice Department decided that the time-off regulation did not apply to it because of a 1999 congressional restriction that limits overtime pay for Justice Department lawyers. The interpretation triggered complaints that the department was not treating its 9,000 lawyers fairly.

The House bill "unequivocally clarifies congressional intent," that Justice Department lawyers may receive comp time for travel during non-business hours, Rep. Jon C. Porter (R-Nev.), chairman of the House federal workforce subcommittee, said Tuesday when he sought passage of the bill. Co-sponsors included Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), Danny K. Davis (D-Ill.), Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

The bill, Porter said, "would greatly assist those employees who take early morning flights in order to attend business away from the home office but don't currently get compensated for their dedication."

He noted that the Justice Department provided technical assistance during the drafting of the bill.

Richard L. Delonis , president of the National Association of Assistant U.S. Attorneys, said the bill will not impose a financial burden on the department. "It is symbolic, though," he added.

The association represents the interests of about 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys. "There will be some people it will actually benefit more than others -- someone who lives out on the West Coast and has to travel to Washington for meetings on a Monday," Delonis said.

Delonis wrote House members last year when the Justice Department balked at implementing the benefit. "Our organization stood up for what we believed in, and through the legislative process has achieved a victory," he said.

A similar bill has been introduced in the Senate by Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), who said he is looking forward to Senate passage as soon as possible. "I'm delighted the House passed its bill yesterday," he said in a statement. "Our bills restate congressional intent that DOJ attorneys enjoy the same benefits as other federal attorneys."'Get With the Program'

Rep. Thomas Davis told OPM Director Linda M. Springer at a hearing this week that many Northern Virginia companies sponsor telecommuting programs that keep their employees out of traffic jams and let them focus on being productive rather than punching a clock.

"When are we going to get with the program?" Davis asked in an exasperated tone.

Less than 20 percent of those in the federal workforce have been deemed telecommuters, as measured by the number of jobs that agencies have declared eligible for telework, OPM data show.

Springer told Davis that the administration "is doing a good job" of educating federal managers on the alternative work program. She said telecommuting will become "more urgent than in the past" as the government prepares for events that could disrupt operations, such as a pandemic flu.Fire Closes IRS Headquarters

The headquarters of the Internal Revenue Service will be closed today because of an electrical fire that shut down power to the Constitution Avenue building. More than 3,000 IRS employees were forced out of the headquarters yesterday morning after a fire in the basement filled the building with smoke.

Terry Lemons , an IRS spokesman, said crews were scheduled to work throughout the night to restore power but did not think repairs would be finished in time to reopen the building this morning. The building should be open for business on Friday, he said.

IRS employees should call 866-743-5748, the employee hotline, for information on when the building will be ready for them to return, Lemons said.

Mark W. Everson , the IRS commissioner, was leaving the building as fire alarms went off at about 9:30 a.m. yesterday. He was en route to testify on Capitol Hill about the agency's budget plans for fiscal 2007.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Street Sleuth Tracing Refco's Ruin Leads Probe To Bermuda (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

When Refco Inc. filed for bankruptcy-court protection in October, many headlines focused on Phillip R. Bennett, the brokerage firm's since-departed chief executive.

Investigators are still examining the actions of Mr. Bennett, who faces criminal-fraud and wire-fraud charges related to Refco's implosion.

But six months on, the inquiries into Refco's demise have broadened and are leading down another path, too, according to court documents filed in bankruptcy court in New York and interviews with lawyers and others involved in the matter. The second path: the flow of money through Refco's vast operations, including its unregulated Bermuda unit, which some investigators are treating as the epicenter of Refco's problems.

Mr. Bennett denies wrongdoing as the Justice Department and others parse aspects of his personal life, including his trading accounts. Mr. Bennett's lawyer, Gary Naftalis, declined comment. David Esseks, the assistant U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York who is prosecuting Mr. Bennett, declined comment.

Lawyers and others working on behalf of Refco creditors are scrutinizing intercompany money transfers at the Bermuda unit, Refco Capital Markets Ltd., which offered Refco clients higher rates of return, less scrutiny, and more generous loans for trading than did Refco's regulated futures or stock-trading units.

The purpose of the Bermuda unit was to allow sophisticated investors to trade securities such as emerging-market debt, with Refco acting as an informal exchange and providing loans so that the traders could increase their risk. The unit attracted hundreds of clients, including hedge funds and other big investors from around the globe.

But people familiar with Refco Capital Markets say bankruptcy lawyers are trying to determine whether some of the unit's client money was tapped by Refco to fund its expansion, specifically a string of acquisitions of trade-processing, or clearing, firms. Refco was founded in 1969 and became one of the world's biggest brokerage firms, focusing on commodities, derivatives and foreign currencies.

Among Refco's purchases was the 2005 acquisition of the global brokerage operations of Cargill Investor Services. Refco paid about $208 million for those operations, plus future considerations, according to a person familiar with that transaction. Refco's transfer records show that $170 million came through Refco Capital Markets, the person says. Investigators are looking into other intercompany transfers between the unit and Refco Inc., the parent company, that total hundreds of millions of dollars.

The event that led to the bankruptcy-court filing by Refco only weeks after the company went public was an admission Oct. 10 by the company that Mr. Bennett had hidden $430 million in bad debts, removing them from the company's books and parking them elsewhere, including in an entity tied to Mr. Bennett.

After that revelation, customers rushed to get their money out of Refco Capital Markets, leading Refco to freeze customer accounts.

Court documents show that Refco Capital Markets didn't have the financial wherewithal to meet those demands.

At that point, the value of client collateral and other assets held by the unit was supposed to total $3.7 billion, but the unit's actual assets were about $1.9 billion, according to the documents.

Elsewhere, investigations have turned up links between Refco, Mr. Bennett and other entities, including Bawag P.S.K. Group, an Austrian bank that once owned a 10% stake in Refco and lent Mr. Bennett €350 million, or about $420 million, which he used to pay off the hidden bad debts just before Refco revealed them. Bawag subsequently sued Refco, saying it was misled when it agreed to provide that loan.

Bawag's chairman said last week that he and other executives failed to disclose losses totaling more than €1 billion between 2000 and 2005 after investments by the former chief executive officer's son went sour.

The bank and its current and former executives are under investigation by the Austrian financial regulator for not informing regulators about losses run up by Wolfgang Flottl, a New York investor and son of Bawag's former CEO, Walter Flottl.

The full extent of links between Refco and Bawag remain unclear. Court documents show that investigators working for Refco's bankruptcy attorneys and creditors are pursuing several leads, including money transfers between Refco and Bawag.

In separate court filings, Refco's bankruptcy attorneys in December suggested they were pursuing different links: "Attention to situation involving Austria subsidiary, Bawag and RGHI." RGHI is believed to be Refco Group Holdings Inc., an entity affiliated with Mr. Bennett.

And in January, Refco's bankruptcy attorneys met to discuss "status of various investigations, including investigation into transfer of funds from Refco Vienna," according to the filings.

Forensic-accounting firm FTI Consulting Inc., which has been working as consultant to the Chapter 11 trustee, is looking into the transfer of securities that may relate to Bawag. In one court document dated March 24, the accounting firm said it had met with Refco officials in October about " 'missing' Bawag securities."

FTI said it had conducted a "review and analysis of account statements for Refco Capital Markets re: bonds and securities transferred re: BAWAG." FTI declined comment.

The federal criminal investigation into Mr. Bennett's affairs has examined company-personnel charts, several Chicago entities potentially affiliated with Mr. Bennett, and trading reports for certain customers at Refco Capital Markets, according to court documents. Prosecutors have examined an account belonging to Mr. Bennett known simply as "account No. 87," those documents show, and they have looked at loan agreements between Refco and other entities.

One entity is Liberty Corner Capital LLC, a Summit, N.J., hedge fund that has said it unwittingly played a role in helping hide Refco's client debt. In October, Liberty Corner said it had been told it wasn't the target of any criminal investigation regarding Refco.

A second agreement that prosecutors are looking at was between Refco and Ingram Micro Inc., an information-technology distributor.

A spokeswoman for the Santa Ana, Calif., company confirmed the loan, but said Ingram Micro's lawyers declined to say anything more about it because it is part of the current litigation against the collapsed brokerage firm.

"It looks like we had a loan transaction with Refco several years ago, but no transactions for more than four years," said Ria Carlson, the spokeswoman. "Because of that transaction, we were asked to provide some documents to the U.S. Attorney's office."

The origin and importance of a third loan pact, titled "Delta Flyer," remains unknown.

Investors, Including Queens Man, Charged With Scamming Millions (NSDY/AP)

By Adam Gorlick, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 30, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. -- Three investment firm executives _ including one from Queens _ have been accused by federal authorities of making car payments, buying jewelry, paying for home improvements and taking personal loans with about $16 million swindled from people in high-pressure real estate deals.

Mark Shapiro, 45, of Glastonbury, Conn., and William Foster, 66, of Easthampton, were arrested by FBI agents Monday at their Cobalt Capital headquarters in Springfield. Foster was freed on $250 bond following a hearing Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Springfield.

Shapiro, who spent 30 months in prison after a 1998 bank fraud conviction and allegedly used some money he swindled through Cobalt to pay the $350,000 he owed from that case, was ordered held without bail Wednesday.

The third executive, Irving Stitsky, of Bayside, N.Y., was arrested at Cobalt's office in Great Neck, N.Y., and is also free on bond. Stitsky pleaded guilty in 2001 to securities fraud, wire fraud and bribery. He also has a money laundering and fraud case pending in New Jersey.

According to a federal complaint charging the men with securities fraud and conspiracy, Cobalt employed telemarketers who made fast, high-pressure calls to potential investors.

Phone records for the company's office in Great Neck show that tens of thousands of long-distance calls _ most less than one minute _ were made to locations across the country, according to an affidavit by FBI Agent Jennifer May.

"Based on my experience and training, the calling patterns reflected in the telephone records are consistent with those of a 'boiler room' operation," May wrote.

Megan Gaffney, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan _ which has spearheaded the investigation _ would not disclose information about the people targeted in the alleged scam.

Raipher Pellegrino, Foster's lawyer, said Cobalt was soliciting legitimate investments for residential and commercial properties in Florida and Texas.

"These are real properties that are being developed," Pellegrino said. He said "many investors are getting returns on their money," but would not say what the average rate of return is.

In denying Shapiro's request for bail, U.S. Magistrate Judge Kenneth Neiman said he was concerned that "his access to large sums of money" made him a flight risk.

Shapiro's lawyer, Martin Leppo, said his client needed to be free so he could manage Cobalt's investments and cooperate with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is investigating the company.

"If Mr. Shapiro is not released, Cobalt will fail," Leppo said.

Stitsky, who has appeared in federal court in Manhattan, did not return a phone call to The Associated Press.

The federal complaint says the three men never told Cobalt's investors that Shapiro and Stitsky had criminal records, and lied by saying Shapiro had a master's degree in finance from Harvard University.

When an undercover investigator called Cobalt for investment information, he was told the company had been running for 23 years. But Cobalt wasn't formed until 2004, according to the complaint.

Authorities say Shapiro, Stitsky and Foster gave themselves loans and paid for personal expenses with investors' money. They allegedly set up an account with the money that was used to write checks to a jewelry store and to make car payments.

Investigators also say Shapiro used $240,000 to pay for construction work on his Glastonbury home, and made thousands of dollars of purchases at places including Gucci, Best Buy, Dial-a-Mattress and Williams-Sonoma.

FBI Arrests 3 In Fraud Case (RMA)

By Marcia Blomberg, Mblomberg@repub.com

The Republican (MA), March 30, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - A sleek office in a modest Maple Street building is the headquarters of Cobalt Capital Cos., where two top executives were arrested by federal authorities this week and charged with securities fraud.

Mark Alan Shapiro, 45, of Glastonbury, Conn., and William B. Foster, 66, of Williamsburg, were arrested by local FBI agents Monday morning in their fourth-floor corporate condominiums at 155 Maple St., according to Michael O'Reilly, agent in charge of the FBI's Springfield office.

Shapiro was still being held yesterday, while Foster was released Monday on a $250,000 secured bond. Both are due in U.S. District Court today.

Irving Stitsky, of Bayside, N.Y., was arrested at Cobalt Capital's office in Great Neck, N.Y., a facility that an FBI agent called a "boiler room," where sales reps made calls to potential investors, according to the agent's affidavit filed in U.S. District Court.

Stitsky was released on $1 million bond.

According to a complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, the three men diverted millions of dollars entrusted to them by investors for their personal use

According to the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, Cobalt raised more than $16 million from more than 150 investors.

The company, according to its Web site, is a "vertically integrated, national real estate investment, development and management" company with properties in Texas and Florida.

Yesterday, the Cobalt Capital office at 155 Maple St. was still open. Glass blocks infused with a blue light, black-and-white tile floor and art glass decorated the reception area. A woman in the office said no one would be made available to speak to the press.

According to the company's Web site, there are 13 people on its management team at its various companies, not including Shapiro or Stitsky.

Foster was named in the company's marketing materials as owner, president and chief executive officer, but the operation is really run by Shapiro, according to the affidavit.

The marketing materials sent to investors never mentioned that Stitsky and Shapiro both have convictions for fraud.

In fact, the materials never mentioned that Stitsky was involved in the company at all, and only one marketing memo noted Shapiro was involved, as a consultant.

The memo said that Shapiro has a master's degree in finance from Harvard.

But according to the affidavit, Stitsky and Shapiro have criminal records - Shapiro for bank and tax fraud, and Stitsky for conspiracy to commit securities fraud, wire fraud and commercial bribery, among others.

And Shapiro never went to Harvard, according to the affidavit.

The three men are accused of misappropriating money invested in Cobalt from July 2004, through Nov. 30, 2005, paying for personal expenses such as jewelry and Porsche payments, and making undisclosed loans to themselves.

According to the complaint filed against the trio by the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, Shapiro used the company's American Express card to spend $31,000 at jewelry stores, at Gucci and Louis Vuitton stores, and at Ferragamo and Williams-Sonoma.

Another $240,000 was used to pay for work on Shapiro's house in Glastonbury, and $2.2 million was diverted from a Cobalt bank account into an account controlled by Shapiro.

Shapiro even used $214,000 from the account he controlled to make a restitution payment he owed in Connecticut on bank and tax fraud convictions, according to the complaint filed in U.S. District Court.

Foster, according to the complaint, received $646,000 in investor funds from Cobalt, and Stitsky received $165,000.

The company offered membership interests at a price of $100,000 per unit.

The company focused on multi-family residential properties, though it also marketed a property known as the Simone Hotel in Miami Beach.

The FBI affidavit asserts that no Cobalt entity owned the hotel.

An undercover FBI agent called a Cobalt phone number last October after seeing the number in an ad in the New York Times.

A salesman told the agent that that Cobalt had been in business for 23 years and there were no sales commissions.

But according to the affidavit, Cobalt was formed in 2003, and sales reps received a commission of $8,000 per unit sold.

The FBI and Securities and Exchange Commission cooperated on the investigation, with search warrants executed Dec. 1 at the Springfield and Great Neck, N.Y., offices.

The trio is charged with securities fraud and conspiracy to commit mail, wire and securities fraud. If convicted, they face a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $5 million fine on the securities fraud charge.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Is Sentenced For Casino Boat Fraud (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey And William Branigin

MIAMI, March 29 -- Jack Abramoff, the once-powerful Washington lobbyist whose downfall has propelled a far-reaching congressional corruption investigation, was sentenced Wednesday to five years and 10 months in prison for his role in the fraudulent purchase of a fleet of casino cruise boats.

U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck sentenced Abramoff, 47, and his former partner Adam Kidan, 41, to the shortest possible prison terms under sentencing guidelines after prosecutors affirmed that both men have been aiding the ongoing investigations and had expressed remorse. Abramoff's attorneys said he has reviewed "thousands of documents" in the inquiry, which could reach members of Congress, congressional staff members and employees of federal agencies, including the Interior Department.

"They're both trying to atone by cooperating," Assistant U.S. Attorney Lawrence D. LaVecchio said in court.

Abramoff, dressed in a gray double-breasted suit, appeared somber and detached during the proceedings. His wife, Pam, also attended.

In a subdued monotone, he told the judge that the day was "incredibly painful" for him, as well as his family and friends.

"Over the past two years, I have started the process of becoming a new man. I am much chastened and profoundly remorseful over the reckless and hurtful things I have done in my life, especially those which have brought me before you today. I can only hope that the Almighty and those whom I have wronged will forgive me my trespasses, and that God grants me the time on this earth to make amends."

Abramoff will also face sentencing in Washington after pleading guilty in January to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He could receive a prison term of more than nine years on those charges, but prosecutors have agreed to recommend that the sentences from that case and the Miami case be served concurrently.

His prison time could be reduced further if he provides substantial assistance to corruption investigators, and both prosecutors and defense attorneys said he has been helpful so far.

"The literally hundreds of hours he has spent, the hundreds of thousands of documents he has reviewed, and the dozens of topics he has been assisting with in themselves would merit a sentence at the bottom of the stipulated range," attorneys Neal Sonnett and Abbe Lowell wrote in a court filing.

What he is telling investigators is not known, however.

"This is not the time to show all he's done," Lowell told the judge Wednesday. That would come later, he said, presumably when the investigation is complete and Abramoff's attorneys ask for a reduced sentence based on his cooperation.

In requesting the minimum sentence for the Florida charges, lawyers for Abramoff and Kidan laid most of the blame on the other for the gambling boat scam, in which the pair faked a $23 million wire transfer to fraudulently obtain a $60 million loan for the 2000 purchase of SunCruz Casinos. Abramoff and Kidan pleaded guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud in the case, and under sentencing guidelines, each faced a minimum of five years and 10 months and a maximum of seven years and three months in prison.

In addition to their prison terms, Huck ordered Abramoff and Kidan to pay $21.7 million in restitution and to serve three years' probation upon their release.

He also agreed to allow them at least 90 days before beginning their sentences so they can continue to cooperate with investigators looking into government corruption and the gangland-style killing in 2001 of former SunCruz owner Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, with whom Abramoff and Kidan quarreled.

Three men have been charged with the killing, one of whom -- allegedly connected to the mafia in New York -- was hired by Kidan to provide catering and security services for SunCruz.

Abramoff and Kidan have denied any involvement in the death.

Abramoff's notoriety is more closely associated with his Washington influence, however. Among the congressmen whose names have come up in the investigation are Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), former chairman of the House Administration Committee, and Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), the former House majority leader.

Ney has been identified as the "Representative #1" who, according to court documents, received bribes from Abramoff in exchange for official acts, including statements in the Congressional Record that promoted the SunCruz deal.

Mark Tuohey, an attorney for Ney, said he and Ney have recently been seeking to persuade prosecutors not to bring charges in Washington or Florida. An agreement Ney signed last fall that waived the five-year statute of limitations on possible charges in Florida will expire in late April. Tuohey said his client will not accept any plea deal.

DeLay, who once described Abramoff as "one of my closest and dearest friends," took three overseas trips with the lobbyist and received more than $70,000 in political contributions from him, his associates and his Indian tribal clients. He has denied any wrongdoing.

Before the sentencing, Abramoff's attorneys sought to portray him as a man who had been unfairly caricatured by newspaper reporters and late-night comics.

They submitted a memo that amounted to a biography, opening with his childhood in Atlantic City; his embrace of Orthodox Judaism at age 13 -- despite his parents' concern that he may be shunned by mainstream society -- the family's move to Beverly Hills and his standing as an All-Conference high school football star there.

The memo followed his career path from national chairman of the College Republicans to his days as a movie producer who forbade foul language, and his work as a lobbyist. Noting his efforts to start a Jewish school, Eshkol Academy in Columbia, Md., and a kosher restaurant, the biography suggests Abramoff's life was more often guided by religion than greed.

Among the court submissions were supportive letters from more than 260 of Abramoff's friends, relatives and associates -- including one from his 12-year-old daughter, Sarah, who wrote that she burst into tears after hearing actor George Clooney joke about her father during the Golden Globe awards ceremony.

"Our five children, all teenagers, love and need their dad," his wife wrote. "I cannot imagine the pain and suffering we would all endure should Jack be incarcerated."

Abramoff Sentenced To More Than 5 Years In Fraud Case (KRT)

By Jay Weaver

Knight Ridder, March 30, 2006

MIAMI - One-time powerhouse lobbyist Jack Abramoff will soon be trading in his pin stripes for prison stripes.

Abramoff was sentenced Wednesday in Miami federal court to a prison term of five years and 10 months for a fraudulent loan deal to buy a South Florida fleet of gambling ships.

His business partner, Adam Kidan of New York, received the same sentence before U.S. District Judge Paul Huck.

The judge ordered both men to pay back $21.7 million to one of the lenders in the 2000 SunCruz Casinos deal. Both were allowed to remain free on bail for at least 90 days while they assist authorities in SunCruz-related criminal investigations.

Huck's courtroom was packed with reporters, prosecutors and gawkers. Most came to witness the somber sentencing of Abramoff, whose influence peddling on Capitol Hill has spawned an array of investigations into the lobbyist's relationships with lawmakers, especially Republicans.

Abramoff had already pleaded guilty in a parallel corruption probe in which he admitted giving members of Congress and their staffers bribes, foreign trips and gourmet meals. Several lawmakers - including an Ohio congressman who operated behind the scenes in the SunCruz deal and other Abramoff activities - may be indicted this spring, according to sources familiar with the case.

"As you can imagine, this day is incredibly painful for my family, friends and me," Abramoff told the judge.

"Over the past two years, I have started the process of becoming a new man. I am much chastened and profoundly remorseful over the reckless and hurtful things I have done in my life, especially those which have brought me before you today," he continued. "I can only hope that the Almighty and those whom I have wronged will forgive my trespasses, and that God grants me the time on this earth to make amends."

Kidan expressed similar sentiments, saying, "I'm completely remorseful and apologetic."

Outside the courthouse, Abramoff - sporting a dark suit and a tan baseball cap - sidestepped the throng of television cameras and other media. He was accompanied by his wife, Pam, and his attorneys, Neal Sonnett and Abbe Lowell.

Wednesday's court hearing marked a dark chapter in the lives of two men who first met in college as Young Republicans and rekindled their friendship with what has proven to be a shady business venture.

Last summer, Abramoff and Kidan were charged with lying to lenders - Foothill Capital, a California-based unit of Wells Fargo, and Citadel Equity Fund Ltd., based in the Cayman Islands - about putting down $23 million to qualify for a $60 million loan to seal the SunCruz deal.

But the pair never made the down payment toward the $147 million purchase, though they sent bogus documents to the lenders that showed they did - the foundation of the wire-fraud conspiracy case.

Abramoff, 47, and Kidan, 41, respectively cut plea deals in January and December to curry favor for shorter sentences. They faced up to seven years and three months under federal sentencing guidelines.

Both men will be allowed to remain free on bail for the next 90 days and possibly longer. They are cooperating with state and federal authorities on two separate investigations related to the SunCruz fraud case.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lawrence LaVecchio - who prosecuted the SunCruz case along with Paul Schwartz and Guy Singer and FBI agent Susan Sprengel - told the judge that the defendants need to be free for now to travel and review documents for authorities.

Both men are supposed to help Broward County, Fla., authorities in their investigation into the February 2001 mob-style murder of SunCruz founder Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, who had been publicly feuding with Kidan over the future of the gambling-ship empire, which eventually filed for bankruptcy. Neither has been charged in connection with Boulis' death.

The Broward State Attorney's Office has charged three defendants with Boulis' murder - including two who had been on the SunCruz payroll and had ties to organized crime.

Abramoff, in particular, is helping both South Florida and Washington federal prosecutors with the broader influence-peddling investigation in the nation's capital.

Abramoff has admitted to allegations about a SunCruz bribery conspiracy as well as his collection of tens of millions of dollars in fraudulent fees from his Indian tribal clients and his payoffs to congressmen.

He faces up to 11 years in the Justice Department corruption case, but his deal with prosecutors allows him to serve the time concurrently with his SunCruz prison term.

Abramoff and Kidan paid themselves $500,000 salaries and diverted $310,000 in SunCruz money for Washington-area sports skyboxes for GOP fundraisers orchestrated by Abramoff. Among them: a fundraiser for Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, a target of the federal probe who could soon be indicted, according to sources familiar with the investigation. Ney denies any wrongdoing.

It was the SunCruz sale almost six years ago that provided momentum for the Justice Department's public corruption probe.

During negotiations of the SunCruz deal in 2000, Abramoff asked his ex-lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, to do him a favor. Scanlon, who has pleaded guilty in the Washington corruption case, once served as a top aide to House Republican leader Tom DeLay.

Scanlon contacted Ney's chief of staff, Neil Volz, to arrange to have the lawmaker publicly disparage SunCruz's owner, Boulis, in the Congressional Record. Ney agreed.

Incriminating e-mails also show that Abramoff and Scanlon approved a $10,000 donation from SunCruz - made at Ney's request - to the National Republican Congressional Committee. Prosecutors say the money was an alleged illegal payback for the congressman's "official act" in the SunCruz sale. The donation was made Nov. 1, 2000.

Authorities are putting pressure on Volz, who once worked as a lobbyist with Abramoff, to turn on Ney, according to sources. But Volz and his defense lawyers have been resisting the Justice Department's overtures. Volz has denied any wrongdoing.

Abramoff Sentenced To 5 Years, 10 Months In Florida (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Kristin Jensen

Bloomberg, March 30, 2006

March 29 (Bloomberg) -- Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist at the center of a Washington corruption scandal, was sentenced to five years and 10 months in prison in an unrelated fraud case in Florida.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in Miami accepted the plea of Abramoff's lawyers for the shortest possible prison time. The lawyers had submitted a 61-page memorandum attesting to Abramoff's character and remorse, along with 262 letters of support, including one from U.S. Representative Dana Rohrabacher, a California Republican.

Abramoff, 47, was given 90 days in which to voluntarily surrender, although Huck said his lawyers could come back and ask for more time. Abramoff is cooperating with investigators in the Washington corruption case, and his lawyers have argued that he needs to remain free to continue those discussions.

``I can only hope that the Almighty and those that I have wronged will forgive my trespasses," Abramoff said to the judge before sentencing.

Before the allegations of fraud and bribery came to light, Abramoff was one of the Republican Party's most prolific fund-raisers and one of Washington's best-connected lobbyists. He raised at least $100,000 for President George W. Bush's re-election campaign in 2004 and counted former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas among his friends.

Casino-Boat Purchase

A grand jury in Florida indicted Abramoff in August on six counts of wire fraud and conspiracy to commit fraud in connection with his $147.5 million purchase of the SunCruz casino-boat company in 2000. Prosecutors said Abramoff and business partner Adam Kidan provided false information on a loan application and used a counterfeit document to mislead lenders.

Abramoff and Kidan had attested that they contributed $23 million in cash toward the SunCruz purchase, a condition of obtaining a $60 million loan. To buttress their claim, they sent a false statement indicating the money had been transferred to the account of SunCruz's former owner, Gus Boulis.

Boulis was killed gangland-style in 2001. Three men were arrested last September and charged with murder.

Abramoff initially pleaded not guilty, then changed his plea on Jan. 4, a day after he admitted to defrauding clients and conspiring to corrupt public officials in a federal court in Washington. Kidan pleaded guilty in December.

Washington Conspiracy

In the Washington case, Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy to corrupt public officials, mail fraud and tax evasion. He faces 30 years in prison in that case, although the Justice Department said it will recommend a reduced sentence depending on how much he cooperates.

The government says Abramoff and former business partner Michael Scanlon, a one-time aide to DeLay, pocketed tens of millions of dollars from Indian-tribe clients; set up a foundation that financed a trip to Scotland for public officials and Abramoff's colleagues; and provided a ``stream of things of value" to officials, including money, meals, trips and entertainment to entice them to help the lobbyist.

At least two Republican lawmakers have been connected to the Florida case. Abramoff listed Rohrabacher as a reference for his loan, the Washington Post reported. And according to the Washington indictment, Representative Bob Ney placed comments in the Congressional Record that were helpful to Abramoff's bid to buy the company. Ney, an Ohio Republican, has denied wrongdoing.

These days, Abramoff is spending much of his time talking to prosecutors and investigators in Washington. His attorneys said he has spent hundreds of hours with them and reviewed hundreds of thousands of documents as part of his cooperation.

Abramoff Sentenced To Almost Six Years (WT/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

MIAMI -- Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced yesterday to nearly six years in prison for committing fraud in the purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

Abramoff, who told the judge that he is working to become a "new man," will remain free while helping prosecutors with a vast bribery investigation involving members of Congress.

Abramoff, 47, and former business partner Adam Kidan, 41, received the minimum under federal guidelines: five years and 10 months.

The two had pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud for concocting a fake $23 million wire transfer to make it appear as if they were contributing their own money toward the purchase of the $147.5 million SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet. Based on that fraudulent transfer, lenders provided the pair with $60 million in financing.

Abramoff told U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck that he had started "the process of becoming a new man."

"I am much chastened and profoundly remorseful," Abramoff said. "I can only hope that the Almighty and those whom I have wronged will forgive me my trespasses."

He and Kidan also were ordered to pay restitution of more than $21 million. Both must serve three years of probation after they get out of prison.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in the SunCruz fraud in January. The same week, he pleaded guilty in Washington to defrauding American Indian tribes and other lobbying clients out of millions of dollars. He also agreed to cooperate in a corruption probe that could involve up to 20 members of Congress, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas. No date has been set for Abramoff's sentencing in that case.

The judge said Abramoff and Kidan will not have to report to prison for at least 90 days so they can continue cooperating in the corruption case and in the investigation into the slaying of former SunCruz owner Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis.

Mr. Boulis was fatally shot in 2001 at the wheel of his car amid a power struggle over the gambling fleet. Three men face murder charges, including one who worked for Kidan as a consultant at SunCruz and who purportedly has ties to New York's Gambino crime family.

Abramoff and Kidan have denied any role in the killing, and neither has been charged.

If prosecutors are satisfied with the cooperation of Abramoff and Kidan in those cases, the two men's sentences could be reduced.

Abramoff and his attorneys declined to speak with reporters as they left court. The defense team filed 62 pages of documents that depicted Abramoff as a deeply religious Orthodox Jew who was generous to charities, dedicated to his wife and five children, and filled with remorse over his crimes.

But the memo also distanced Abramoff from the SunCruz fraud and laid most of the blame on Kidan, a New York businessman and disbarred lawyer.

"After the company was purchased, Mr. Abramoff learned that some of the representations made by his partner were untrue," the defense said.

Kidan's attorney, Joseph Conway, said his client has acknowledged his guilt but disagrees "with the statement of facts as laid out by Mr. Abramoff."

In his own letter to the judge, Kidan said that he knew the SunCruz deal was wrong but that he "was very caught up in the fast-paced world of my partner and the high profile that came along with it."

The SunCruz fleet of 11 ships sailed from nine Florida ports and Myrtle Beach, S.C., to international waters. The company operates gambling cruises under new ownership after emerging from bankruptcy.

Lobbyist In Congress Furor Is Sentenced In Florida Case (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

MIAMI, March 29 — Jack Abramoff, the former superlobbyist at the center of a major corruption investigation in Washington involving members of Congress, was sentenced on Wednesday to 5 years and 10 months in prison on related fraud changes in Florida.

The judge agreed to the prison term, the minimum possible under sentencing guidelines, after prosecutors praised Mr. Abramoff for his cooperation in the Washington inquiry, which centers on accusations that he had tried to bribe public officials, including Republican lawmakers.

In Florida, the case involved charges that Mr. Abramoff and a business partner had defrauded lenders in a gambling cruise-ship line that they bought in 2000 for $147.5 million. Mr. Abramoff still faces sentencing in Washington, where he pleaded guilty to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy.

"In the past two years, I have started the process of becoming a new man," Mr. Abramoff said in a brief appearance before Judge Paul C. Huck of Federal District Court here. "As you can imagine, this day is incredibly painful for my family, my friends and me."

Wearing a gray double-breasted suit and speaking in a grave tone, Mr. Abramoff said he was "profoundly remorseful" for his crimes.

For several minutes before the hearing, Mr. Abramoff, an Orthodox Jew whose lawyers have suggested that he will seek confinement in a prison where he can maintain a strict kosher diet and observe other religious requirements, closed his eyes and appeared to pray, his upper body moving rhythmically back and forth.

Adam Kidan, his former business partner, was sentenced at the hearing to the same prison term as Mr. Abramoff. The two men have agreed to make a total of $20.7 million in restitution as a result of the fraud here, which involved faking documents to get a $60 million loan to buy the SunCruz fleet of gambling ships.

A lingering mystery in the Florida case is why the former owner of SunCruz, Konstantinos Boulis, also known as Gus, was gunned down in a gangland-style ambush in February 2001 in the midst of an angry post-sale dispute with the company's new buyers.

Three men were charged last year in the killing, including one linked to the Gambino crime family. All three had financial links to Mr. Kidan. Both Mr. Kidan and Mr. Abramoff have denied any involvement in Mr. Boulis's death.

Federal prosecutors offered no details about the cooperation they had received from Mr. Abramoff since the plea agreement with the Justice Department was announced in January. But their comments on Wednesday should deepen the concern in Washington among lawmakers and others who are under scrutiny over their ties to the lobbyist.

"I've spent a lot of time with both men," said Lawrence D. LaVecchio, an assistant United States attorney in Miami in the case, referring to Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Kidan. "They are both trying to atone."

Mr. LaVecchio said he was planning to ask Judge Huck to delay confinement of Mr. Abramoff for at least six months, allowing prosecutors in Washington to continue debriefing him outside of prison. The judge granted only 90 days' delay but suggested that he was open to another postponement at the request of the Justice Department.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, Mr. Abramoff could have received up to seven years and three months in prison for his crimes here. He faces up to 11 years in prison as a result of his plea accord in the Washington case. Under his agreement with the Justice Department, Mr. Abramoff will be allowed to serve any prison terms concurrently. His overall prison time could be cut at the request of prosecutors.

After the hearing Wednesday, Mr. Abramoff's lawyers, Neal R. Sonnett in Miami and Abbe D. Lowell in Washington, said in a joint statement that "today's sentencing is another step in Mr. Abramoff's sincere commitment to accept responsibility for his actions."

"He will continue to work hard to fully cooperate with the Department of Justice and law enforcement agencies and to make restitution to all victims," they said. "This is the course he set out many months ago and the course he intends to follow and complete no matter how long it takes."

In the Washington case, Mr. Abramoff is accused with another former business partner, Michael Scanlon, of conspiring to provide illegal gifts to members of Congress in exchange for legislation and other actions.

There are clear links between the two investigations. In the Florida case, Mr. Abramoff has acknowledged that he asked that Representative Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican who recently stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee, to enter statements in the Congressional Record praising Mr. Kidan and condemning Mr. Boulis over the SunCruz sale. Mr. Ney, who went on a lavish golfing holiday in Scotland that was arranged by Mr. Abramoff, has been subpoenaed by the federal grand jury in Washington and has denied wrongdoing, saying he was duped by Mr. Abramoff.

Abramoff Is Sentenced To Five Years, 10 Months In Florida Fraud Case (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Republican super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced to five years and 10 months in prison for fraud related to his 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling cruise ships in Florida.

But his ultimate prison term won't be known until he is sentenced in Washington as part of a Department of Justice investigation into corruption by Mr. Abramoff and more than a dozen lawmakers and congressional aides.

Mr. Abramoff faces between 9.5 and 11 years in prison for his role in trying to bribe public officials and defraud his lobbying clients.

Mr. Abramoff's sentences can be served concurrently and may by reduced depending on how much he helps the Justice Department's ongoing corruption investigation.

"Over the past two years, I have started the process of becoming a new man," Mr. Abramoff told the court. "I am much chastened and profoundly remorseful over the reckless and hurtful things I have done in my life, especially those which have brought me before you today."

Mr. Abramoff has said that it could take years for him to tell prosecutors about his contracts with members of Congress and their aides. On Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in Miami said Mr. Abramoff won't have to report to prison for at least 90 days so he can continue to cooperate with prosecutors.

In January, Mr. Abramoff pled guilty in a federal courthouse in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He agreed to cooperate with the Department of Justice investigation in exchange for a reduced prison sentence.

The following day, Mr. Abramoff pled guilty in Florida to faking a $23 million wire transfer in order to secure the financing that he and two partners needed for a $147.5 million purchase of the SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet.

One business partner, Adam Kidan, also pled guilty in Florida on Wednesday and faces a similar sentence.

The Justice Department is investigating Mr. Abramoff's contacts with several lawmakers and Capitol Hill aides, including Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas), Rep. Bob Ney (R., Ohio) and Sen. Conrad Burns (R., Mont.). Each lawmaker has denied wrongdoing.

In his plea deal in January, Mr. Abramoff admitted to trying to bribe public officials with meals, gifts, overseas trips, greens fees and cash.

The plea also turned up the pressure on Mr. DeLay. Mr. Abramoff told prosecutor that he sought the help of DeLay's deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, by bringing him to the U.S. Open in June 2000 and paying his wife $50,000. In exchange, Mr. Abramoff said in his plea deal, Mr. Rudy helped defeat two bills that would have hurt Mr. Abramoff's clients.

Mr. Rudy's lawyer, Laura Miller, did not return calls seeking comment.

Another former DeLay aide, Michael Scanlon, pled guilty to bribery charges in November.

Abramoff Gets Nearly Six Years (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

Former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and an ex-business partner were sentenced to 70 months in prison on Wednesday and ordered to pay $21.7 million in restitution by a federal judge in Miami, but the one-time K Street superstar won't find himself behind bars right away.

Instead, Judge Paul C. Huck of the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida will allow Abramoff to remain free for at least three more months so he can continue to cooperate with federal prosecutors running a bribery and corruption probe that has touched more than a dozen lawmakers and former Capitol Hill staffers.

Abramoff also may have to take the witness stand this spring in the upcoming trial of former Bush administration official David Safavian. Safavian, who has been charged with lying to federal investigators over his business dealings with Abramoff, is scheduled to go on trial on May 22 in Washington, D.C., and Abramoff is expected to be the government's star witness in that case.

The nearly six-year jail sentence meted out to Abramoff, who lobbied Republicans exclusively, was immediately pounced on by Capitol Hill Democrats.

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a longtime Abramoff nemesis, called for a special prosecutor to investigate Abramoff's lobbying on behalf of the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas Islands — one of Abramoff's most lucrative clients — as well as Abramoff's dealings with Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and other lawmakers on CNMI-related issues.

"Abramoff's shady activities span from the Florida casino deal all the way to the Northern Mariana Islands in the Pacific Ocean, where for years Abramoff successfully lobbied Tom DeLay and the Republican House of Representatives to protect a cruel system of human trafficking and sweatshop labor," Miller said in a statement released by his office.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee slammed several GOP lawmakers, including Reps. John Doolittle (Calif.), Phil English (Pa.), Richard Pombo (Calif.), and Charles Taylor (N.C.), for failing to give up "tainted" campaign contributions from Abramoff. Democratic leaders are also expected to go to the House floor in coming days to call for an ethics committee probe into Abramoff's ties to House Republicans, according to Democratic insiders.

Wednesday's sentencing hearing was only the first of a two-part legal challenge facing Abramoff.

The former lobbyist pleaded guilty earlier this year in two separate federal cases — one in Miami, the other in Washington — and will be sentenced separately in the Washington case at a future date. The next status hearing for that case is set for June 6, and Abramoff faces as much as 11 years in prison after admitting to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. Abramoff will serve whatever sentences he receives in the two cases concurrently.

The 70-month sentence handed down to Abramoff on Wednesday in Miami was the minimum he could have received under his plea agreement with the Justice Department, and it could be reduced even further, depending on Abramoff's continued help to DOJ in the Washington corruption probe.

The details of Abramoff's incarceration, including when he will head to prison and where he will serve his time, have yet to be worked out. His lawyers have lobbied Huck and the Justice Department to allow him to be sent to a federal prison located close to his wife and five children, who live in Maryland.

In the Sunshine State case, Abramoff and Kidan admitted to creating a phony wire transfer in September 2000 that stated that they had committed $23 million of their own funds to the purchase of SunCruz Casinos, a Florida-based casino cruise-ship company. The fraudulent wire transfer helped Abramoff and Kidan garner $60 million in loans to complete the SunCruz purchase.

But shortly after taking over SunCruz, Kidan had a falling out with the former owner of the company, Greek immigrant Gus Boulis, and SunCruz quickly ended up in bankruptcy. Boulis was murdered in February 2001, and several men with ties to Kidan have been arrested and charged with his murder. Both Abramoff and Kidan deny any knowledge of the circumstances surrounding Boulis' death, although Huck will now allow the two to be questioned by law-enforcement officials investigating the case.

On Jan. 4, a day after entering a guilty plea in the Washington case, Abramoff admitted to conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. Kidan had pleaded to similar charges on Dec. 15.

In the weeks leading up to Wednesday's sentencing hearing, Abramoff's lawyers had mounted an extensive letter-writing campaign asking Huck for leniency. They also attempted to shift some of the blame for the SunCruz debacle to Kidan, while Kidan's lawyers said their client had gotten caught up in Abramoff's high-profile lifestyle.

In his appearance before Huck, Abramoff expressed remorse for his criminal actions, as he has done repeatedly since he first pleaded guilty to federal charges in January.

"As you can imagine, this day is incredibly painful for my family, friends and me," Abramoff said in a statement read to a packed courtroom. "Over the past two years, I have started the process of becoming a new man. I am much chastened and profoundly remorseful over the reckless and hurtful things I have done in my life, especially those which have brought me before you today. I can only hope that the Almighty and those whom I have wronged will forgive me my trespasses, and that God grants me the time on this earth to make amends."

Abbe Lowell and Neal Sonnett, Abramoff's attorneys, pledged in a statement released after the sentencing that their client would continue to cooperate with the Justice Department as it attempts to unravel the biggest corruption scandal to hit official Washington in decades.

"Today's sentencing is another step in Mr. Abramoff's sincere commitment to accept responsibility for his actions," Lowell and Sonnett said in a statement. "He will continue to work hard to fully cooperate with the Department of Justice and law enforcement agencies and to make restitution to all victims. This is the course he set out many months ago and the course he intends to follow and complete no matter how long it takes."

Abramoff May Stay Out Of Jail Until D.C. Investigation Is Over (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, March 30, 2006

Jack Abramoff was sentenced to 70 months in prison yesterday on conspiracy and fraud charges tied to his purchase of a South Florida casino fleet, but the infamous lobbyist could stay out of jail until federal prosecutors finish their wide-ranging probe of influence peddling and corruption on Capitol Hill.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in the Florida case in January, one day after signing a plea deal in Washington that calls for him to help government lawyers investigating the Congress members and aides involved in his vast lobbying network. Abramoff and former business partner Adam Kidan admitted faking a $23 million wire transfer in 2000 to help obtain a loan financing their $148 million purchase of the SunCruz Casinos boats.

"I have started the process of becoming a new man," Abramoff said yesterday in remarks prepared for delivery to the court. "I am much chastened and profoundly remorseful over the reckless and hurtful things I have done in my life, especially those which have brought me before you today."

The Justice Department had secured a two-week delay from U.S. District Judge Paul Huck, citing Abramoff's cooperation with the Washington probe, which could implicate as many as 20 members of Congress and their aides. Huck ultimately chose the minimum prison term allowable under federal guidelines, giving Kidan the same sentence.

The Florida case is largely separate from the bribery and fraud charges Abramoff faces in Washington over his lobbying for multiple Indian tribes, an Israeli wireless company and other clients. Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), referred to in the Washington plea agreement, also inserted comments in the Congressional Record in March 2000 aimed at embarrassing Abramoff's rival in the SunCruz purchase.

Ney has long maintained that he was never involved with Abramoff's crimes and contends that the federal investigation eventually will exonerate him.

Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, the owner who eventually sold the SunCruz fleet to Abramoff and Kidan, was killed in a gangland-style shooting shortly after the sale. Prosecutors have ruled out Abramoff as a suspect in the murder case, according to published reports.

While Huck ordered Abramoff to report for the start of his sentence within 90 days, an extension could be granted if government prosecutors and defense attorneys agree that Abramoff needs more time to share information in the Washington probe. U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvane agreed this month to postpone Abramoff's status conference in the Washington case, originally scheduled for last week, until June to encourage his further cooperation.

Abramoff will serve his sentence in the Washington case, which could range from nine and a half to 11 years, concurrently with his Florida prison term.

Abbe Lowell and Neal Sonnett, Abramoff's attorneys, said the low sentence would not chill Abramoff's participation in the congressional investigation.

"He will continue to work hard to fully cooperate with the Department of Justice and law enforcement agencies and to make restitution to all victims," Lowell and Sonnett said in a statement. "This is the course he set out many months ago and the course he intends to follow and complete no matter how long it takes."

Abramoff has sardonically remarked on lawmakers' eagerness to distance themselves from his toxic reputation, and few members of Congress were commenting publicly on yesterday's sentencing. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), however, wrote to Huck urging him to consider Abramoff's patriotism and positive qualities, one of more than 260 letters the judge received asking for mercy on the lobbyist once famous for his excesses.

Rohrabacher, who reportedly was listed as an Abramoff reference for the SunCruz loan at issue in the case, did not return a request for comment by press time.

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), who has pressed the Bush administration to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate Abramoff's lobbying on behalf of the Northern Mariana Islands territories, said the case is far from closed.

"Complete justice will not be served until all of Abramoff's activities and connections are exposed and all of his partners in crime are punished," Miller said in a statement.

Lawyer: Neither Of 'Mafia Cops' Will Testify (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 30, 2006

The attorney for accused "Mafia Cop" Stephen Caracappa said Wednesday his client won't take the witness stand in his federal racketeering trial.

Ed Hayes, who is representing Caracappa in the Brooklyn federal court case, had earlier floated the possibility that the defendant might testify in his own defense. But at the close of Wednesday's court session, Hayes told Judge Jack B. Weinstein that Caracappa elected to stay off the witness stand. He didn't elaborate.

News of Caracappa's decision came as prosecutors neared the end of their case against him and his former NYPD partner, Louis Eppolito. Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch told Weinstein that the government expected to rest its case this morning.

Caracappa, 64, and Eppolito, 57, are on trial facing charges that they played roles in eight gangland murders while working as moles for the Luchese crime family in the late 1980s and early 1990s. By 1992 both men had retired as detectives.

Hayes did say he expected to call two or three witnesses. Eppolito isn't testifying but is expected to submit documents to the court for the jury to consider.

Hayes and Eppolito's attorney Bruce Cutler will attempt to hold an unusual telephone conference call outside the court today with imprisoned mobster Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. It is Casso, prosecutors contend, who paid Eppolito and Caracappa for sensitive law enforcement information that investigators believe was used to carry out homicides, expose informants and tip off gangsters of impending arrests.

Once the acting boss of the Luchese crime family in the early 1990s, Casso turned government witness in 1994 but was never called to testify in any trial because of problems with his credibility, officials have said. He is currently serving a life sentence for racketeering and had admitted his roles in numerous homicides, including some charged against Eppolito and Caracappa.

It is likely that Hayes and Cutler want to see if Casso has any information that would call into question the testimony of key government witnesses such as Burton Kaplan, who testified he was the intermediary between the mob and the retired detectives.

Weinstein set closing arguments in the case for Monday, the beginning of the fourth week of the trial.

Both Eppolito and Caracappa, who are free on $5-million bail but under house arrest, face life in prison if convicted.

Cop's Att'y Sez Hush (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 30, 2006

Reputed Mafia cop Stephen Caracappa wants to take the stand in his own defense - but his lawyer has overruled him.

"He sort of wanted to do it [testify] and I didn't want him to," lawyer Edward Hayes said yesterday. "I think there's a lot of problems with the government's case and I don't need to put him on."

The government plans to rest its case today against Caracappa and his former NYPD partner, Louis Eppolito, after 12 days and 25 witnesses, including gripping testimony from Mafia turncoats who claim the detectives were hit men for the Mafia and leaked confidential information to the Luchese crime family for years.

Caracappa is the thin, quiet guy who shuns the limelight; Eppolito is fat, loud and wrote an autobiography called "Mafia Cop" revealing his family's mob lineage.

Since their arrests last March, Caracappa's only public statement has been an interview earlier this year on "60 Minutes" in which he vehemently denied the charges.

Hayes plans to call three witnesses: a retired detective who will say Caracappa worked 32 hours straight on the Rabbi Meir Kahane murder investigation the day before gangster Edward Lino was gunned down in Brooklyn, suggesting Caracappa was too tired to whack anyone.

He also will call an excavator to testify about the difficulty of digging a grave with only shovels in February when the ground is frozen, as a witness claimed, and an expert on money laundering to attack the credibility of chief witness Burton Kaplan, who was once sued by an Antiguan bank.

Eppolito's side will admit documents showing he was awarded numerous citations during his police career.

Yesterday, Eppolito's lawyer Bruce Cutler did nothing to refute a Las Vegas man who testified he saw Eppolito and Kaplan meeting there twice in 1995. Previously, Eppolito told reporters he had not seen Kaplan since 1989.

'MOB COP' WON'T TAKE THE STAND (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 30, 2006

Accused mob cop Stephen Caracappa is not going to take the witness stand at his racketeering trial, his defense team said yesterday.

The announcement ended speculation that the reputed Mafia associate would try to talk himself out of charges that he and his former NYPD partner, Louis Eppolito, helped pass information to gangsters and even whacked a Gambino crime family member.

"I think there are a lot of problems with the case, and I'm not going to put the guy on," said Caracappa's lawyer, Ed Hayes.

While Eppolito is expected not to mount any defense against the prosecution case, which his lawyers believe to be weak, Caracappa is considering presenting an odd array of evidence.

An expert on hole digging is set to testify, in apparent response to a Brooklyn parking-lot owner who testified that he was forced to bury the body of a jeweler who was whacked with help from the cops.

Also, a former co-worker of Caracappa's will testify that the then-cop worked for 30 hours straight before he allegedly whacked gangster Ed Lino in 1990 - implying the detective would have been too tired to have played hit man.

Prosecutors are expected to rest their case today. Before they do, they will join with the defense in a conference call with jailed Luchese mob boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso.

It is not clear what they will talk about, but Casso has allegedly tried in the past to testify against the cops to save himself jail time. Authorities have not considered him a reliable witness.

Listen To The Testimony: Only The Sleazy Know This Brooklyn (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

It could be argued that one of the most intriguing characters in the trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa is not a person, but a place. As absorbing as the witnesses, the lawyers and the two defendants is the borough of Brooklyn, which has arisen in the trial as something like an empire of the ill-fated and often illicitly employed.

Countless times, Brooklyn — or specifically southern Brooklyn — has been painted as a universe of two-bit deals and three-time losers, of gangster bars and catering halls and auto-body shops. It has come to seem in testimony like a world where people are forever swapping envelopes of cash and owing money to their loan sharks and their mothers — a world of which a witness could say, without a whiff of irony, "I was having some bad times and I committed bank robbery," or "a few times back in the 80's people paid me to make their cars disappear."

If one believes the government, Brooklyn is the place where Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64, former New York City detectives, committed their most heinous crimes, taking part in at least eight murders for the mob. The evidence at the trial has necessarily focused on its more desolate locales: not on the gold dome of Borough Hall or the red-brick streets of Brooklyn Heights, but on places like Garage No. 4 at Valiant Towing on Nostrand Avenue or the parking lot of the Flatbush Avenue Toys "R" Us, which borders on a marsh.

As described by Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler (himself born and raised in Flatbush), this particular embodiment of Brooklyn often leads a man to one of three places: to "jail, death or the witness stand." So far, this trial has seen or heard of several men who have ended up in one of those locations. In a few instances, they have ended up in two.

Demographers have noted that if Brooklyn were severed from the other boroughs, it would stand as the fourth-most-populous city in the nation, though, according to testimony at the trial, it can apparently feel as tiny as an Appalachian hamlet.

Last week, for instance, Detective Joe Piraino, a government witness, told the jury he had once been partners with a man named Jack Ryan. Mr. Ryan was sitting in court, as a private investigator for the defense.

Then there was the strange coincidence yesterday in which it was revealed that another government witness had once worked at the same Toys "R" Us where prosecutors say that Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa had delivered a kidnapped gangster to Anthony Casso, their patron in the mob. This witness, Thomas Licata, was in fact the very man who testified to having once robbed a bank during "bad times" and to making people's cars disappear.

Mr. Licata is a Brooklynite's Brooklynite, or at least the sort of Brooklynite who has constantly appeared at trial. He was raised in Bensonhurst and Flatbush, went to Erasmus Hall High and, aside from Toys "R" Us held jobs at a chicken place and an Italian deli in his youth.

As an older man, he got involved in the towing business and told the jury that his partners, Frank and Leo (he never mentioned their last names) were, or claimed to be, involved with organized crime. "At the time, I wanted to be with them," said Mr. Licata, a man so energetically on the make that, he testified, he stripped inspection stickers from used cars and then resold them.

When Peter Franzone, the former owner of Mr. Licata's towing company, testified Tuesday, he told the jury that he employed "a kid named Louie," three guys named Michael, Carl and Jimmy, and Jimmy's brother-in-law, Joe. It made a sort of Brooklyn sense that a homeless man named Al lived in some kind of container at the back of the lot, he said.

Nor was it incredible when Mr. Licata testified to owing nearly $20,000 to three loan sharks — a situation he was in because, "I was trying to build my business and also living above my means."

Eventually, the borough got to him and, in 1990, he moved to California. "I had enough of everyone," he said, "had enough of paying everybody, had enough of what was going on."

Within six months, he was back.

Revamped Ryan Jury Starts Deliberations Over Again (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 30, 2006

The revamped jury in former Gov. George Ryan's trial began a second round of deliberations Wednesday.

A quick verdict appeared remote after jurors sent out a note asking for a calendar for April to determine if there were any coming court holidays.

The jury also sought an overhead projector and a list of witnesses from the marathon trial.

Deliberations began anew after presiding U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer excused two jurors, replaced them with alternates and ordered that the historic trial continue.

Pallmeyer said she might still declare a mistrial if she decided the deliberations were unfair to Ryan or co-defendant Lawrence Warner, a lobbyist.

The defense had argued "that we cease proceedings right now," the judge disclosed Tuesday in announcing her decision following hours of closed-door discussions with lawyers and individual interviews of jurors.

The two jurors were excused on Monday after the Tribune last week uncovered that both had apparently concealed their arrest records during jury selection in September.

The original jury had deliberated eight days amid signs of personal rancor before the judge suspended deliberations.

In ordering that the deliberations begin anew with two new members, Pallmeyer told jurors to "treat this case as if the prior deliberations did not occur."

Toward that end, she ordered the jury room "cleansed" by removing any materials left from the initial deliberations, including notes, charts, a list of the trial's 117 witnesses and an overhead projector.

Not long after restarting deliberations at 9:30 a.m., the jury sought the return of the projector and the witness list as well as the April court calendar.

It appeared from the note that the same juror remained as forewoman.

Pallmeyer acceded to the jury's requests, noting in a written response that there are no court holidays in April but that Passover begins on April 12 and Good Friday occurs on April 14.

"You are free to set your own schedule for deliberations," the judge wrote.

The six-man, six-woman jury deliberated for about 5½ hours Wednesday before recessing for the night. Deliberations are scheduled to resume Thursday morning.

In the initial deliberations, jurors didn't meet on Fridays, keeping to the schedule set during the 5½-month trial.

On Wednesday, at least a couple of the jurors were seen exercising during breaks in a stairwell in the high-rise Dirksen U.S. Courthouse as they had during the initial deliberations.

Former FBI Agents Rally Behind Colleague Suspected Of NY Mob Ties (NSDY/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer
Long Island Newsday, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK -- Several former high-ranking FBI agents have launched a campaign to help a fellow mob investigator fight allegations that have haunted him for well over a decade _ that he traded deadly secrets with the mob.

The retired agent, R. Lindley DeVecchio, planned to surrender Wednesday night at the Brooklyn district attorney's office to face undisclosed criminal charges, his supporters said.

"We all know Lin, and we all know he's not capable of doing these kinds of things," said James Kossler, a former supervisor with the FBI's New York office. "This is like a bad movie. ... It's so sad it could happen to a guy like this."

Prosecutors were expected to announce an indictment against DeVecchio on Thursday. They declined to discuss the case Wednesday.

Authorities have said an investigation revisited DeVecchio's past relationship with Gregory Scarpa Jr. _ a ruthless Colombo crime family captain he had recruited as an informant _ and whether the agent provided information that helped the gangster knock off rivals in the 1980s and '90s.

If indicted, DeVecchio, 65, would "deny the charges in the strongest way possible," said his attorney, Mark Bederow. "He's innocent."

Kossler, former FBI assistant director James Kallstrom, ex-agent Joe Pistone, known for infiltrating the mob as Donnie Brasco, and other supporters from the federal law enforcement community have begun raising money for DeVecchio's defense on a Web site. The site notes that the agent already was cleared in previous investigations, and it attributes the renewed allegations to convicted mob turncoats eager to lie in exchange for leniency.

DeVecchio headed the FBI's Colombo squad while the crime family was embroiled in a bloody power struggle. After Scarpa became an informant, they became so close the mobster referred to the agent as his "girlfriend" when speaking in code.

Federal prosecutors revealed in 1995 that they suspected that DeVecchio provided Scarpa the names of other gangsters cooperating with the FBI. He also was accused of tipping off his gangster friend that the Drug Enforcement Administration was planning to arrest his son and that authorities had bugged his social club.

But the Department of Justice declined to prosecute DeVecchio after an internal probe, and the agent quietly retired in 1996.

Scarpa died in prison in 1994 after contracting HIV in a blood transfusion from one of his crime family associates.

'I Have No Clue On Mafia Charges' (NYDN)

By Angela Mosconi, Special To The News
New York Daily News, March 30, 2006

ABOARD DELTA FLIGHT 2057 - In the last moments before his surrender, former FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio insisted he was no mob mole.

In an exclusive interview, DeVecchio said his imminent indictment was a complete mystery to him.

"Maybe you can enlighten me about all of this," he smiled. "Maybe you can tell me what it's all about."

From his window seat toward the rear of the flight from Tampa to New York, DeVecchio tried to dance around the indictment, saying firmly, "I can't talk about it right now."

He kept silent hours later, ignoring a barrage of questions from reporters outside the Brooklyn district attorney's office, where he surrendered.

But on the plane, DeVecchio pointed out that a previous investigation by the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility found nothing amiss - certainly nothing that would support allegations that he gave Mafia capo Greg Scarpa Sr. secret intelligence that helped the mobster track and kill rivals and informants for more than eight years ending in 1992.

"I was cleared by the OPR," he said. Then the tanned but tired-looking suspect sighed and said, "You'll have to ask the DA about this \[new charges\]."

DeVecchio, 65, appeared calm when he arrived at Tampa Airport in plenty of time for his 12:45 p.m. flight, casually clad in a navy pinstriped shirt, jeans and white sneakers.

But he got progressively more nervous, talking quickly to someone on his cell phone and eyeballing other passengers suspiciously.

Between short naps on the flight, DeVecchio chewed vigorously on strawberry-flavored gum, drank sparkling water, repeatedly sighed and often checked his silver-gold Rolex. He watched President Bush talk about Iraq on TV for a while, then changed the channel to a documentary on Benjamin Franklin and a story about hurricanes.

Twenty minutes before landing, a reporter approached him.

"How did you find me?" he asked incredulously. "I'm really impressed. . . . You're in the wrong line of work."

During the 21/2-hour flight to LaGuardia, DeVecchio admitted, "I'm surrendering tonight, but I certainly would feel better if this wasn't so."

Then the conversation shifted to DeVecchio's home in Sarasota, Fla.

"It's very nice," he said wistfully, looking out the window at Queens. "It's quiet there."

Later, DeVecchio's lawyer, Mark Bederow, said of the 33-year FBI agent, "He's innocent. These are baseless allegations that are predicated on fabricated testimony. "My client was a distinguished agent with an exemplary career," he said.

Some high-ranking agents who once worked with DeVecchio have set up a Web site to raise money for his defense. They've also called for a big turnout at DeVecchio's arraignment today. DeVecchio wouldn't talk about his relationship with the late Scarpa, a mob informant he handled.

"But I do know where I'll be staying, courtesy of the DA," he joked. "The Brooklyn Detention Center."

Not just yet. DeVecchio spent last night under guard on a cot in the DA's office.

G-MAN BLOOD MONEY (NYPOST)

The New York Post, March 30, 2006

FBI AGENT CASHED IN AS MAFIA SLAY MOLE: DA

ROGUE FBI top gun Lindley DeVecchio allegedly raked in hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes from a murderous Mafia chieftain in exchange for selling him federal secrets and helping participate in at least four gangland assassinations, The Post has learned.

Exposing one of the worst corruption scandals in U.S. history, investigators from the office of Brooklyn DA Charles Hynes have unearthed a mountain of shocking new evidence - including witnesses from both sides of the law - unmasking DeVecchio's unholy alliance with fearsome Colombo crime family acting boss Gregory Scarpa Sr., who was known inside the Mafia as "The Grim Reaper."

DeVecchio turned himself in to prosecutors in Brooklyn last night. An indictment against him is expected to be unsealed as early as today.

DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas Grover, would not comment on the case.

"We'll save it for the courtroom," he said.

For more than a decade, DeVecchio - a supervisory special agent in charge of the Colombo family squad - allegedly served as a mole, enabling Scarpa's brutal empire to eliminate government informants in their ranks, competitors trying to poach their territory and anyone who was a possible threat to his faction during the infamous Colombo wars.

In one vicious execution, DeVecchio allegedly called Scarpa "in a panic" and ordered him to kill Patrick Porco, 18, after learning from his agents in the FBI's Colombo squad that Porco had been hauled into the 62nd Precinct station house for questioning on a murder.

"You have to kill him," DeVecchio allegedly told his mob crony.

The evidence against DeVecchio in three other murders is just as startling:

* After beautiful Mary Bari was lured to her execution - partly because DeVecchio said she was a rat - he allegedly voiced his amazement that the body of Colombo big Alphonse "Allie Boy" Persico's former girlfriend was dumped on a street so close to Scarpa's Bensonhurst home.

"You got some pair of balls," DeVecchio told Scarpa, sources said, describing an account from a new witness who testified before the grand jury.

The ravishing Bari showed up for a job interview at a Scarpa-connected club wearing a halter top and high heels, and Scarpa greeted her initially with a playful hug around her head and then started squeezing her down to the floor where she was shot three times, including once behind the ear - a Scarpa trademark - to ensure she was dead.

"They dumped her on the street like the garbage," one investigator said.

* DeVecchio allegedly used his FBI squad to track the movements of a Scarpa rival, Lorenzo Lampasi, and provided Scarpa with the FBI's insight of him in order for Scarpa's hit team to best catch him by surprise.

DOJ_NMG_0024115

And they did - easily stepping up to Lampasi, just as DeVecchio had predicted, after Lampasi exited his car on May 1992 to lock a gate behind him outside his Brooklyn home.

* It was DeVecchio who allegedly instructed Scarpa to whack another of his disloyal underlings, Joseph DeDomenico, after learning from his FBI organized-crime investigators that DeDomenico was pulling off burglaries behind Scarpa's back.

The FBI supervisor allegedly believed DeDomenico had to go - after all, he was not "kicking up" any profits to Scarpa. DeDomenico was killed inside his Buick Regal on Sept. 17, 1987.

Law-enforcement officials familiar with DeVecchio investigation and the separate case involving two retired NYPD detectives dubbed the "Mafia cops" - also largely unmasked by Hynes' investigators - say DeVecchio is a "more horrendous instance of corruption."

"DeVecchio was a boss, a supervisor," one source said. "He was not just some detective, or two. You don't see cases with federal law-enforcement officials in position with the ability to cover up because they are the head of a squad or unit. He was getting the intelligence - and using it to kill people."

And his motives: greed and adulation from his bosses.

DeVecchio was allegedly paid hundreds of thousands of dollars from the Colombo crime family - often in cash stuffed in envelopes - and was so brazen, he even pocketed money the feds had earmarked for Scarpa as payment for being an informant.

That money totaled more than $60,000, witnesses have told the DA.

DeVecchio's shocking indictment culminates nearly four decades of criminal activity involving the mercenary Scarpa.

Scarpa himself became a secret informant in the 1960s, working for the FBI and acting as a double agent inside in the Colombo crime family, ensuring he had an "insurance policy" against prosecution.

At the time, Scarpa - known as a ruthless hood who enjoyed killing - was also a flashy dresser who often carried a $5,000 wad of cash, with homes on Sutton Place, Las Vegas and in Brooklyn and Staten Island.

A rising star in the Colombo family, Scarpa would years later align himself with the faction run by mob boss Carmine Persico when a war broke out with a faction headed by Vic Orena, who refused to give up the family's reins to Persico's son, "Allie Boy."

By the 1970s, Scarpa was a top capo operating a Bensonhurst crew and was arrested numerous times on weapons charges, assault, fencing hijacked liquor, bookmaking and loan-sharking, but barely spent time in jail.

Around 1980, DeVecchio took over the Colombo FBI squad and "reactivated" Scarpa as a mole. He used him virtually up until the time Scarpa went to jail and died of AIDS, and DeVecchio's alleged wrongdoing surfaced.

By then, his Colombo crime family was roiled in an internal war that left a dozen bodies across the city.

In 1994, Scarpa died at age 66 - just as his secret life as an FBI mole surfaced.

His son, Gregory Jr., tried to blow the whistle on DeVecchio, and ultimately prompted a congressional inquiry by William Delahunt, a Massachusetts Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Delahunt enlisted the help of forensic investigator Angela Clemente to assist in the probing the sordid tale, which got the attention of writers such as Peter Lance.

In February 2005, the congressman decided to hand off his thick files on Scarpa to Hynes, whose office was making news chasing crooked judges, political boss Clarence Norman and the alleged mob cops.

The DA initially probed the long-running allegation that DeVecchio had pulled a FBI surveillance team off Colombo capo Nicholas Grancio so that Scarpa could whack him.

Allegations that DeVecchio helped set up Grancio had swirled for years and he had been investigated by the FBI's internal inspections unit, which cleared DeVecchio because the agents left Grancio by coincidence to attend a meeting.

But investigators discovered the real events of that fateful day - Scarpa had a police scanner with a secret FBI frequency and heard when the FBI agents departed.

That evidence started the chain of events that led to DeVecchio's indictment in the four other murders.

Hit Suspects To Join Mob-linked G-Man (NYDN)

By William Sherman, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, March 30, 2006

Two hit men who allegedly killed targets pointed out by retired FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio will be arraigned alongside him this afternoon, the Daily News has learned.

The thugs were arrested this week and charged separately in the slaying of a beautiful mob moll and a 17-year-old boy, sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0024116

Raven-haired beauty Mary Bari and teen Patrick Porco were killed after DeVecchio allegedly told Mafia capo Greg Scarpa Sr. that they were informants squealing on the Colombo crime family about drug dealing and murder, sources said.

DeVecchio, an FBI agent for 33 years, had a close relationship with Scarpa, who was a secret mob informer.

DeVecchio, 65, allegedly provided Scarpa with FBI intelligence on Scarpa's rivals and helped protect his criminal turf.

Investigators also are tracking down large cash payments from Scarpa to DeVecchio.

The identities of the two hit men were not available last night, but both are former soldiers in Scarpa's crew, sources said. It was unclear whether the two would be offered plea deals to testify against DeVecchio.

One of the hit men allegedly killed Porco in 1989 after DeVecchio allegedly tipped off Scarpa that Porco was going to tell cops that Scarpa's sons, including Greg Jr., were involved in drugs and murder.

The second hit man is being charged with Bari's 1984 murder, which allegedly occurred after DeVecchio told Scarpa that Bari, 31, was a paid informant for the FBI.

Bari was the sometime girlfriend of Colombo boss Alphonse (Allie Boy) Persico, a close ally of Scarpa.

After DeVecchio allegedly told the elder Scarpa that Bari was an informant, she was invited to a mob social club in Bensonhurst, Brooklyn, where she was shot to death. Her body was later found dumped in the street.

DeVecchio also is under indictment for the 1987 murder of Joseph (Joe Brewster) DeDomenico as well as the death of mob associate Larry Lampesi in 1992.

Ex-FBI Agent To Be Charged In Gangland Murders (ABC)

Four-Count Indictment Alleges Agent Kept Mobster Informant Informed

NEW YORK, March 29, 2006 — For 30 years, he was one of the FBI 's most important mob busters, but now he is about to be formally charged with helping one mobster commit murder.

Lindley DeVecchio, once a highly respected FBI agent, is expected to be arraigned on second degree murder charges in New York on Thursday for providing specific, "detailed information" to Brooklyn mobster Gregory Scarpa Sr. that enabled the Colombo family captain to eliminate underworld rivals.

DeVecchio was Scarpa's handler, and Scarpa was more than an ordinary stool pigeon — he had also allegedly served as muscle for the FBI when the bureau needed some extra-legal assistance in making difficult cases. As a result, he was allegedly accorded special, sometimes questionable favors, including tips on coming indictments that allowed Scarpa's associates to skip town in advance. But in aiding his informant to commit murder, prosecutors now allege that DeVecchio went too far in protecting his valuable mob asset. Law enforcement sources say DeVecchio may have also enriched himself in the process.

DeVecchio is expected to voluntarily surrender to authorities tonight on four counts of second degree murder contained in the still-sealed indictment that was handed down last week by a Brooklyn grand jury, law enforcement sources and DeVecchio's attorney confirm.

"We've been advised that there is an indictment filed. We have been asked to surrender today," says DeVecchio's attorney, Douglas Grover, a former senior special attorney for the Justice Department's Brooklyn-based Organized Crime Strike Force.

DeVecchio's indictment is the latest chapter in a long, controversial relationship between the FBI and Scarpa that law enforcement sources say dates back to the 1960s and includes the FBI's use of Scarpa to punch, kidnap and pistol-whip suspects. In this relationship, law enforcement sources say, Scarpa served as a well-placed mob stool pigeon who provided the FBI with decades of information against his underworld rivals. In turn, the FBI provided Scarpa with information that allowed his mob associates to skip town before they were indicted, according to law enforcement sources and multiple published reports.

G-Sting: First Witnesses Testify (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, March 30, 2006

Prosecutors in the G-Sting political corruption will call one of their two star witnesses to the stand Thursday morning -- a witness who will acknowledge she took bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi.

New assertions that a conspiracy did not exist between Mike Galardi and Dario Herrera surfaced Wednesday, as well as new information about Mary Kincaid-Chauncey's finances.

On Thursday, this trial is going to be about two words: Erin Kenny.

The former county commissioner took bribes from Galardi to help license his "Jaguars strip club." Through a plea deal, Kenny will testify for federal prosecutors and provide a link from Galardi to Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera.

Jerry Bernstein commented, "That will be interesting. We're looking forward to it."

Bernstein, Dario Herrera's attorney, can't wait for Kenny to take the stand. In court Wednesday, Bernstein played a series of wiretaps from Dec. 2002 of Mike Galardi and Lance Malone on which both made several attempts to contact Herrera that month.

In one wiretap, Galardi says, "I tried Dario. Now it says his phone's not even workin'."

Bernstein wonders that if Herrera was getting paid thousands a month by Galardi, wouldn't he have stayed in touch?

It was also an important day for Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. Her attorney, Richard Wright, said, "There isn't any trace of any money ever being spent in any way or being received other than that which she admits to."

Wright questioned FBI Agent Christopher Byers about a financial investigation the agency conduct on Kincaid-Chauncey. In court, Byers testified: "There was no significant trend of spending or purchases that I observed."

Kincaid-Chauncey acknowledges receiving $5,000 for a grandson's ski school tuition and $3,800 for her son's North Las Vegas City Council campaign. But Wright asserts Kincaid-Chauncey solicited those funds as donations, not bribes.

The G-Sting trial resumes Thursday at 8:30 a.m. at George Federal Court. Again, Erin Kenny will take the witness stand.

George Federal Courthouse -- March 29 -- 1:10 p.m.

Dario Herrera's attorney Jerry Bernstein told the jury prosecutors were attempting to mislead them by playing a Nov. 2002 wiretap where Lance Malone tells Herrera, quote, "Mike wanted me to sit down with you and see what we could come up with before you leave."

At the time Herrera had lost a race for congress and was going to be leaving the county commission in about a month and a half.

Prosecutors implied this wiretap shows one last collaboration on Galardi's behalf, but Bernstein played three wiretaps from Dec. of 2002, wiretaps the prosecutors did not play were Malone and Galardi complain about not being able to get in touch with Herrera.

Bernstein says this shows Herrera wanted nothing to do with them and was never a part of their team.

FBI Agent Byers also testified the agency wiretapped the OnStar communication system in Malone's car and tried to bug a booth at Ruth's Chris Steak House on Paradise Road, a frequent hangout of Herrera's.

George Federal Courthouse -- March 29 -- 10:15 a.m.

FBI agent Christopher Byers testified this morning that for a 10-month period in 2002, his agency had an inside informant working at Mike Galardi's Cheetahs strip club. The insider is identified as Tony Montanya and Byers testified while he worked at Cheetahs he wore a concealed audio recorder.

Upon cross-examination by Dario Herrera's attorney Jerry Bernstein, Byers told the court Montanya never saw Herrera or recorded any conversation where Herrera or bribes were discussed.

Of the four remaining Clark County commissioners who served during the time of the G-Sting investigation, only three have been interviewed by the FBI -- Bruce Woodbury, Myrna Williams, and Chip Maxfield were interviewed by FBI agents last month. Commissioner Yvonne Atkinson-Gates has never been interviewed. Bernstein did not ask Byers why.

Bernstein also continued to work on chipping away at the credibility of Galardi lobbyist Lance Malone.

In Aug. of 2002, Mary Kincaid-Chauncey asked for the reconsideration of an adult use ordinance that Mike Galardi didn't like.

In a wiretap, Malone asks Kincaid-Chauncey to tell anyone who asks that it was Malone's idea to ask for reconsideration, not hers.

In an Oct. 2002 wiretap, Lance Malone and then County Commissioner Erin Kenny discussed misleading Galardi about support for an annexation plan that would have moved Galardi's strip club Jaguars from Clark County to the city of Las Vegas.

Defense attorneys say Malone is a lair and what he says on FBI wiretaps can not be depended on.

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, March 29, 2006

NEWARK — Two men who conspired to commit mortgage fraud so they could profit from the sale of dilapidated properties in Essex County and elsewhere were sentenced to prison terms Monday.

Barry Fauntleroy, 40, formerly of Mendham, who pleaded guilty in September, was sentenced to 21 months in federal prison for his role in getting the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development to insure loans to unqualified home buyers.

He also was ordered by U.S. District Court Judge Joseph A. Greenaway Jr. to pay $524,000 in restitution, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. He paid $25,000 of that Monday, authorities said.

Fauntleroy was one of the subjects of a 1998 Asbury Park Press home-sales investigation of a previous scheme that used similar methods in Monmouth County.

Another principal in the Essex County scheme who pleaded guilty, Devon Bowie, 54, of Malverne, N.Y., was sentenced Friday to 12 months in prison and ordered to pay $500,000 in restitution.

Peter Port, 52, of Roslyn, N.Y., a lawyer who also pleaded guilty, was sentenced last week to five months in jail and paid restitution and a fine totaling $510,000.

Fauntleroy and Bowie were indicted last June for their actions in Essex County. The indictment charged that from at least June 1999 through July 2001, Fauntleroy conspired with Bowie and others to prepare falsified loan applications, which were submitted to the Federal Housing Administration.

Bowie was president of Neighborhood Mortgage Bankers Co. in Elmsford, N.Y. Fauntleroy was president of EON Institute Inc., a real estate holding company and controlled a bank account in the name of Neighborhood Holdings LLC., government authorities said.

Prior to Fauntleroy's operations in Essex County, he headed Mortgage Acceptance Corp., Floral Park, N.Y.

A 1998 Asbury Park Press investigation found that Fauntleroy's brother, Thomas Fauntleroy, and his associates bought at least 58 houses in rundown sections of Asbury Park, Neptune and Long Branch between October 1996 and March 1998, selling them quickly at inflated prices to first-time buyers.

As a result of the Press series, Barry Fauntleroy's company was banned from making additional FHA-backed loans without extra oversight. The company subsequently shut down. Forty-two of the loans were insured by the FHA.

In 2004, a Wall lawyer, Allen J. Meyer, was sentenced to a year in prison for his role in that scheme.

Ex-Mendham Investor Sentenced In Mortgage Scam (MOCDR)

Morris County (NJ) Daily Record, March 30, 2006

Real-estate businessman, 40, admits he conspired tofalsify home loan papers

NEWARK -- A real-estate investor formerly from Mendham was sentenced to 21 months in federal prison for conspiring with others to commit mortgage fraud.

Barry Fauntleroy, 40, who had been living in Mendham but now lives in Atlanta, was also ordered Monday to pay $524,000 in restitution, according to a statement from U.S. Attorney Chris Christie.

Fauntleroy was president of EON Institute Inc., a real estate holding company. He had pleaded guilty last year to charges that he conspired with others to commit mortgage fraud by arranging federal loans for unqualified buyers.

Authorities said that from at least June 1999, through July 2001, Fauntleroy conspired with Devon Bowie, 53, of Malverne, N.Y., and others to prepare falsified loan applications. The applications were submitted to the Federal Housing Administration and related to loans insured by HUD. Bowie was president of Neighborhood Mortgage Bankers Company of Elmsford, N.Y.

Fauntleroy acknowledged that he and others recruited individuals with relatively low incomes and promised them they could buy homes in Essex County with little or no money down.

Faked HUD paperwork

He and others then found dilapidated houses and would promise they would be renovated before the sale closed, and that the buyers would get HUD-insured loans to pay for them, authorities said.

Fauntleroy admitted that, on the HUD loan applications, his co-conspirators created and submitted false and fictitious bank statements, leases, IRS W-2 forms, verifications of past mortgage payments, pay stubs, attorney escrow letters, gift letters, verification of employment, real property appraisals and deposit checks.

Bowie was sentenced Friday to 12 months in prison and ordered to pay $500,000 in restitution. Bowie had also pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy.

Peter Port, 52, of Roslyn, N.Y., an attorney, was a title agent on many of the properties involved and a co-investor with Fauntleroy. He pleaded guilty to one count of false statements for producing false documents used in the scheme. He was sentenced March 21 to five months in prison and ordered to pay $500,000 plus a $10,000 fine.

A Grudging Guilty Plea By Ex-judge In Extortion Case (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), March 30, 2006

Complaint centered on kickbacks ordered by Austin

Former Roane County General Sessions Court Judge Thomas Alva Austin served up his guilty plea to federal extortion charges Wednesday with a side of caveats.

"Do you agree that is what you did?" U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Phillips asked Austin after Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Atchley outlined bare-bones details of the case against the ex-judge.

"Your Honor, I entered a plea agreement and accepted responsibility of those charges," Austin responded. "I do agree that I did part of that. I don't agree with every word that is in that (account)."

Austin's complaint centered on allegations that he forced kickbacks from two driving school instructors and a probation office chief.

"As far as any demands or any pressure or any deals like that, I have never agreed that that ever happened," Austin told Phillips at Wednesday's hearing. "I do understand that my part in it was criminal conduct on my part."

His disclaimer made Phillips uneasy about accepting Austin's plea.

"I am not sure exactly what you are saying, Mr. Austin," Phillips said. "Are you saying that part of the factual basis of the plea is incorrect?"

Before Austin, 57, could answer, defense attorney Gregory P. Isaacs asked for a quick huddle with the former judge and fellow lawyer Jerrold L. Becker.

"Judge Austin has some concerns about an adjective that was used," Isaacs later explained to Phillips. "After talking to Judge Austin, he agrees the factual basis is correct."

Phillips pressed Austin for an unequivocal plea.

"Mr. Austin, I need to make sure," Phillips said. "Do you agree with what that factual basis says or not?"

Austin responded, "Yes, sir, I do."

"How do you plead - guilty or not guilty?" Phillips asked.

"Guilty," Austin answered.

Austin, who resigned last week from a judgeship he had held for 27 years, was accused of using his position as a judge to extort a portion of the proceeds from two driving schools in Roane County and a private probation firm.

He was arrested in January after a probe by the FBI and the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation, which included secret videotapes and audiotapes of conversations and transactions that Atchley has said support the extortion charges.

Austin admits to taking roughly $14,000 in kickbacks in a six-month period in 2005. FBI Agent Robert Gibson, who led the investigation, has alleged in a search warrant affidavit that Austin had been extorting kickbacks from the driving school program he created for a decade and collected as much as $100,000.

The affidavit also included allegations that Austin regularly smoked marijuana.

Atchley has stated in court records that he plans to trot out evidence at Austin's upcoming sentencing hearing in August to show the "full scope" of the judge's criminal activity.

Austin, who is free on bond, likely faces no more than four years in prison under federal sentencing guidelines. Isaacs and Becker will push for a much lower sentence.

"We look forward to this journey to justice," Isaacs said after the hearing.

More Fumo File Deletions Alleged (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 30, 2006

Federal authorities think they have discovered another trail of deleted e-mails involving State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo - this time in his Senate office.

A trusted Fumo aide, Ruth Arnao, is already a target of the investigation, facing possible charges for allegedly deleting e-mails in the office of a charity linked to the senator.

Now, authorities think they have found evidence that someone else - not Arnao - tried to destroy e-mails on the Senate computers after the FBI investigation surfaced, people familiar with the matter said.

That person's identity could not be determined.

Some of the new details in the case became public yesterday during a federal appeals court hearing in Philadelphia.

A lawyer for the Senate and a federal prosecutor argued over whether the FBI had a right to seize hard drives from computers in Fumo's government offices. A decision is expected soon.

For more than two years, federal authorities have been investigating whether the Fumo-backed charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, violated a federal law that prohibits nonprofit organizations from engaging in political activity. For example, public records show that the charity spent $215,000 for political polling.

The grand jury is also pursuing allegations of obstruction of justice - that someone destroyed e-mails and documents after learning the FBI investigation had begun.

Fumo's attorney, Richard Sprague, did not attend yesterday's arguments and did not return a phone call afterward. On Monday, Fumo predicted that the investigation would "go nowhere" and suggested that the Bush White House was behind the probe.

Fumo has no official title with Citizens' Alliance, started in 1991 by Arnao and two Fumo aides, but he has been responsible for most of its generous funding. He has referred to it as "my nonprofit."

Citizens' Alliance works to clean streets and rejuvenate businesses in Fumo's district. Yesterday, it announced a $100,000 donation to the Metropolitan AIDS Neighborhood Nutrition Alliance.

The grand jury investigation stems in part from an Inquirer report in 2003 that Fumo and Peco Energy Co. had a secret deal under which the utility donated $17 million to the charity during negotiations on Peco's rates.

The Inquirer reported in January that a computer technician in Fumo's government offices, Donald J. Wilson, had been granted immunity in the case. His attorney, Mark Cedrone, did not return phone calls.

Until this month, there were no official statements about the investigation. Details became public during two unusual hearings before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. The first, March 9, was brought by Arnao's attorney.

Yesterday's hearing came from an appeal by the state Senate, arguing that the FBI had no right to seize records from senators' legislative offices.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John J. Pease told the court that the FBI examined the government hard drives to try "to understand why certain e-mails no longer exist." Pease said the FBI needed the complete hard drives, not just files, because it had to search for evidence of deleted e-mail.

The seized hard drives hold more than 550,000 files, many of which are e-mails and attached documents.

C. Clark Hodgson Jr., a Philadelphia lawyer representing the Senate, said the computers contain communications related to inner workings of the legislature - things the FBI has no right to see.

A 1980 Supreme Court decision authorizes federal agents to seize documents from state lawmakers' offices, but Hodgson asked the judges to revisit that decision. The court could not have foreseen the advent of e-mail, he said.

The circuit judges - Theodore A. McKee, Maryanne Trump Barry, and Franklin S. Van Antwerpen - were openly hostile to Hodgson's suggestion that Senate officials be permitted to review legislative documents before they are turned over to the FBI.

"Why should the government trust you?" Van Antwerpen said. Referring to Richard Nixon's reluctance to provide his Watergate tapes, the judge added: "I seem to remember a certain person who said, 'You don't need all these transcripts. I'll have my secretary, Rosemary Woods, transcribe them.' "

Sources: Feds Seized Fumo's Computer Files (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 30, 2006

Federal prosecutors revealed at a hearing yesterday that they have seized 550,000 computer files, mostly e-mails, from the state Senate as part of an ongoing grand-jury probe.

Prosecutors did not identify whose files they took, but sources said the hearing was related to the seizure of files and computers from state Sen. Vince Fumo's legislative offices in February 2005.

Fumo has said he has done nothing wrong and is cooperating with the investigation, which began in January 2004.

Prosecutors also revealed yesterday that they had completed a "forensic analysis" of the computers' hard drives.

The focus of the hearing in federal appeals court was how much latitude prosecutors have in dealing with the Legislature.

At issue is whether the computer files are protected by a "legislative-immunity privilege" and thus unable to be used as evidence for an indictment.

C. Clark Hodgson Jr., a lawyer representing the state Senate, argued that the "privilege isn't lost by a random act of the [federal] government."

He said he was concerned that "thousands and thousands" of pages of sensitive legislative communications could be made public.

Hodgson suggested that federal authorities and Senate staffers - or even an independent third party appointed by the court - should review all the computer files to determine which e-mails are pertinent to the investigation.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John J. Pease contended that the Senate was attempting to "slow down" the grand-jury investigation.

Neither Hodgson nor federal prosecutors would comment after the hearing.

The state Senate had asked U.S. District Judge Robert F. Kelly last April to prohibit the feds from keeping any records related to legislative matters, such as communications between a senator and a staffer about legislation.

Kelly denied the request, and the state Senate appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

Judges were skeptical of Hodgson's argument that internal legislative communications are protected.

"The legislative privilege can be overcome," said Judge Theodore A. McKee, citing a U.S. Supreme Court decision, if the computer files seized from legislative offices show "prima facie" evidence of criminal misconduct.

Hodgson conceded that the privilege would not apply in that case.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Pease ridiculed the idea that sensitive legislative matters could be made public.

"This is subject to grand-jury secrecy. This isn't about somebody on the street, a busybody, invading the business of the Senate," he said.

The judges did not indicate when they would rule.

Dougherty's Union Sues WPVI-TV Over News Report (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 30, 2006

John J. Dougherty, electricians' union leader, city Democratic treasurer, Philadelphia mayoral hopeful, has opened a new front in the political wars that have enveloped him in recent months.

But where Dougherty's other recent battles have been behind-the-scenes struggles with fellow Democratic power brokers, the latest engagement comes in the form of a lawsuit pitting his International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 98 against ABC affiliate WPVI-TV (Channel 6).

In a suit filed yesterday in Common Pleas Court, the union claims it was defamed by a WPVI news report that said federal investigators were pressuring convicted City Councilman Rick Mariano to provide potential information for a probe of Dougherty's relationship with a local electrical contractor.

"The broadcast left the unmistakable impression... that federal prosecutors were attempting to parlay Mariano's guilty verdict into an opportunity for Mariano to give up allegedly incriminating evidence about IBEW Local 98 and its business manager," the complaint reads.

The union's lawsuit says the report was "fabricated."

WPVI spokeswoman Caroline Welch said she had not seen the suit, and because of that "it would be premature to comment."

At a news conference yesterday, Local 98 attorney George Bochetto said there was no way Mariano could have received such pressure in the time between his midafternoon corruption conviction March 17 and the station's 6 p.m. newscast that night, as he said the report implied.

"It didn't happen, and to suggest that it did suggests that IBEW has somehow done something wrong," Bochetto said. "They haven't."

IBEW is asking for at least $50,000 plus unspecified punitive damages. Bochetto said he also wanted a retraction.

Federal authorities last month subpoenaed records from the city's Redevelopment Agency, which Dougherty chairs, as part what people familiar with the matter told The Inquirer was an investigation of the labor practices of the contractor, Donald Dougherty, unrelated to the Local 98 leader but an old friend of his.

At the news conference, Bochetto was joined by seven IBEW officials - but not Dougherty, the only IBEW official named in the broadcast.

"John Dougherty has nothing to do with the lawsuit," Bochetto said. "He has not been involved in any aspect of it."

A call to Dougherty's spokesman, Frank Keel, was not returned yesterday.

The U.S. Attorney's Office declined comment.

"We're not going to comment on the underlying facts of the suit," said U.S. Attorney's spokesman Rich Manieri. "We understand from the attorneys for Local 98 that they don't believe the U.S. Attorney's Office or the FBI did anything improper."

Mariano's attorney, Nino V. Tinari, could not be reached for comment. After Mariano was freed on bail pending sentencing Tuesday, Tinari refused to address questions about whether his client was cooperating in any other investigations.

Dougherty, who used lavish political donations and the ability to mobilize a loyal cadre of activists to make himself the city's most politically powerful labor leader, has seen his Democratic Party standing fall in recent months amid acrimony with several longtime allies.

The high-profile feud has included clashes with Mayor Street, U.S. Rep Bob Brady, and Mariano, a onetime protégé.

WPVI Is Sued Over Report On Johnny Doc (PHI)

By Catherine Lucey

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024122

The electricans' union yesterday filed a lawsuit against WPVI-TV, Channel 6, alleging that a recent report on the station falsely claimed that union leader John Dougherty was being investigated by the feds.

The suit targets a report that the station aired March 17 about Councilman Rick Mariano's conviction on corruption charges.

The story, by reporter Dann Cuellar, said federal authorities were pressuring Mariano to give them information that would help their probe into the relationship between John Dougherty and electrician Donald "Gus" Dougherty, the suit says.

Gus Dougherty, who is not related to the union leader, runs Dougherty Electric, from which documents were seized in late January by FBI, IRS and Labor Department agents.

The suit, by Local 98 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, claims that Cuellar's report had been "fabricated purely for sensational purposes."

The union is asking for a retraction and damages in excess of $50,000.

"That didn't happen," union lawyer George Bochetto said of the Channel 6 report. "The councilman was not being pressured."

John Dougherty, who is considered a likely candidate in the 2007 Democratic mayoral primary, did not comment on the suit. Nor did he appear at a press conference at Bochetto's Center City law office that was attended by seven members of IBEW's leadership.

Bochetto insisted the case was not about Dougherty's political ambitions.

"This is not a political move," Bochetto said. "This has nothing to do with the mayor's race or anything else."

Bochetto would not detail his plans to prove the case. Federal authorities are forbidden to discuss an ongoing investigation, so it's difficult to determine what conversations they have had with Mariano until the Dougherty Electric probe is over.

When asked why he had not waited until then to file a suit, Bochetto said, "This action took place in such a way that there might be additional reports."

Channel 6 spokeswoman Caroline Welch refused to discuss the suit yesterday. Mariano's lawyer did not return a call for comment.

Rich Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, said he could not discuss the suit.

Who's The Shark Now? 'Candygram' Case Delivers Good News For Criminal Defense (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, March 30, 2006

Big wins are so rare for criminal defense lawyers in federal court that one good victory can generate a lot of buzz -- sometimes even earning a nickname.

For attorney Jeffrey M. Lindy, the Feb. 13 decision in United States v. Coles from the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was just such a case and has come to be known among the defense bar as "the Candygram case."

Voting 2-1, the 3rd Circuit agreed with Lindy's argument that evidence of drugs found in a hotel room should have been suppressed by the trial judge because the police had "manufactured" an emergency situation to justify a warrantless search.

The majority concluded that police had used "subterfuge" to gain entry to the hotel room by falsely claiming they were "room service," and, just moments later, that they were maintenance workers sent to fix a leak.

After those two attempts failed, the officers identified themselves as police and then heard the sound of a toilet flushing -- an event that prosecutors said allowed the police to enter immediately due to "exigent circumstances."

But the 3rd Circuit agreed with Lindy and held that the investigative tactics used by the officers had "impermissibly manufactured the exigency."

Defense lawyers have nicknamed the decision "the Candygram case" -- a reference to the classic "Saturday Night Live" skit from the 1970s in which a "land shark" gains entry to an apartment, after several failed attempts, by claiming to be a Candygram deliveryman.

Now Lindy's victory has been sealed because the Justice Department has decided not to pursue a petition to have the case reargued before a 13-judge en banc panel of the 3rd Circuit.

Instead, prosecutors filed a motion to dismiss all charges against Terrance Coles.

In the motion, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Zauzmer said "the government has ... determined that, in the absence of the evidence which the 3rd Circuit has held should be suppressed, the prosecution should not proceed."

Chief U.S. District Judge Harvey Bartle III on Tuesday granted the motion, vacated Coles' 11-year prison sentence and ordered that Coles "shall be released from custody immediately."

Judge: D.C. Sniper Can Represent Himself (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0024123

By Ernesto Londoño
The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Sniper John Allen Muhammad will be allowed to conduct his defense during his murder trial in Montgomery County, a judge ruled yesterday.

While telling Muhammad, "I don't think it's the right decision," Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan acknowledged that the defendant had a constitutional right to be his own lawyer. He ruled that Muhammad understood the implications of that choice and had shown no sign of incompetence.

"You haven't said anything that wasn't appropriate. You laughed when it was appropriate. You got mad when it was appropriate," Ryan said. "You've convinced me you do understand how serious this is."

Muhammad, who is accused of killing six people in Montgomery during the spree of sniper shootings that terrified the Washington area in 2002, has been sentenced to death in Virginia. During his murder trial in Virginia three years ago, he briefly acted as his own attorney, only to later re-retain his original counsel.

During a hearing yesterday afternoon in Rockville, a visibly exasperated Muhammad found himself in the awkward position of siding with his accusers on a key question: Is he competent to stand trial? He rejected his Maryland attorneys' contention that he is "schizophrenic, psychotic, delusional" and paranoid.

At one point, he interrupted Montgomery County Public Defender Paul DeWolfe as the lawyer outlined a mental health expert's assessment of Muhammad's "brain dysfunction."

"Your honor, can I sit over there with them?" Muhammad blurted out as he looked toward the prosecutors' table, drawing laughter from several people in the courtroom.

Muhammad said a report from a Yale University psychiatrist who was hired by his defense attorneys to provide an assessment of his state of mind was insulting and flawed.

"Your honor, I know no other way of reasoning except by a black man's reasoning. I know no other reality except for a black man's reality," Muhammad said, in one of two instances in which he implied his race was a factor in the case. "She knows no other way of reasoning except for a white woman's reality. . . . It becomes wrong when she tries to take that white reality and impose it on my black reality."

At another point in the hearing, Muhammad compared himself to civil rights leader Rosa Parks, saying: "If I have a mental disorder, then Rosa Parks had a mental disorder because she didn't get off her seat."

Ryan asked Muhammad whether he understood the nature of the charges against him and the consequences he could face if convicted in Maryland.

"Your honor, I'm on death row right now," Muhammad said. "I'm on death row for charges I had nothing to do with. I have a fully understanding of what's going on here."

During the Virginia trial, he said he turned his defense back over to his attorney because a dental condition impaired his ability to present the case. He did deliver the opening statement and cross-examine a witness.

Muhammad told Ryan yesterday that he'd like to have "stand-by" attorneys in the upcoming trial, scheduled to start May 1. The two public defenders who had been representing him said they would consult with their boss in Baltimore to determine what role -- if any -- they'll play in court.

Yesterday's ruling is a setback for DeWolfe and his deputy, Brian Shefferman, who have spent several months sifting through mounds of evidence the state's attorney's office intends to use at trial. The hearing was scheduled after Muhammad sent Ryan a letter expressing his desire to fire his attorneys. Responding to that move, DeWolfe filed a motion arguing that his client was not competent to stand trial or defend himself.

Sniper Mastermind To Defend Self (WT)

By Jon Ward
The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad will get a second chance to represent himself in a capital murder trial.

A Montgomery County Circuit judge yesterday granted Muhammad's request to defend himself during a hearing in which Muhammad denounced assertions by his defense attorneys that he is schizophrenic.

"I am a sane individual your honor," said Muhammad, 45, who stood instead of sitting for the entire two-hour hearing. "If I'm incompetent now, I've been incompetent since the day I was born. There is no reason at all that I should not represent myself. It is not my intention to lose. ...This is my life. These people have attacked my life."

Judge James L. Ryan allowed Muhammad to dismiss attorneys Paul B. DeWolfe and Brian Shefferman of Maryland's Office of the Public Defender and relegated them to standby counsel.

Mr. DeWolfe and Mr. Shefferman are expected to learn today whether the agency wants them to continue.

However, Mr. Shefferman said attorneys of that office "typically don't act in [a support] capacity."

Muhammad said he was "fine" with having no legal assistance.

"I came out of my mother's womb all by myself," he said.

Said Mr. DeWolfe: "I think he'll make it through trial, poorly."

The trial is scheduled to begin May 1, with prosecutors seeking life in prison without parole in connection with the fatal shootings of six persons in Montgomery County over three weeks in October 2002.

The judge set a procedural hearing for tomorrow.

Muhammad insists he is innocent of the crimes.

In 2003, a jury in southeastern Virginia found Muhammad guilty of shooting, with an accomplice, 13 random persons in the region during the fall of 2002, killing 10. He was he sentenced to death.

The jury found Muhammad's accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, now 21, guilty of helping carry out the shootings, which authorities think included at least nine additional shootings across the country.

Muhammad is believed to have been hunting down his ex-wife, Mildred, who has custody of their three children.

He said yesterday that defense attorneys were "trying to circumvent my rights" by planning an insanity defense, and that he has told them for months that he intended to mount his own defense.

Muhammad was allowed to defend himself two years ago in the trial in Virginia. He argued the case for the first two days, making an opening statement and questioning witnesses, including one shooting victim, then was unable to continue because of an abscess in his mouth.

Muhammad, who is black, made several references to race during the hearing yesterday and said he has been a victim of racism.

"If I have a mental disorder, then Rosa Parks has a mental disorder because she didn't get up off that seat," he said.

Muhammad also said a female psychiatrist hired by his defense attorneys spent a lot of time trying to "tell Muhammad about Muhammad."

"I know no other reality except a black man's reality," he said. "She knows no other way of reasoning, except for a white woman's reality. There's nothing wrong with that. It becomes wrong when she tries to take her white reality, and impose it on my black reality. It is wrong for me to try to impose my black reality on her white reality.... We live in one America, but we live in two different realities."

No More Sugar And Spice: Girl Gangs On Rise In D.C. (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Princess Galloway's days as a D.C. gang member began innocently enough: She and her childhood friends had birthday parties, talked about clothes and held sleepovers at one another's houses.

"It was, like, a normal thing females do," says Princess, 16.

As the girls grew older, the parties became nighttime outings to go-go clubs. Belts and bags were replaced by blades and bats as accessories. A girl gang was born.

"We started fighting when a different female gang from uptown jumped one of our friends," says Princess, an honor roll student at Spingarn High School in Northeast who quit her gang after spending several stints in the Oak Hill Youth Facility for assault. "It just escalated. ... It was a back-and-forth beef."

Princess' story is becoming common in the District, where officials say girl gangs wielding everything from baseball bats to ice picks are on the rise.

Female cliques increasingly are turning schoolyard spats into beatings and turf battles for respect, recognition and attention the girls don't receive at home.

"In the last three years, female activity -- as far as crews and gangs -- has risen," says Bridget T. Miller, coordinator of the District's Youth Gang Task Force. "Nobody wanted to acknowledge it because they thought it was just a short trend, but they failed to realize how dangerous a female can be."

Miss Miller says more than 270 girl gangs and crews operate in the District. The cliques often form in middle schools and center around neighborhoods, clashing over anything from fashion styles to being snubbed at clubs.

"People just hate," says Coco, a 17-year-old who is trying to quit a gang centered in Rosedale in Northeast. "One person will bump you, mug you, put their middle fingers up to you, then we'll start fighting. Fistfights, brick fights, bats -- whatever they feel like they can whoop you with, they'll get."

Members -- who include homosexual boys in some cases -- sometimes color their hair a specific color. Although girl gangs usually don't resort to guns, officials note clashes involving blades, bats and even stun guns.

DOJ_NMG_0024125

"Girls are getting beat with crowbars, they've got knives, [they] get stabbed and cut," says Ronald Moten, founder of the nonprofit Peacoholics, which is sponsoring a forum, "Saving Our Sisters," in May at Howard University. "One girl got killed leaving a club in Southeast, a female got shot by another female.

"It's changing; that's why we got to nip it in the bud."

Sharell Kyle, a former Anacostia High School student who now attends Trinity College, says her school basketball team brawled with rivals from Theodore Roosevelt High School and at least half of her friends have participated in girl gangs.

"A lot of it deals with following, fitting in," says Miss Kyle, 20, who now works for Peacoholics. "Some youths don't have nobody else to look at in their lives, so they turn to the streets."

According to the federal Bureau of Justice Statistics, the number of female state and federal inmates grew 5 percent a year from 1995 to mid-2004. The number of male inmates grew by an average of 3.3 percent during the same period.

In the District, the number of Superior Court cases involving female juveniles increased from 445 in 2003 to 571 in 2004. The number of girls brought before the court for violent offenses jumped from 225 in 2003 to 322 in 2004, a 43 percent increase.

Officials say preliminary court numbers show a slight decrease last year, but the trend is disturbing.

"Women have become more involved in the system for at least a decade," says Anita Josey-Herring, the presiding judge of D.C. Family Court. "We're trying to get ahead of that before the problem becomes insurmountable."

The court in January began its Leaders of Today in Solidarity (LOTS) program, which is staffed only by women and offers girls in the court system community supervision, guidance and support services. Juveniles in the LOTS program will be supervised by Judge Zoe Bush, who will be assigned to monitor their cases.

"A lot of girls get involved with gangs because they're looking to be accepted by their peers," Judge Josey-Herring says. "We're trying to create a community ... so these girls can understand they have a whole lot more to look forward to in life than being a member of a gang."

Tiffany, a 17-year-old mother, says she quit her gang when her priorities changed.

"My baby's father started saying, 'You don't need to be in that to prove yourself,' " she says. "[Now] when I'm gonna fight, I'm gonna fight for my son. It's gonna be a good reason."

Rave Scene Not To Blame, Says Seattle Mayor (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, March 30, 2006

SEATTLE — Despite seven violent deaths last weekend, the mayor and other city leaders have a reassuring message for the youths who love the all-night music and dancing of the "rave" party scene: Rave on.

Kyle Huff, 28, fatally shot six people and himself Saturday at an early-morning house party after a zombie-themed rave at a performing arts center. It was Seattle's worst crime since 1983, when 13 people were killed at a Chinatown gambling club. And it was the first such incident to mar the Pacific Northwest's rave culture, where partygoers and police have had an accord that some other U.S. localities haven't matched.

As a police task force continues searching for a motive for Huff's rampage, Mayor Greg Nickels told a community meeting Tuesday that the loud, pulsating electronic music featured at rave dances is "not a threat to us."

"We don't know why he picked these particular victims," Nickels told the group. "We do know that this incident was not caused by music — a particular kind of music. It was caused by a disturbed individual who chose to take out his anger or rage on other human beings. As a society, we have got to come to grips with this infatuation that we have with guns."

Travis Webb, 29, a rave dance promoter here, said he had feared a crackdown, in part because two of the victims were girls ages 14 and 15.

Those killed were Melissa Moore, 14; Suzanne Thorne, 15; Christopher Williamson, 21; Justin Schwartz, 22; Jeremy Martin, 26; and Jason Travers, 32.

Raves were an underground phenomenon in the 1980s and '90s. The favored drug at raves was Ecstasy, which mellowed partygoers but gave them energy for nightlong gyration, Webb said. By 2000, raves had gone mainstream, being held in clubs and sports arenas. Fire marshals and off-duty cops patrolled. Use of Ecstasy has declined, but marijuana often is sneaked past security guards, Webb and other promoters say.

Raves have turned violent in some places. At four illegal parties in Los Angeles in 2004, a total of five men were killed and seven were wounded.

But the rave scene in Seattle gave police "no problems to speak of" until Saturday's massacre in the quiet Capitol Hill district, police spokesman Sean Whitcomb said.

"I never thought it would happen in Seattle," said Aaron Chase, 32, a regular at raves.

DOJ_NMG_0024126

At a makeshift memorial outside the rented house where the killings occurred, Shane Wicker, 21, described the close-knit party community as “trusting and accepting everyone.”

Gary Williamson, whose son Christopher was killed, was in tears during a prayer service at the scene of the slayings. He thanked the ravers for accepting a young man who'd “felt like an outcast.” “Your friendships touched him and filled a void that the school couldn't fill, the church couldn't fill,” Williamson said.

Huff moved to Seattle with his twin brother, Kane, five years ago from Whitefish, Mont. The brothers, at 6-foot-5 and 270 pounds, were voted “least spirited” by Whitefish High School classmates because they wouldn't play football or other sports.

Searching now for early signs of trouble, people in Whitefish point to an incident in 2000 when Huff shot at a life-size moose sculpture. The two guns used in the vandalism were those used in Seattle, said Whitefish Assistant Police Chief Mike Ferda.

Wicker said he saw Huff at a rave on March 17. “A couple of my friends were hanging out with him at another after-party,” Wicker said.

Last weekend's rave was promoted with the theme of “Better Off Undead,” and people were invited to wear white face paint, said Webb, who attended. “We focus on themes and costumes to try to pull kids away from drugs, give them a new focus at the events,” Webb said. Pierce Dyer, 20, said the event was like a Halloween party. Webb said security at the zombie rave was “strong,” with four guards checking for guns and drugs at the door and others in the smoking area and on patrol.

Seattle Deputy Police Chief Clark Kimerer said Huff had “premeditated” the slayings that night, loading his pickup with weapons and more than 300 rounds of ammunition. Webb said the guards may have deterred Huff from shooting at the dance.

According to a police affidavit, several of the six men who lived at the Capitol Hill house decided to invite Huff to their party when the rave wound down at 4 a.m. Saturday. None knew him. “Standing on the sidelines,” he gave off “bad vibes” that might be fun at the party, Anthony Moulton, 25, told detectives.

Shortly before 7 a.m., the police affidavit says, Huff left the party. Fetching the weapons from his truck, he spray-painted “NOW” on the front steps of three houses. He approached the porch of the house and started shooting. Police officer Steve Leonard heard the shooting and rushed to the house. When Huff saw the officer, he killed himself.

Later, friends of the victims placed flowers, candles and beads outside the house. They played techno music and camped out in tents. And they danced. “The best way we're going to mourn is by celebrating,” Dyer said. “We're not going to stop dancing.”

Police say they don't have an answer yet for why Huff turned into a killer. “A year from now, we may still be asking that question,” Kimerer said. Others have theories. “He tried to fit in, and it didn't work for him,” Chase said.

Seattle's Shattered Rave 'Family' Seeks Answers To Killings (NYT)

By Jessica Kowal

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

SEATTLE, March 29 — The candykids, juggalos, groovers and burners are uniting here with fresh purpose this week. Dancing to the synthesized music that binds them together, planting memorials of candles and their signature beaded bracelets, they join together not to rave, but to mourn slain friends.

One woman had a rainbow of yarn woven into her hair. Two men had faces painted in red and black. A man in a suit and tie had a pinkish mohawk. Dozens of others wore baggy clothing or unremarkable dress. All showed up on Tuesday at a spring-green park with a spectacular view of the Space Needle.

Exhausted by sorrow and lack of sleep, they seemed dumbstruck that the community of ravers, who follow a mantra of "plur," for "peace, love, unity and respect," had been punctured by senseless violence.

Six friends were killed early Saturday, when, the police say, Aaron Kyle Huff, 28, barreled through the front door of a small house on Republican Street, armed with a semiautomatic handgun and a 12-gauge shotgun.

At 7 a.m., a few dozen ravers were in the house to talk, drink beer, sleep, watch cartoons or otherwise decompress after attending a zombie-themed rave elsewhere.

Mr. Huff, an unemployed onetime pizza deliverer, had been invited to the house party by others at the rave. Without warning, he collected the guns from his truck parked nearby and swiftly killed four men and two teenage girls with gunshots to the head and chest, the King County Medical Examiner said Wednesday.

Confronted by a police officer, Mr. Huff committed suicide. The police have not determined his motive.

To the mourners in Volunteer Park and to those who lingered at the house on Wednesday with their tents and trinkets, it was unbearable that Mr. Huff had brutalized the self-described "family" of music-loving slackers, students and young professionals who often exchange beaded bracelets, called candy, as a friendship gesture.

"These are peaceful people," said Wally Hansen, 24, a rave promoter from Tukwila whose face was drawn and pale, with dark circles under his eyes. "Why would he do this to people who accepted him, who welcomed him into their own home?"

The victims, ages 14 to 32 and with rave nicknames like Sushi, Deacon and Chinadoll, were familiar faces at spirited parties attended by hundreds of people in the Puget Sound region. In warehouses, art spaces or nightclubs on Friday and Saturday nights, dressed in clothing that defines them into smaller cliques like candykids and juggalos, they dance energetically to musical genres like house, trance and jungle and stop to rest in "chill rooms" tuned with quieter ambient music.

The dancing is powered by energy drinks, candy and snacks, although many ravers concede that alcohol, marijuana and Ecstasy are part of the scene.

The rave community here had been mostly invisible to people who were not part of it. After the killings, talk-show hosts and columnists, intent on finding lessons, have focused on the youngest victims, Melissa Moore, 14, a ninth grader from Milton, and Suzanne Thorne, 15, a 10th grader from Bellevue.

Many people have criticized what they see as lax gun-control laws, pointing out that Mr. Huff was convicted of a misdemeanor in 2000 after shooting a moose sculpture in his Montana hometown, Whitefish. He was allowed to keep the two guns used in the shooting here.

Other critics have faulted what they describe as permissive rave culture, lax parents or lenient laws that allow teenagers into clubs where alcohol is not served.

Kyle Moore, Ms. Moore's father, refused to blame anyone but the gunman. He said he and his daughter, nicknamed Chinadoll, trusted other ravers to protect her.

"She just loved meeting the different people, seeing the different costumes, and she loved the music, the beat," Mr. Moore said in a telephone interview. "She was brighter than the sun out there. I just would love to know why she felt that she couldn't call me to pick her up."

Most likely, the two teenagers were waiting for the county bus to restart its downtown route at 7 a.m., said Nicole Loerke, 17, of Everett, who, like other candykids at the park, had a peach-colored Care Bears backpack. Ms. Loerke started going to raves last year, she said, when she had no friends in high school.

"They accept you as a person, the virtues and values you hold," she said of the ravers.

She said that she noticed Mr. Huff at the rave and that he stood against a wall with folded arms and did not mingle in a millieu where people greet one another as close friends within minutes of meeting.

"I asked him, 'Is there anything wrong?' and he turned his head," Ms. Loerke said. "I said, 'If you need anyone to talk to, I'm here to listen.' He looked right at me, and said, 'Thank you.' He must have had some screws loose."

Outside the Republican Street house, the ravers pitched tents on the grass and stayed in shifts to protect a growing memorial of candles and candy bracelets strung with words like "plur" and "luv all." The neighbors have given them hot chocolate and offered the use of bathrooms.

Josh McPharlin, 24, a rave promoter, looked at the mementos on the sidewalk and said: "I enjoyed these people. It's just unbelievable that I won't ever be able to spend time with them again."

Puerto Rican Militant Arrested Again On Parole Violation (AP)

Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico -- A Puerto Rican pro-independence militant who served 10 years for armed robbery and was sent back to prison twice for violating his parole, has been arrested again in the U.S. island territory, the FBI said Wednesday.

Antonio Camacho Negron was arrested Tuesday for not meeting with his parole officer since his release from a Pennsylvania prison in August 2004, said FBI spokesman Harry Rodriguez.

Negron, a leader of the militant pro-independence People's Boricua Army, has said he refuses to abide by his parole conditions because he doesn't recognize U.S. authority in Puerto Rico.

His arrest was ordered shortly after his most recent release from prison but authorities were only able to find him in San Juan this week, Rodriguez told The Associated Press.

Camacho, 65, was held at a federal jail outside San Juan. Authorities could return him to prison to serve the remainder of his original 15-year prison term, Rodriguez said.

His lawyer, Linda Backiel, said she believes that Camacho has now served all his required time. "I think the arrest was a reprisal for his participating in political activities," she said. "But the reason they are going to allege is that he didn't comply with the conditions of parole."

Camacho was originally sentenced to prison for his role in the 1983 robbery of more than $7 million from a Wells Fargo depot in West Hartford, Conn.. He was sent back to prison twice, in 1998 and 2003, for violating his parole.

The 1983 robbery was carried out with other members of the People's Boricua Army, also known as the Macheteros or Cane Cutters - a group accused of bombings and attacks in the 1970s and 1980s.

The Wells Fargo robbery was considered an act of domestic terrorism by U.S. authorities who alleged the money was used to fund the militant activities of the Macheteros. The group said it also used the money to buy gifts for impoverished Hispanic communities.

In September, FBI agents shot and killed Filiberto Ojeda Rios, a leader of the Macheteros who was considered the mastermind of the robbery, after he allegedly opened fire when they came to arrest him at a farmhouse in a western town in Puerto Rico.

Supreme Court Hears Arguments Over Foreigners' Rights In U.S. (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — The question before the Supreme Court on Wednesday was whether an international treaty that protects people embroiled in another country's criminal justice system gives foreign citizens any specific rights they can assert in American courts.

There was no dispute that authorities in Oregon and Virginia violated the treaty, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, in the two cases that were before the court in a single extended argument.

Article 36 of the treaty, which the United States ratified in 1969, gives people who are arrested and detained in a foreign country a right known as consular notification, which dictates that they be informed that at their request their country's diplomats will be notified and made available to advise them.

Neither Moises Sanchez-Llamas, a Mexican who was convicted of attempted murder in Oregon for shooting a police officer, nor Mario A. Bustillo, a Honduran convicted of a gang-related murder in Springfield, Va., a Washington suburb, received the required notice at the time of their arrests.

The question was what remedy, if any, existed for the violation. Five lawyers debated the issue: one for each defendant, the solicitors general of Oregon and Virginia, and a deputy United States solicitor general.

The three government officials argued that the treaty governs relationships between nations, and that the remedy for a violation of consular notification was limited to a diplomatic protest or formal apology. The United States in fact issued a formal apology to Honduras in the case of Mr. Bustillo, who is serving a 30-year sentence for the 1997 killing.

The lawyers for the defendants argued that so limited a view ran counter to the undisputed principle that a treaty, once ratified, becomes part of a country's domestic law. Consequently, they argued, foreign defendants should have access to the same remedies that the legal system offers for government violations of rights protected by American law.

Accordingly, Mr. Sanchez-Llamas is arguing that incriminating statements he made to the police be suppressed because he had not received his consular notification at the time he made them. His lawyer's argument that such an exclusion should apply — similar to the rule that bars the introduction of illegally seized evidence — was rejected by the Oregon Supreme Court and did not make much headway with the justices on Wednesday.

After the lawyer, Peter Gartlan, acknowledged that the Vienna Convention says nothing about suppressing evidence, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. asked, "So if the treaty doesn't say 'suppress,' what authority does a federal court have to tell a state court to suppress?"

The other defendant, Mr. Bustillo, is arguing that he is entitled to reversal of his conviction on the ground that Honduran officials, had they been notified of his arrest, would have helped identify another Honduran man who returned to Honduras after the murder and who, Mr. Bustillo asserts, was the real killer.

His lawyer, Mark T. Stancil, argued that because Virginia was not forced to reopen the case to permit the new evidence, the state was able to benefit from its violation of the Vienna Convention.

Here, too, the justices were skeptical. Several suggested that the fact that Mr. Bustillo had been provided with a lawyer was enough to insulate any Vienna Convention violation. The state, they said, had a right to expect that lawyers would inform their clients of their Vienna Convention rights.

"The lawyer should be taxed with knowing it because it's the law of the land," Justice David H. Souter said, referring to the treaty.

The International Court of Justice, often referred to as the World Court, takes the view that the convention confers individual rights. It ruled in 2004, in a case brought by Mexico, that the United States could not permit the execution of 51 Mexicans, on death row in various states, who had not received their consular notification.

After that ruling, and while a Supreme Court appeal brought by one of the Mexicans, José Ernesto Medellín, was pending, the Bush administration withdrew the United States from the provision of the treaty that gives the World Court jurisdiction over disputes of this kind. At the same time, the administration told state courts to abide by the decision. The Supreme Court dismissed the Medellín case last May without ruling on the enforceability of the Vienna Convention.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre was asked about the World Court's position by Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who referred to that court by its initials, I. C J.

Mr. Garre replied, "To be blunt, the I. C. J. decision is wrong." He said that while the World Court was entitled to "respectful consideration," its decision was "certainly not" binding on the United States.

Mr. Garre said that the State Department was making "extensive efforts" to make sure state and local governments were aware of the need to inform foreign defendants of the right to consular notification. The department has distributed 600,000 cards to police departments, he said, adding, "These efforts are working."

But it appeared that Vienna Convention issues would probably not disappear. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked Mary H. Williams, the Oregon solicitor general, why the police, who already give Miranda warnings, could not simply be told to ascertain the citizenship of people they take into custody so that the required notice could be given.

That was "not so easy," said Ms. Williams.

"I don't see why it's so complicated," Justice Kennedy said. He was joined by Justice Souter, who asked Ms. Williams, "You ask his name, why not his citizenship?"

Ms. Williams replied, "We're moving toward that goal."

Justice Souter was less than satisfied. "Why does it have to be a distant goal?" he asked.

The cases are Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon, No. 04-10566, and Bustillo v. Johnson, No. 05-51.

Court Hears Arguments In Consular Access Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

On a December night in 1997, a Honduran man swung a baseball bat and killed James Merry outside a Popeye's restaurant in Springfield. Mario Bustillo was convicted of murder and sentenced to 30 years.

Now that local slaying has evolved into a Supreme Court case with major implications for the rights of 21.1 million noncitizens in the United States, as well as for U.S. international relations.

At issue is the Vienna Convention on consular access, a pact among the United States and 160 other nations that guarantees foreign detainees access to diplomats from their home country. In oral arguments at the court yesterday, an attorney for Bustillo told the justices that his conviction should be overturned because Virginia authorities never informed him of his Vienna Convention rights.

As a result of the delay, Mark T. Stancil said, Bustillo, who maintains that another man from his home country is the real culprit, was denied "critical exculpatory evidence in the possession of the Honduran government."

The Vienna Convention issue has generated several difficult cases for the court in recent years, and the Bustillo case offers the justices a chance to clarify the domestic effect of treaties, which the Constitution says are part of "the supreme law of the land."

A ruling in Bustillo's favor could affect relations between millions of noncitizens and local law enforcement officers, whose knowledge of and compliance with the Vienna Convention is spotty. It would be a defeat for the Bush administration, which says the convention should be enforced through diplomatic negotiations.

But it would represent a major step toward incorporating international law into U.S. domestic affairs -- as several justices have been urging in recent years.

In a companion case, an attorney for Moises Sanchez-Llamas, a Mexican convicted of trying to kill a police officer in Oregon, said that his client's statements to police should not have been admitted as evidence because they were obtained without notifying him of his Vienna Convention rights.

None of the justices seemed eager to embrace that claim, but they appeared more evenly divided on the two men's basic contention that the Vienna Convention creates rights that can be enforced by lawsuits in a U.S. court.

Ratified by the United States in 1969, the pact commits signatories to provide one another's arrested citizens access to consular officials and to inform detainees of these "rights" "without delay."

The United States, which led the international effort to negotiate the convention, has long backed its goals. But Mexico and Germany sued the United States at the International Court of Justice in The Hague because their citizens who were not informed of their Vienna Convention rights were sentenced to death in the United States in recent years.

The international court ruled in 2004 that the convention required the United States to give 51 Mexicans a new chance to appeal the violation of their consular rights in a U.S. court, even though state procedural rules say defendants forfeit legal claims they do not first raise at trial.

The issue of whether that international court ruling could bind U.S. courts came to the Supreme Court last year, but the court dismissed the case after the Bush administration, invoking the president's foreign policy powers, announced that it would require Texas state courts to give the Mexicans a new hearing -- and then withdrew the United States from the part of the convention that says it must abide by the international court's rulings.

Yet the two cases argued yesterday raise what may be much more fundamental issues -- whether the international court's interpretation of the convention should essentially be binding on all states.

Backed by the Bush administration and by 28 other states, Virginia and Oregon counter that neither the treaty nor the international court's ruling can trump the states' own rules of criminal procedure.

To decide that noncitizens can belatedly raise Vienna Convention claims, they argue, would give noncitizens in this country a right that Americans do not have with regard to claims under the Constitution, and that is denied to Americans by governments abroad.

"These treaty claims should not be treated more favorably than constitutional rights," Virginia's solicitor general, William E. Thro, told the court.

Several justices suggested that because U.S. law already requires states to provide suspects lawyers, the remedy for the international court's concerns is to give defendants whose lawyers fail to tell them about the Vienna Convention the right to appeal. Such "ineffective assistance of counsel" claims are already allowed.

The cases are Bustillo v. Johnson , No. 05-51, and Sanchez-Llamas v. Oregon , No. 04-10566. A decision is expected by July.

Rape Allegations Cast Pall At Duke (USAT)

By Sal Ruibal

USA Today, March 30, 2006

DURHAM, N.C. — The flier being distributed outside Duke's student union Wednesday night looked like a wanted poster: 40 faces of young men, smiling smugly for the camera.

What was most disturbing to those gathered was the possibility several of the Duke men's lacrosse players whose photos were arranged in those neat rows may have committed criminal charges, including forcible rape and sodomy.

These men are wanted on the Duke campus. Their fellow students want them to come forward about what happened in a shabby off-campus house March 13. Police say the athletes have refused to cooperate with their investigation.

That night a North Carolina Central University student who worked as a private party dancer claims she was raped and showered with racial epithets by three men at a party organized by three captains of the team and attended by many members of the nationally-ranked Duke squad, police say.

"Please Come Forward," the flier's headline reads.

The flier was distributed Wednesday night at a "Take Back the Night March" that was scheduled well before the details of the alleged spring break rape emerged this weekend when it was learned that 46 members of the team submitted to DNA sample requests from the Durham County law enforcement officials.

The players have told school officials the assault did not occur.

The flier has only 40 photos, however, because university officials removed the team rosters and photos from its GoDuke.com website Monday morning for what assistant sports information director Art Chase said were "safety reasons."

Alvaro Jarrin, a Duke graduate student, wore a T-shirt imploring the silent players to speak up.

"It is important that we not let this go down easily," he said as hundreds of marchers began gathering on Duke's east campus. "There's a culture of rape at Duke, so we're hoping this will get them to speak up. This rape is a symptom of a larger problem at Duke."

Other wore signs that read, "It isn't what Duke has, but what it lax," a reference to a commonly used abbreviation for lacrosse.

The march was the final pressure point in a day filled with campus tension over the allegations.

The cycle began late Tuesday night after Duke President Richard Brodhead announced that he was suspending the team "until there is a clearer resolution of the legal situation involving team members."

Brodhead was confronted by upset students after the press conference and agreed to meet with them Wednesday morning. Some of the students then occupied the room where the meeting had been hastily arranged, calling it a "Sleep-In."

They met with the president in the morning, but the school banned off-campus media from covering the discussion. Some students left the meeting unconvinced that the school was taking a hard line on sexual violence on campus.

Senior Zachari Curtis says the alleged rape is just another example of the abuse of privilege that exists on many levels at Duke.

DOJ_NMG_0024131

"The larger community at Duke, for whom we are just scenery, don't have to think about these complicated things," says the Fulbright Scholar who will study in Brazil after her graduation this spring.

"The members of this lacrosse team aren't the only people who exercise their privilege on the bodies and minds of those of us in their environment."

To make matters even more tense, this is Sexual Assault Prevention Week on campus. Seminars had been scheduled, but the recent events brought a poignancy to lectures and displays of anti-rape materials at Duke.

Although the team is not playing games, a practice was held under the watchful eye of campus police — in SUVs, on foot and on mountain bikes — brought in to prevent any disturbances.

The players appeared with their full-face helmets on while photographers and video crews recorded their every move. After 30 minutes, the media was asked to leave.

Brodhead insists that the school is not being easy on the players.

"The facts of the March 13 episode remain unclear," he said in a prepared statement.

"To determine responsibility, we need to learn the full truth as quickly as possible. ... I have confidence in the (Durham) authorities to find the truth and take whatever legal steps are necessary in the best interests of the community."

As Life Returns To New Orleans, So Does Crime (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 29 — The wail of police sirens is back, and gunfire again punctuates the night. As drug dealers move into flood-damaged houses, alarmed residents say that in the last few weeks, they have begun to sense a return to the bad old days before Hurricane Katrina, when crime was an omnipresent straitjacket on life in this city.

In a city that once led the nation in homicides per capita, crime has long been a leading indicator of New Orleans's health and prospects — an unavoidable part of the equation for a walk around the block or a trip to the grocery store.

That diminished greatly after the storm, when several hundred thousand people were evacuated. But there are signs that the past may be returning, with a new twist.

Police officials say the landscape of abandoned houses, stretching block after block, after Hurricane Katrina is being incorporated into a revived drug trade, with the empty dwellings offering an unexpected convenience to dealers returning from Houston and Atlanta.

Residents concur, pointing to this boarded-up house or that abandoned-looking shed as a place where they have seen young men congregating.

"It's coming back," said Capt. Timmy Bayard of the New Orleans police, who is in charge of narcotics investigations.

"It's not as plentiful as it was," Captain Bayard said. But, he added, "We're starting to grab some people." His men, searching abandoned houses in the Eighth Ward, have found drug stashes. He said it was like "looking for a needle in a haystack."

There are popping sounds of gunfire at night in the Central City and St. Roch neighborhoods flanking downtown — not as often as before, but enough to induce unease.

"Less, yeah, but it's started back up," said the Rev. A. P. Williby, who owns a house in Central City. "Shooting and killing — that's what we had before. It ain't going nowhere."

Two shootings, one of them fatal, occurred in January and earlier this month.

Parasol's, a classic old-line bar in the Irish Channel neighborhood, was held up at midnight recently. And a young man was killed after handing over his wallet in the Faubourg Marigny, a neighborhood of popular bars and restaurants.

On Web forums, there are reports of robberies and break-ins.

In Houston, which reported a sharp spike in killings after Hurricane Katrina, police officials say they have noticed a decline since the beginning of the year. Homicides were up 24 percent in 2005, but Houston police officials say the number would have been down 2 percent, absent cases in which either the suspect or the victim was a storm evacuee.

Last fall, there were "multiple" hurricane-related killings in Houston nearly every weekend, said Sgt. Brian Harris of the Houston police, but the violence had significantly eased, he said.

New Orleans again appears to be drawing the people who wreaked havoc on its streets before the storm. A local murder suspect wanted in Houston, for example, drifted back here and was arrested this month in Kenner, a New Orleans suburb.

In the past, even when there were lulls in crime, many residents felt as if they were living in a city under siege. Perception became part of the reality, fueling an exodus of whites and blacks to the suburbs or out of state.

The drug culture has been deeply ingrained here and never fully disappeared. A local rapper called Juvenile, in his new post-hurricane album, declaims: "E'ybody need a check from FEMA/So he can go and sco' him some co-ca-een-uh."

But crime is nowhere near its pre-storm levels. With the city's population reduced by at least three-fifths, statistics indicate that crime is down 60 percent to 70 percent over all, the department said.

There have been 16 killings this year, compared with more than 60 for the same period last year, which means quieter days for the police but still works out to an annualized rate of 32 killings per 100,000 people, ahead of Cleveland and Chicago.

A gnawing sense of vulnerability, particularly in poorer neighborhoods, is returning. On any block, it may have no more concrete basis than the sight of young men hanging out, but it is real nonetheless.

"They're beginning to surface again," said Alfred Barrow, a newspaper deliverer, painting his porch on an empty-looking block at Third and Magnolia in Center City.

"I'm out here throwing papers at 3 a.m., and I see them. What reason is there for them to be out there?" The anxiety is not helped by the Police Department's struggle to return to normal. At about 1,400 officers, the department is not far from its strength of just under 1,600 officers before Hurricane Katrina.

But the department is operating out of trailers, much of its data-gathering capability is impaired because of storm damage, and about 80 percent of its officers lost their homes in the storm.

There is evidence that the non-working poor — the population most implicated in crime, as victims and perpetrators — may be returning in higher percentages, for now, than middle-class residents washed out by the storm. A population map prepared for the city appears to suggest as much.

"It looks like the worst have come back," said Andrew Jackson, a homeowner on Villere Street in the Eighth Ward.

"That house over there," he said, pointing to an empty-looking dwelling down the block where he said youths congregate. "You don't see 'em during the day, but you see them at night."

There are a few hopeful signs. Before, this was a city virtually awash in guns, experts say. The contractor who cleaned up the city's storm drains after Hurricane Katrina said his crews had recovered at least a dozen firearms. Guns are not as prevalent, the police say.

Another aid, officers and residents say, is a new level of cooperation from citizens who had traditionally mistrusted the New Orleans police.

For years, the police here had complained that witnesses and residents refused to help, fearing retribution from gangs and drug dealers.

Killings in broad daylight on busy blocks produced few or no witnesses.

Now, "the people who are here are the people who want to be here, and they don't want that back," said Kenny Zeiger, who described his block in the St. Roch area as "one of the three worst corners in the neighborhood" for drug activity before the storm.

"The people are calling the cops more," Mr. Zeiger said.

Capt. John Bryson commands the Sixth District in Central City, a high-crime area.

"It's incredible," Captain Bryson said. "People you normally wouldn't believe would want an association with the Police Department call us up."

He is confident about keeping the lid on, even as more people return.

"We have control," he said. "We have gained this ground."

Less than a mile away, Mr. Barrow, the newspaper deliverer, is skeptical — about the present, and the future.

"It don't take much to improve what it was," he said, "because what it was, was probably the most vicious killing scene in the U.S."

9/11 Method Aids In Katrina ID (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

They are among the last victims of Hurricane Katrina, unknown but not abandoned: 70 nameless bodies recovered from floodwaters and debris are being tended by volunteer geneticists determined to identify them through DNA testing.

It is methodology reluctantly honed after the September 11 attacks.

"Pulling together the infrastructure -- from experts in various disciplines and from medical centers around the country -- is a skill forensics experts gleaned from 9/11. Most of us hoped it was a once-in-a-lifetime event, but sadly, it was not," said Joan Bailey-Wilson, a statistical geneticist at the National Institutes of Health who helped New York coroners identify World Trade Center victims in 2001.

She is coordinating the team of scientists from 30 medical institutions eager to help on the Gulf Coast.

More than 1,600 people are known to have been killed in Louisiana and Mississippi as a result of Hurricane Katrina, which slammed ashore along the Gulf Coast seven months ago. Most of those bodies have been returned to their families, but 2,000 people are still listed as missing.

The difficult task of identifying bodies bears testimony to the power of the storm. Personal effects were washed away or contaminated, and dental and medical records are gone.

The circumstances present a stark challenge for geneticists who must match unique patterns of genetic traits taken from DNA samples found in blood, combs or toothbrushes with the patterns of surviving family members.

First, they must find the families. Slowly, displaced relatives have been located by the Louisiana State Police, the Louisiana Family Assistance Center and volunteers. Survivors are offering DNA samples -- simple mouth swabs -- hoping they will match DNA from a recovered body.

Some remains, the scientists say, were only recently pulled from debris.

"One of the lessons learned from 9/11 was that talking to the families about the missing is skilled detective work," said Johns Hopkins genetic epidemiologist Elizabeth Pugh, who assisted New York officials five years ago and is helping state police ensure accurate matches.

Their work has just begun.

"Just knowing the grief these families are going through is what motivates me," said geneticist Nicole Johnson, who volunteered in Louisiana to reconstruct the family trees "of those presumed lost."

The first three geneticists arrived in Baton Rouge in mid-March with more arriving in June. Though computer-assisted DNA matches can speed the process, creating a genetic portrait of a family is "a sensitive and time-consuming task," Mrs. Bailey-Wilson said.

She continues to field hundreds of calls from geneticists and other medical personnel offering help. The effort, she said, "is bridging the gap between genetic and forensic medicine to help make our country better prepared to deal with a massive disaster."

The Cost Of Errant Justice (WP)

By Brian Forst

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

A March 6 Post editorial lamented the District's appallingly low homicide closure rate. Last year just 43 percent of all known homicides reported to the D.C. police department resulted in a prosecution. While this number is low, it turns out that the problem -- most serious offenders evading punishment -- is not unique to the District. Consider the roughly 15 million felony victimizations that occur annually in the United States. Just half of these are reported to the police, and only a million or so defendants in those cases are convicted, leaving well over 10 million failures each year to convict serious, culpable offenders.

Errors on the other side -- wrongful convictions -- are equally noteworthy, even if less frequent. Estimates of erroneous convictions range from 0.5 percent to about 1.3 percent, suggesting something like 10,000 wrongful convictions annually. Civil libertarians have compiled a list of people convicted of capital murder and later exonerated. In 2001 then-Justice Sandra Day O'Connor cited 90 such releases since 1973. At last count the number had risen to 175.

But the problem of such errors is more than a matter of counting misses on both plates of the scale of justice. Even if there are many more failures to convict than wrongful convictions -- and even if no one has been wrongfully executed in the 30 years since the Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty (no one really knows) -- wrongful imprisonments impose huge costs on innocent people: loss of freedom, lost companionship of loved ones, lost livelihoods and difficulty getting decent jobs after years in prison. And they impose parallel losses on families and friends of the wrongfully convicted and services lost to the community. These are extremely costly errors.

And they are gross injustices. Perhaps the greatest cost of wrongful convictions is their corrosive effect on the legitimacy of the criminal justice system. Typically a product of erroneous witness identification and bad luck, wrongful convictions seriously undermine the public's confidence in police, prosecutors and the courts. They are double errors, reflecting also failures to bring to justice those who actually committed the acts, sometimes enabling the commission of further crimes.

In his last days in office as Virginia's governor, Mark Warner took unprecedented action to deal with the problem. He ordered thousands of decades-old cases involving DNA evidence to be reopened following the discovery of files containing meticulously preserved samples of blood, semen and saliva, ready for retesting using technology that had not been available when the evidence was originally collected. DNA analysis of evidence in a small sample of these cases induced Warner to pardon two inmates wrongfully convicted of rape. This work to expose and correct errors of justice -- and to validate the accuracy of other old cases -- may prove to be Warner's greatest legacy, not only to Virginia but to the nation's criminal justice system.

Some errors of justice are inevitable, but we could manage them much more effectively than we do. Sophisticated systems are in place to manage mistakes in other fields: scientific research and production processes, for example, or to balance the risk of loss against the yield in financial portfolios. And yet no such systems exist with regard to the vitally important business of determining guilt or innocence in criminal cases.

This can be fixed. The use of modern management methods and more widespread availability of effective forensic technology could go a long way to solve more of these crimes and reduce both types of error. DNA evidence gives us a unique window into errors for those crimes for which the evidence is available and relevant. We can use this window to estimate rates of errors for those crimes. We can do more to assess the social costs of both wrongful convictions and nonconvictions for each major crime category: The costs to the community of failures to convict serial rapists and one-time shoplifters are clearly in different leagues. We can learn more about the relationships between police and prosecution policies and errors of justice. And in old, settled cases with valid DNA evidence, as in Virginia, we may be able to find further errors of justice and correct them. Better late than never.

CIVIL LAW:

Justice Department Subpoenas Reach Far Beyond Google (INFOWEEK)

By Thomas Claburn, InformationWeek

Information Week, March 30, 2006

In its effort to uphold the 1998 Child Online Protection Act (COPA), the U.S. Department of Justice is leaving no stone unturned. Its widely reported issuance of subpoenas to Internet search companies AOL, MSN, Google, and Yahoo is just the tip of the iceberg: The government has demanded information from at least 34 Internet service providers, search companies, and security software firms.

Responding to a Freedom of Information Act request filed by InformationWeek, the Department of Justice disclosed that it has issued to subpoenas to a broad range of companies that includes AT&T, Comcast Cable, Cox Communications, EarthLink, LookSmart, SBC Communications (then separate from AT&T), Symantec, and Verizon.

Asked which companies objected to, or sought to limit, these subpoenas, Department of Justice spokesperson Charles Miller declined to comment because the litigation is ongoing. He also declined to comment on utility of the information gathered by the government.

The documents presented to InformationWeek reveal that some companies did object to the government's demands. In an E-mail sent to the Department of Justice last July, Fernando Laguarda, an attorney representing Cablevision Systems Corp., characterized some of what the government was asking for as "overly broad, vague, ambitious, and unduly burdensome."

In a letter sent to the Department of Justice in August, Joseph Serino Jr., an attorney representing Verizon, voiced similar objections. However, he clearly states that his objections are routine and intended protect the company.

The one exceptional objection he cites has to do with the sensitivity of the information sought. Serino said Verizon Online is concerned that documents might be forwarded to people working for entities hostile to Verizon Online, or suing the company, including the Justice Department itself, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Verizon did not respond to requests for comment.

The subpoenas were issued between June and September, 2005. Beyond AOL, MSN, Google, and Yahoo, the only other search engine subpoenaed was LookSmart.

It's likely, however, that the government's interest in LookSmart stems not from the company's search engine but from its ownership of Internet content filtering software company Net Nanny.

LookSmart declined to comment about the information it was asked for and the information it provided. EarthLink likewise declined to comment.

The bulk of the subpoenas were directed at Internet service providers and makers of content filtering software. The effectiveness of filtering technology is a critical issue in the COPA case. If the Department of Justice can prove that filters fail to shield minors from explicit material online, COPA may well be reinstated.

The full list of companies subpoenaed by the Department of Justice includes: 711Net (Mayberry USA), American Family Online, AOL, ATT, Authentium, Bell South, Cable Vision, Charter Communications, Comcast Cable Company, Computer Associates, ContentWatch, Cox Communications, EarthLink, Google, Internet4Families, LookSmart, McAfee, MSN, Qwest, RuleSpace, S4F (Advance Internet Management), SafeBrowse, SBC Communications, Secure Computing Corp., Security

Software Systems, SoftForYou, Solid Oak Software, Surf Control, Symantec, Time Warner, Tucows (Mayberry USA), United Online, Verizon, and Yahoo.

The subpoenas directed at security software companies asked for a substantial amount of information: any and all documents that fall into 29 separate categories including the kinds of content filtering products or services offered, the number of customers using those products or services, how users configure their filters, how filters get updated, R&D spending on such products, the methodology used to generate blacklisted or filtered sites, and pretty much any data gathered that relates to the use of filters.

"What they are doing, from our perspective, is engaging in a massive fishing expedition, in an attempt to find some shred of evidence that they think can change a result they didn't like, which is that COPA violates the First Amendment," says Aden Fine, an attorney for the ACLU.

While the government's demands for information from Internet search engines have privacy implications for individuals, its interest in corporate information raises questions about the rights of businesses.

Stephen Ryan, a partner at Manatt Phelps & Phillips in Washington D.C., considers the scope of the government's discovery efforts unusual. "I'm not surprised that the Google piece looks like the tip of an iceberg," he says. "But it is sort of surprising that they're using their authority this broadly."

Ryan acknowledges that government subpoenas place undue burdens on companies every day, noting that there are probably scores of attorneys at large ISPs who do nothing but process subpoenas. He suggests that as information technology produces more information, that the government will want greater access to that data.

With regard to the financial impact of subpoenas, Ryan notes, "If you look at the Office of Regulatory Affairs at Office of Management and Budget, there's something called the Paperwork Reduction Act. And there's supposed to be an evaluation of the burden that a government law or regulation will make on the public. I'll bet there's never been a burden analysis of what they're doing."

Justice Department spokesman Miller said he would inquire about this but did not have an immediate answer.

Dan Jude, however, did. Jude, president of filtering software company Security Software Systems, confirms that the subpoena his 12-person firm received was a burden. "It was a pain," he says. "I don't have exact figures but it took 40-plus hours to put stuff together."

Jude says the Department of Justice asked for proprietary information about his company's content filtering software. Despite assurances the information would remain confidential, he says he refused that particular demand, fearing that it might be revealed by a Freedom of Information Act request.

Jude contends the government's efforts to prop up COPA are misguided. "It's a waste of time," he says, noting that he testified before the COPA Commission about the prevalence of explicit material online in August, 2000. The problem, he says, is that U.S. legislation has no teeth because half of the Web servers with explicit content are located in other countries.

If COPA were to be reinstated, Jude suggests that the Department of Justice would have to turn ISPs into content police in order to deal with offshore offenders.

As someone who sells a technical solution, it's perhaps not surprise that Jude has faith in filtering. "The great thing about the technology is that it allows parents to make the determination of what they want their kids to be able to do and not to do," he says. "And isn't that what we're supposed to be doing in this country?"

Judge: Delco Boy Killed Responding To Fire Deserves Death Benefits (PHI)

By Jeff Price

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 30, 2006

After years of hearings and appeals, U.S. Court of Federal Claims Judge Marian Blank Horn on Monday overturned a U.S. Justice Department decision that denied death benefits to a 14-year-old junior firefighter who was killed riding his bike to answer a fire alarm.

The Justice Department had maintained that because Christopher Kangas, an eighth-grader at Northley Middle School in Brookhaven at the time of his death, was a trainee, he did not qualify as a public safety officer.

Without the title, the junior firefighter was not eligible for federal death benefits, and, most important to his mother and his fellow firefighters, not eligible to have his named inscribed on the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial.

"Christopher Kangas died 'in the line of duty' and was a 'firefighter' authorized to be at a fire scene and perform duties as part of a team engaged in the 'suppression of fires' at the time of his death," she wrote in Washington.

Chris's mom, Julie Amber-Messick, did not try to hide her joy.

"I'm in shock," she said this afternoon, reading again the judge's decision. "I keep looking at that paragraph, that he was a firefighter, that he was a member of a team - we were right!

DOJ_NMG_0024136

The Justice Department, which has 60 days to appeal the ruling, did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Judge Rules In Favor Of Fallen Junior Firefighter's Family (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - An appeals court has ruled that the family of a 14-year-old junior firefighter from Pennsylvania killed while responding to a fire is eligible for federal benefits.

Christopher Kangas, of Brookhaven, Pa., was struck by a car two blocks from the Brookhaven fire station while responding on a bicycle to a fire on May 4, 2002.

The Justice Department ruled that Kangas did not meet the definition of a public safety officer under the 1976 Public Safety Officers' Benefits Act because he was a trainee.

But Monday's ruling by Judge Marian Blank Horn in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims reversed that decision. Kangas' family is now eligible for $250,000 in benefits and Kangas' name can be added to the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial in Emmitsburg, Md.

Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., who testified at a hearing on behalf of Kangas' family, praised the ruling on Wednesday.

The Justice Department has 60 days to appeal the ruling.

FEC's Coordination Ruling Could Shake Up The Midterms (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, March 30, 2006

The Federal Election Commission (FEC) is set to rule next week on when TV spots, print ads and other advocacy buys from outside groups should be treated as in-kind campaign contributions.

Some party committees are asking the agency to change its standard.

Under campaign-finance rules, a political ad is deemed coordinated and treated as a contribution subject to McCain-Feingold limits when it meets a three-part test.

In July, however, a federal court struck down part of the "content" test, which sets different rules for ads running more than 120 days before a primary or general election.

Under the test, an ad could avoid being tagged as coordinated if it runs outside the 120-day window and does not use "express advocacy language" urging a vote for or against a specified candidate. The court questioned the FEC's rationale for choosing a 120-day window and asked the agency to look into when the majority of party advertising is purchased.

Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer cited Illinois's early primary as an example. Illinois Democrat Tammy Duckworth last week won a close primary against Christine Cegelis and will take on state Sen. Peter Roskam (R) in November.

"Between the primary and four months out from the general election — which is July — you can run ads every day written by the lawmaker, paid for by an outside group, attacking that lawmaker's opponent, as long as they don't contain express advocacy," he said. "Most ads don't contain express advocacy language anyway."

For an ad run within the 120-day window to be considered coordinated, according to current rules, it must refer to a political party or a clearly identified candidate in addition to being targeted to that candidate's electorate.

In comments submitted in advance of next week's ruling, Congress's four party committees have all recommended shrinking the window, increasing the number of ads that would have to meet the weaker "express advocacy" test to be considered coordinated.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), through counsels Robert Bauer and Marc Elias, asked the FEC to replace the 120-day window with the 30- and 60-day windows that determine when an ad or mailing qualifies as an "electioneering communication."

A 90-day window, the Democratic commentators wrote, "would be the outer limit of any plausible extension."

The general counsels of the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) and National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) agreed.

"The Commission is completely justified in limiting the reach of its coordination rules, without fear of circumvention," wrote NRCC counsel Donald McGahn.

Wertheimer, along with fellow watchdogs at the Center for Responsive Politics and the Campaign Legal Center, disagrees. They handed the FEC copies of Club for Growth ads critical of Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) and Montana Democratic Party ads critical of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), among others.

The three watchdogs urged the FEC to add another standard to the 120-day window that would ensnare ads placed by 527s and nonprofit 501(c) groups avoiding the use of express advocacy language.

McCain-Feingold's lead sponsors — Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) — weighed in with comments in January that blasted the FEC's coordination rule as "even weaker than the one Congress repealed" by passing their landmark law.

FEC Commissioner Ellen Weintraub, a Democrat, said the panel is negotiating over what the new rule should look like. The FEC's initial rulemaking notice suggested seven possible outcomes, including "adopt a different timeframe" to replace the 120-day window.

"We have a lot of different options on the table, and it's all in flux right now," Weintraub said. "I'm not sure that this whole framework of a three-part test is what I would have come up with on my own, but we're not starting with a blank slate … I'm probably not going to be supportive of an entirely new approach."

Weintraub and fellow Commissioner Robert Lenhard, the FEC's vice chairman, said the agency has not ignored the crucial pre-midterm timing of its new rule.

"We're mindful that this is occurring during an election year," said Lenhard, who defended the FEC's existing coordination rule, including the 120-day window. "I don't think there's a lot of evidence of illegal coordination going on out there," he said.

Americans for Job Security, a business-backed 501(c) group, drew fire in December from the campaign of Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D), who is challenging Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.). Casey filed an FEC complaint after the group spent $500,000 on ads supporting Santorum, and Casey supporters charged the Santorum campaign with illegal coordination.

The Watchdog Awakes (NYT)

The Federal Election Commission finally did the right thing in ruling that the Internet must not be used as a conduit for unregulated salvos of big-money political advertising. Scolded by a federal judge, the commission reversed its earlier rule that threatened to turn the Web into a giant trough for the six- and seven-figure donations from corporations, unions and fat-cat influence shoppers that Congress banned in the campaign reforms of 2002.

The F.E.C. ruling against such "soft money" corruption is welcome as well for its ringing endorsement of the free-speech rights of political bloggers, who had been concerned that they would be unfairly hobbled by any campaign controls on the Web. To the contrary, bloggers have now been assured of the same wide latitude to opine free of government control as newspapers enjoy, so long as they are not paid by a political campaign.

The commission's action is timely for effectively skewering a brazen attempt in the House this week to make the Internet a soft money cornucopia beyond the reach of campaign law. The measure was peddled in the name of protecting bloggers' free speech, but that veil has been shredded by the F.E.C.'s rule. House Republican leaders wisely pulled the measure from the agenda rather than laying bare the political greed of trying to make the Web a supermarket for influence peddling.

Justice Department Approves South Carolina Primary Plan (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

COLUMBIA, S.C. - The U.S. Justice Department has approved South Carolina's plans for the June 13 primary.

"They cleared it," state Sen. Larry Martin, R-Pickens, told the Senate on Wednesday. "So, it's already in effect and it's ready to go."

In February, the Justice Department challenged the state's runoffs because they come just two weeks after the primary. Agency lawyers said that was not enough time for overseas and military voters to receive and return runoff ballots.

The Legislature approved changes in the state's election laws that lets overseas and military voters rank primary candidates to indicate who they would vote for in a runoff. The law change also lets overseas and military voters cast ballots by fax or e-mail.

Civil Rights Groups Urge Feds To Block Georgia's Voter ID Law (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

ATLANTA – Civil rights groups have asked the U.S. Justice Department to block a new Georgia law that requires a photo ID to vote.

More than two dozen civil rights, community, religious and citizen advocacy groups sent a letter to the department on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0024138

The law was signed by Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue in January but needs Justice Department approval before it can be enforced.

Even if the department approves it, a federal judge could stall the law. An earlier version of the law was blocked by a federal judge in October.

It makes Georgia one of seven states that require a photo ID such as a driver's license to cast a ballot. The law eliminates several forms of identification previously accepted at the polls, such as Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills.

Unlike last year's version, the new law would provide a free state-issued photo ID card to anyone who needs one.

Perdue and others say the measure will help crack down on voter fraud. Democrats claim the Republicans are trying to suppress voting among blacks, poor people and the elderly, who are less likely to have driver's licenses.

Under the federal Voting Rights Act, the South and other parts of the country with a history of discrimination need federal approval for changes in their election laws.

Man Faces 10 Years In Sex-slave Plea (FMNP)

By Grant Boxleitner

Fort Myers (FL) News-Press, March 30, 2006

A Guatemalan man whose arrest in 2004 unveiled the dark secrets of human trafficking in Southwest Florida pleaded guilty Wednesday to all federal charges facing him.

Under the plea agreement, Fernando Pascual, 22, will do 10 years in prison, with no chance for early release, said Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Molloy. Pascual's guilty plea spares the 15-year-old victim in this case, who was held against her will and forced to be a sex slave, from having to appear in open court for a trial.

His guilty plea comes nearly two years after his arrest.

Pascual was charged with sex trafficking and harboring immigrants for commercial gain.

"He has accepted responsibility for what he did," Molloy said. "This is what the victim wanted. This was the best resolution in this case."

The Guatemalan teenager told investigators she was forced to cook, clean house and used as a sex slave by Fernando Pascual. She was enslaved, raped, beaten and impregnated, investigators said.

A neighbor reported the girl's story to the FBI, which prompted a federal investigation.

Pascual's sister, Matilde Pascual Andres, 26, pleaded guilty to harboring the girl and making her help prepare food for migrant workers.

She agreed to cooperate against Pascual, Molloy said. Pascual, Andres and husband, Pascual Sebastian Miguel, have been in custody since May 20, 2004, when detectives from the Lee County Human Trafficking Unit raided a North Fort Myers home where they were residing. The abuse happened at a home in Cape Coral. The victim and her baby were no longer living with the family.

Miguel pleaded guilty in February to harboring illegal immigrants.

The News-Press investigated the case in 2005, reporting that safety nets designed to protect Florida's children from abuse failed the girl for more than 1 1/2 years.

Bills Fail To Change Voting Rules For New Orleans Election (AP)

By DOUG SIMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 30, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. - The Rev. Jesse Jackson went to the state Capitol on Wednesday with his campaign to make it easier for displaced New Orleans residents to vote in the April 22 mayor's race, but he got no help from a Senate committee.

The Senate and Governmental Affairs Committee rejected a bill that aimed to create "satellite voting centers" in other states, so registered voters now living out of state could cast ballots without traveling back to Louisiana.

Jackson testified that forcing displaced voters - most of whom are black - to pay for transportation back to New Orleans amounted to a "poll tax" akin to those that existed in the Jim Crow era.

Opponents questioned whether Louisiana would get full cooperation from the other 49 states where Katrina evacuees now live.

Sen. Jay Dardenne called the plan "a recipe for litigation," arguing that it would provoke lawsuits alleging that different voters received different treatment depending on which state they voted in.

"You have to have a consistent plan that treats everyone alike," said Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge. "It is virtually impossible ... to envision how you could implement that on a nationwide basis."

The bill, by Sen. Cleo Fields, D-Baton Rouge, failed on a 3-3 vote.

State election officials have taken several steps to help residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina vote in the April 22 municipal elections, including easing restrictions on mail voting and setting up offices around the state where residents can cast early ballots prior to election day. But some civil rights groups say the state has not done enough.

A federal judge this week turned back their efforts to delay the election. Meanwhile, some lawmakers in the session that began Monday are pushing various bills they hope will further ease displaced residents' ability to vote.

Another Fields bill would have required the Louisiana Secretary of State's office to mail absentee ballots to all voters displaced by a natural disaster and living at a new address. Under current law, such voters receive an absentee ballot only after requesting one by mail - a process Fields and Jackson called an "undue burden."

While that bill could not have made it through the Legislature in time to affect the April 22 election, it could have been passed in time for the expected May 20 runoff.

But Sen. Chris Ullo amended it so that it would not take effect until after the runoff. Ullo, D-Harvey, said he was reluctant to tinker further with the New Orleans elections, after the U.S. Justice Department has already approved other changes that include shifting the primary date from February to April.

The panel approved the watered down bill with a 4-2 vote, sending it to the full Senate. Dardenne and Sen. Noble Ellington, D-Winnsboro, voted against it.

New Orleans Officers Indicted In Beating (AP)

By Mary Foster

AP, March 30, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - Two former New Orleans police officers who were caught on videotape beating a retired teacher were indicted on felony charges that could send them to prison for years.

The officers - Robert Evangelist and Lance Schilling - were fired after the Oct. 8 beating of Robert Davis, 64, was captured on video by an Associated Press Television News crew covering the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Evangelist, 36, faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of false imprisonment while armed with a dangerous weapon and second-degree battery. Schilling, 29, could spend five years behind bars if convicted of second-degree battery.

"I hope this will result in something good for our city," said Davis, who spent more than an hour Wednesday testifying about the beating, which left him lying on the street, hands cuffed and blood flowing from his head and face.

A third officer, Stewart Smith, 50, was charged with simple battery. If convicted, he faces up to 6 months in jail and a $500 fine. Smith was suspended for 120 days but remains on the force.

Evangelist and Schilling were charged with battery against Davis, and Smith was charged with battery against a reporter.

A telephone call Wednesday to an attorney representing Evangelist, Schilling and Smith for comment was not returned.

Police Superintendent Warren Riley said in a statement late Wednesday that Smith would be reassigned to desk duty pending the outcome of his trial.

After the grand jury appearance, Davis told reporters that he still has headaches and back problems. He had to interrupt his testimony to take medicine.

The retired elementary school teacher said he had returned to the storm-struck city to check on his property and was looking for a place to buy cigarettes in the French Quarter when police grabbed him.

The videotape shows an officer hitting Davis at least four times on the head. Davis twisted and flailed as he was dragged to the ground. One officer kneed Davis and punched him twice.

Smith had ordered APTN producer Rich Matthews and the cameraman to stop recording. When Matthews held up his credentials, the officer grabbed him, jabbed him in the stomach and delivered a profanity-laced tirade.

The video also shows two FBI agents joining the police in subduing Davis. Their role is being investigated by federal officials.

A federal civil rights investigation also was launched.

"Without this videotape, I'm sure this case would be swept under the rug," said Davis' attorney, Joseph Bruno.

District Attorney Eddie Jordan agreed the videotape was important.

"Any time you have strong evidence, and I consider a videotape strong evidence, it helps your case," he said.

When asked if the false imprisonment charge meant that Davis should not have been arrested, Jordan said, "I think that's a fair inference."

Davis has pleaded not guilty to municipal charges of public intoxication, resisting arrest, battery on a police officer and public intimidation. His lawyer said this week he expects the charges will be dropped.

U.S. Attorney Says Harrison Sheriff Can't Talk About Inmate Death (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0024140

AP, March 30, 2006

GULFPORT, Miss. - U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton says Harrison County Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. cannot comment on the death of a jail inmate because of federal statutes that apply to grand jury matters and ongoing investigations.

County supervisors had asked Payne this week to talk to them about the death of Jessie Lee Williams Jr. Williams was allegedly beaten by jailers in the booking room of the county jail on Feb. 4. Without details, supervisors said they are ill-prepared to respond to a wrongful death lawsuit in which they are among defendants.

Payne said sheriff's department was not part of the investigation and Lampton told him that the department was not "to comment in any shape, form or fashion on the case or the investigation."

Cy Faneca, Payne's attorney, told supervisors he tried to get permission from the U.S. Justice Department to show them the booking room videotapes, but was denied.

Lampton confirmed Tuesday that he told Payne not to comment.

The videotapes, Lampton said, likely will be released at a later time, "but probably not as quickly as you would like."

The original videotapes are in federal possession, an issue of concern to attorneys for Williams' estate. They haven't been able to get copies, either.

The case would move quicker, if it was only a state investigation, Lampton said.

"If we arrest someone, we have to be prepared to take it to a grand jury in 30 days. It is more important to worry about the end result, to be fair and have sufficient evidence," he said.

No charges have been filed. A federal grand jury convenes the first and third week of each month, but a special grand jury can be convened if requested.

Attorney Michael W. Crosby, who filed a civil lawsuit on behalf of Williams' family, said Monday he is not giving up on gaining access to the tapes.

Board President Connie Rockco said it is frustrating for supervisors to be named as co-defendants and "know nothing about what happened."

The wrongful death lawsuit alleges former corrections officer Ryan Teel, 29, is the jailer who allegedly continued to beat, punch, choke and torture Williams while he was restrained and hog-tied.

Williams, 40, was in custody on misdemeanor charges of public drunk, simple assault on a minor and pointing and aiming a gun. He died at a hospital two days after the Feb. 4 arrest when he was taken off life support.

Teel was on administrative leave with pay for more than a month before his resignation.

Four other booking room officers are named in the lawsuit, but they apparently are still employed at the jail.

Court Rules Against Democrat In Leak Of Tape (WP)

By Christopher Lee

Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) violated the rights of Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and broke federal law 10 years ago when he leaked the contents of an illegally taped telephone call to the press, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

In a 2 to 1 opinion, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit ordered McDermott to pay Boehner, now House majority leader, more than $700,000, including $60,000 in damages and hundreds of thousands of dollars for legal fees. Boehner had sued McDermott, alleging violations of federal and state wiretapping laws.

The tape was of a Dec. 21, 1996, conference call among Republican leaders, including then-House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), over how to handle the fallout of the ethics sanctions against Gingrich. Boehner, then the GOP conference chairman, was vacationing in Florida and participated on a cellular phone.

John and Alice Martin, Democratic activists from Florida, overheard the discussion on a police scanner and recorded it. The Martins gave the tape to McDermott; they later pleaded guilty to illegally intercepting the call and were each fined $500.

Boehner targeted his ire at McDermott, then the ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee, who he said leaked the contents of the tape to the New York Times and other news organizations in a blatant invasion of privacy.

"The reason I proceeded then, and the reason I continue to be engaged in this, is because while we all expect our political opponents to go after us, violating the law in the pursuit of your political opponents is, in fact, against the law and should not be tolerated," Boehner said this week.

Boehner said that twice in the past three years he offered to withdraw the lawsuit if McDermott agreed to admit that he was wrong, apologized to the House and donated $10,000 to charity.

In a written statement Tuesday, McDermott said he "respectfully" disagrees with the appeals court's decision and is evaluating whether to appeal. "The American people have a right to know when their government's leaders are plotting to deceive them, and that is exactly what was happening" during the taped call, he said.

McDermott had contended that he did not break any laws by receiving the tape, and argued that penalizing him for making it public would violate his free-speech rights. The Washington Post, the Times and other news organizations filed briefs in support of McDermott's right to release the contents to the media.

McDermott lost the previous round in federal court in August 2004, when U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan ruled that he "participated in an illegal transaction when he accepted the tape."

Two Chains Reject Magazine With Muhammad Cartoons (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y., March 29 -- Borders and Waldenbooks stores will not stock the April-May issue of Free Inquiry magazine because it contains cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad that provoked deadly protests among Muslims in several countries.

"For us, the safety and security of our customers and employees is a top priority, and we believe that carrying this issue could challenge that priority," Borders Group Inc. spokeswoman Beth Bingham said.

The magazine, published by the Council for Secular Humanism in suburban Amherst, includes four of the drawings that originally appeared in a Danish newspaper in September.

"What is at stake is the precious right of freedom of expression," said Paul Kurtz, editor in chief of Free Inquiry. "Cartoons often provide an important form of political satire. . . . To refuse to distribute a publication because of fear of vigilante violence is to undermine freedom of press -- so vital for our democracy."

"We absolutely respect our customers' right to choose what they wish to read and buy and we support the First Amendment," Bingham said. "And we absolutely support the rights of Free Inquiry to publish the cartoons. We've just chosen not to carry this particular issue in our stores."

Culture Wars: Beware Of Presuming Sameness (USAT)

By Jonathan Zimmerman

USA Today, March 30, 2006

I don't remember her name. But I can still picture my sixth grade student's frightened expression when I asked her to give the first classroom presentation that morning.

"Where I come from," she said, in a quivering voice, "girls don't go first." She was an immigrant from a Muslim country in the Middle East whose family had moved to Baltimore a few years earlier. I was a young social studies teacher at her middle school, fired with passion and idealism. I believed in my heart that schools should respect national differences. But I also believed that we should treat boys and girls in an equal fashion.

So how should I have responded? For years, I've put this question to my graduate students. Most side with the girl, citing her distinct cultural background. By forcing the girl to go first, my students tell me, I would be telling her, and the class, that there's something inferior about her culture. And that's not a message our public schools should transmit.

A vocal minority of students bridles at this approach. Some invoke a brand of liberal universalism: Girls and boys are endowed with equal rights, no matter what different cultures might say about it. Others emphasize America's own national rights and imperatives.

American values

Although other cultures do not award equal respect to girls, this argument says, America does; the Middle Eastern girl came to America, so America has both the duty and the responsibility to convert her to its ways.

I'm always a bit bemused by this debate, which masks a basic consensus about culture itself. Both sides assume that culture exists outside of history; that each person has one culture, and only one; and that we know what it is.

We don't.

In my young student's country of origin, most people probably believed that "girls don't go first." But many thought otherwise. Mideast societies contain a huge variety of attitudes about gender and everything else. Culture collapses these distinctions, tricking us into thinking that all in the Middle East think the same. You know, those Middle Easterners. Always oppressing women; it's in their culture.

A century ago, Americans and Europeans spoke knowingly about civilization rather than culture. Only whites possessed it. The culture concept arose to challenge this racial hierarchy, insisting that every people, including people of color, had a distinct set of values, beliefs and habits. And though you might not share these beliefs and habits, you were enjoined to respect them. They weren't necessarily worse, or better, than yours; they were, quite simply, different.

Stereotypical views

The culture concept revolutionized Western thought, forcing us to acknowledge the huge distortions that a ladder of civilization based on race had fostered. But culture imposed distortions of its own, starting with the dubious idea that everybody in a given culture, or race, thinks in the same way.

This fallacy is richly bipartisan, as we've seen during the recent debates over the war in Iraq. President Bush's newly emboldened GOP critics insist that the culture of Iraq is so different, so authoritarian, so intolerant, so divided, that democracy will never take root there.

We hear much the same thing from Democrats, with a slightly altered inflection: Because our own culture is so different from Iraqi culture, we have no business trying to impose ours on theirs.

They're both wrong. America's war in Iraq might be misguided, for many reasons. But culture is not one of them. By making blanket claims about Iraqi culture, the war's critics place 25 million people in the same conceptual straightjacket.

And that brings us back to my young student. I'm not proud of this, but I let her go second. Today, I'd turn her objection into a set of questions. When you say "girls don't go first" in your homeland, what do you mean? Who agrees with this idea? Who doesn't?

Why do Americans continue to deny these differences in the name of culture? Now, more than ever, that's a question we need to ask.

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Antitrust Review Backs Whirlpool-Maytag Merger (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

The Justice Department's antitrust division announced yesterday that it had approved Whirlpool's purchase of its smaller rival Maytag, a $1.7 billion deal that will create one of the largest home appliance companies in the world.

Despite the dominant market share the merged companies would have, government lawyers concluded that the deal was not likely to reduce competition among home appliance manufacturers substantially, in part because of strong domestic rivals like General Electric and Frigidaire as well as rivals from abroad including LG, Samsung and Bosch.

Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general for antitrust, said yesterday that foreign competitors — although they are primarily supplying more expensive machines now — can still put meaningful pressure on appliance prices. "It's not a question of whether they will enter the U.S.," Mr. Barnett said. "In this case, they're quite credible given that they're already here."

The green light from Mr. Barnett's office removes the last obstacle to Whirlpool's determined pursuit of the venerable Maytag brand. After initially offering $17 a share for the company last July, Whirlpool eventually had to raise its offer to $21 a share to lock up the deal last August.

Shares of Whirlpool rose $6.38 yesterday, or 7.1 percent, to close at $95.95. Maytag shares gained $4.73, or almost 28 percent, to close at $21.81.

David L. Swift, the president of Whirlpool, said the company expected to close the deal "before the opening bell on Monday." It had delayed the final steps in the transaction to allow time for the Justice Department's review, he said.

Mr. Swift noted that Whirlpool's original presentation to the antitrust division had included letters from 20 of its trade customers — the retail outlets that sell its appliances — and all supported the deal.

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., is the largest home appliance maker in the United States, and Maytag of Newton, Iowa, is the third largest. But the combined heft of the two formidable brands, especially in the market for dishwashers and home laundry equipment, prompted criticism from some antitrust experts and analysts. General Electric is No. 2, by domestic appliance sales.

The combined company's market power would "substantially lessen competition by impairing the ability of rivals to compete effectively, " said Diana Moss, vice president and senior research fellow at the American Antitrust Institute, an independent research and advocacy group in Washington. That, in turn, would "harm consumers through higher prices, reduced choice and less innovation," she argued in a report issued by the institute in January.

Both Mr. Swift at Whirlpool and Mr. Barnett, the assistant attorney general, acknowledged that antitrust questions were naturally raised by the combined companies' significant market share — neither would say how big, but Ms. Moss has estimated it at 50 percent to 75 percent, depending on the product.

In Mr. Bennett's view, those questions were satisfactorily answered not only by the presence of strong competitors but also by the substantial cost savings that Whirlpool expects to achieve at Maytag.

And Mr. Swift noted that traditional measures of Whirlpool market share, which he said was not as large as some public estimates, still do not take into account the increasing power of the retailers who are its first-line customers.

Just four giant retailers — Sears, Lowe's, Home Depot and Best Buy — control 65 percent of retail home appliance sales, he said. That power has "created a very different dynamic" for manufacturers, he said.

Whirlpool-Maytag Deal Gets Antitrust Approval (WSJ)

By Ilan Brat And Richard Gibson

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Whirlpool Corp. hopes to close its acquisition of appliance maker Maytag Corp. no later than Monday, as the Justice Department said it won't block the $1.7 billion deal.

In an interview, David Swift, Whirlpool's North American president, vowed to "inject exciting new life" into Maytag brands, although he said it was too soon to comment on which brands Whirlpool would keep or whether it would close any plants. He said the company also would be able to lower costs by increasing manufacturing efficiencies and by buying supplies in larger volumes.

"While efficiencies certainly are a part of what makes this an appealing acquisition, we get very excited about our ability to grow our top-line products and accelerate innovation," Mr. Swift said.

After several months of review, the Justice Department concluded yesterday that the deal "is not likely to reduce competition substantially," citing the combined companies'"ability to expand sales significantly and large cost savings and other efficiencies that Whirlpool appears likely to achieve."

Under traditional antitrust analysis, the deal would probably be rejected or reshaped because of the combined companies' majority share of the U.S. market for washers and dryers. But the Justice Department weighed other factors that carried the day, including the prospect of foreign competition.

This rising level of competition -- mostly from Asia -- would deter the merged companies from raising prices, the department said. Foreign competitors could increase imports and use excess capacity to increase production, the department said.

Also, the agency noted that large retailers, through which the majority of such appliances are sold -- including Sears Holdings Corp., Lowe's Cos. and Best Buy Co. -- have alternatives available to help them resist price increases.

Whirlpool of Benton Harbor, Mich., is the world's largest maker of major home appliances by sales. Maytag, Newton, Iowa, is No. 3 behind General Electric Co. Whirlpool beat at least two rivals with its $22-a-share offer for Maytag, with about a $1.7 billion market value.

Whirlpool and Maytag shares jumped on the news. Whirlpool rose $6.38, or 7%, to $95.95, and Maytag leapt $4.73, or 28%, to $21.81 on the New York Stock Exchange.

After the Justice Department's ruling, Standard & Poor's announced that Maytag shares would be removed from the S&P 500-stock index and be replaced by Dean Foods Co. on a date to be announced. S&P routinely makes such a move when a company is acquired.

Laura Champine, a Morgan Keegan & Co. analyst, said the company likely would stay largely intact, in part because its widely known brands would cost little to maintain. However, she predicted Whirlpool will sell Maytag's Hoover line of vacuum cleaners.

Justice OKs Whirlpool's $1.7B Acquisition Of Maytag (USAT)

By Theresa Howard

USA Today, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK — In a surprising decision Wednesday, the Department of Justice said that Whirlpool (WHR) can go ahead with its $1.7 billion purchase of appliance rival Maytag (MYG) without having to divest any brands.

The deal, which Whirlpool expects to close by Monday, will make it the world's largest appliance manufacturer, accounting for about 70% of domestic sales for washers and dryers, and about 50% of dishwashers.

Whirlpool's brands include KitchenAid, Roper and Consul. It also makes Kenmore appliances for Sears, although the retailer sets prices.

Maytag makes Hoover vacuum cleaners and products from Jenn-Air, Amana and Magic Chef.

The combined "market share was high enough to conduct a very extensive and thorough investigation of this case," Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general for antitrust, said in a conference call. "We went beyond market share and evaluated the competitive dynamics about what is likely to happen."

He says that prices should stay in check because of competition from the growing ranks of foreign manufacturers, including LG and Samsung, and other American manufacturers, such as General Electric.

"When we looked at the question of an anti-competitive price increase on low-to-midrange products, we considered North American competitors who could expand their sales, and foreign companies," Barnett said. For example, South Korea's LG, which distributes to chains such as Home Depot, "has been quite successful in a short period of time."

The foreign factor is a fairly new consideration with regulators.

"Ten years ago, if you said the Chinese were coming, you would have been laughed out of the Justice Department and out of court," says Keith Shugarman, an antitrust lawyer at Goodwin Procter.

Despite the rapidly changing landscape in the U.S. market, one antitrust attorney was surprised with the decision.

"I had not seen any particular arguments that were made that would suggest why this transaction does not reduce consumer choice," said Steve Axinn, antitrust attorney and partner at Axinn Veltrop & Harkrider. "It will probably lead to higher prices at least in some lines down the road."

The Justice Department has been assessing the deal since September. Its decision sent Maytag shares soaring 28% to $21.81, while Whirlpool's were up 7.1% to $95.95.

Whirlpool-Maytag Deal Wins Antitrust Approval (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

Whirlpool's $1.7bn takeover of Maytag was approved by antitrust authorities at the Justice Deparment on Wednesday without any conditions, clearing the way for the creation of the world's largest appliance maker.

The DoJ's decision, in the face of claims that the combined company could control up to 70 per cent of the market for washers and dryers in the US, followed an eight-month-long investigation that was seen as a major test of the limits of the Bush administration's stance on antitrust issues.

It also put a spotlight on Thomas Barnett, the freshly confirmed head of the antitrust division who has gained a reputation among antitrust attorneys for having approved deals during his short tenure against the recommendation of his staff.

Mr Barnett said the deal would not "substantially" reduce competition, was "not likely" to harm consumer welfare, and was "not likely" to give the merged entity market power in the sale of any of its products.

His defence of the deal hinted at a new, emerging standard of antitrust review. This would still consider a company's current market share, but would give more weight to an industry's future competitive landscape. In this case, Mr Barnett said foreign companies such as LG and Samsung could increase their imports into the US in the next few years, adding to competition in the market.

Although he denied that the DoJ was taking a new approach, Mr Barnett emphasised the attention he paid to the potential for new entrants, the excess capacity of other US manufacturers, and the cost savings that would be generated by the combined companies.

"The division found that, despite the two companies' relatively high share of laundry product sales in the US, any attempt to raise prices likely would be unsuccessful," he said.

Approval of the deal also reflects that the DoJ viewed the Kenmore brand of appliances, which is owned by Sears but is largely manufactured by Whirlpool, as a potential rival to the combined company.

The decision vindicates Maytag's directors and advisers, who spent week last year wrestling with the likelihood that a combination with Whirlpool would be cleared by antitrust regulators.

Between July and August, Maytag pushed Whirlpool to raise its offer three times in order to make up for the risk that regulators might block the deal. Maytag's board had previously signed off on a takeover bid which carried no antitrust risk from Ripplewood Holdings, a buy-out group, for the much lower price of $1.1bn.

If the takeover by Whirlpool had not been approved, many observers believe it would have provided a second opportunity for Haier, the Chinese appliance maker, to attempt a bid for Maytag. In June, Haier teamed up with Blackstone and Bain Capital, the private equity groups, to study Maytag's books but decided not to pursue an offer.

The prospect of an iconic US brand and manufacturer being taken over by a Chinese group generated political opposition at the time, coming as CNOOC, the Chinese energy group, was attempting to gain control of California-based Unocal.

Justice Department Approves Whirlpool-Maytag Merger (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Antitrust regulators approved Whirlpool Corp.'s proposed $1.79 billion purchase of Maytag Corp. on Wednesday, saying the merger would not reduce competition substantially.

The existence of strong rivals and the cost savings the new company would generate indicate "this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare," the Justice Department said.

Whirlpool CEO Jeff Fettig said the companies expect to close the deal by Monday.

An investigation by the department's Antitrust Division found that an effort by the new company to raise prices on its washers and dryers "likely would be unsuccessful" because at least five other companies are well-established in U.S. markets.

Those competitors include the Sears Holding Corp.'s brand Kenmore, General Electric Co. and Frigidaire, which is made by Electrolux AB. The Justice Department also concluded that foreign manufacturers have quickly established themselves in recent years.

"LG, Samsung and other foreign manufacturers could increase their imports to the U.S.," the department said in a statement. "Existing U.S. manufacturers have excess capacity and could increase their production."

The Justice Department said large retailers including Sears, Lowe's Companies Inc. , The Home Depot Inc. Co. and Best Buy have alternatives available to help them resist any attempt by the combined company to raise prices.

The cost savings and other efficiencies gained by the merger should also benefit consumers, the department said in a statement.

Some analysts and antitrust lawyers had expected the Justice Department to object to the deal. The merger would create a company producing half of the dishwashers in the United States and more than 70 percent of the clothes washers and dryers.

Such a rise in market concentration has typically drawn a challenge from the government.

Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett said the combined market share prompted a lengthy investigation by his staff.

"It's fair to say that Maytag and Whirlpool account for a large share of the laundry products sold in the United States today and that relatively large share creates an initial rebuttable presumption that justifies an extensive look," he said.

However, he said the investigation resolved those concerns.

The department asked for more time to review the merger last month, prompting wide speculation that it was preparing to challenge the deal.

He declined to comment on whether his staff had recommended a challenge, saying he doesn't comment on internal deliberations.

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., is the largest appliance manufacturer in the United States.

Maytag, based in Newton, Iowa, is number three, behind GE Consumer products. Maytag owns North Canton, Ohio-based vacuum-cleaner maker Hoover Co.

The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1985, represents about 1,000 employees at Hoover's northeast Ohio factories.

The local's president, Jim Repace, said union officials continue to look into a possible employee-sponsored buyout of Hoover. He said consultants in Boston and Chicago plan to present a buyout plan to employees this spring.

Maytag said in February that it was looking at options for the Hoover division, including a possible sale.

Another 1,800 nonunion hourly employees in Juarez, Mexico, and El Paso, Texas, also could be part of the buyout.

Executives from Whirlpool and Maytag declined to discuss how the merger would affect factories and the Maytag's corporate headquarters in Newton, Iowa

"The combination of Whirlpool and Maytag will create substantial benefits for consumers, trade customers and shareholders, through continued development of innovative products, improved quality and service, and cost efficiencies," Fettig said.

Maytag CEO Ralph Hake said the deal provides fair value to Maytag shareholders and will help the company reach a broader base of customers by expanding its global reach.

David MacGregor, an industry analyst with Independence, Ohio-based Longbow Research, said the deal is likely to rapidly improve Maytag's falling market share.

"There's going to be stronger management, there's going to be more resources for growing the business, the brands will have product development that they haven't had in the past and there will be a lot of advertising and promotional support that the brands have lacked in the past," he said.

The antitrust division has been reviewing the proposed merger since September. The companies announced that they had signed a definitive merger agreement in August.

Whirlpool offered to pay $21 a share for Maytag. Including the assumption of $977 million of Maytag debt, the entire deal is valued at about $2.7 billion.

Whirlpool won a bidding match last summer that included a $14 per share bid by New York investment firm Ripplewood Holdings and investment partners. China's Haier America, backed by Bain Capital and Blackstone Group had bid $16 per share to acquire Maytag, whose brands include Maytag, Amana, Hoover, Jenn-Air and Magic Chef.

Whirlpool, which makes KitchenAid, Brastemp, Consul and other brands racheted up the bidding from its initial $17 offer to $21 to entice Maytag away from the Ripplewood group.

Maytag shares rose $4.73, or 27.7 percent, to close at $21.81 on the New York Stock Exchange. They have traded in a 52-week range of $9.21 to $19.97.

Whirlpool shares gained $6.38, or 7.1 percent, to close at $95.95. They've traded between $60.78 and $91.92 in the past year.

Associated Press Writer David Pitt in Des Moines contributed to this story.

Justice Dept. Approves Whirlpool-Maytag Deal (DMR)

Des Moines Register, March 30, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department cleared the way today for Whirlpool Corp.'s purchase of Newton-based Maytag, a combination that would create the world's largest appliance maker and clouds the future of the Iowa company's operations in its hometown.

"After thoroughly investigating Whirlpool's proposed acquisition of Maytag, the division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," the department's antitrust division said in a statement.

The statement said the "transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare" because there are strong rival manufacturers in the market place and Whirlpool appears likely to get large cost-savings and other benefits from the acquisition.

The combination of Whirlpool, the nation's biggest appliance maker, and Newton-based No. 3 Maytag would create the largest appliance manufacturer in the world with annual sales of about $18 billion.

The sale, however, also raises questions about the future of Maytag operations in Newton, where it operates a 1,000-employee washer/dryer factory and employs another estimated 1,300 people at its headquarters.

Maytag also operates a 2,500-employee refrigerator factory in Amana.

Critics of the deal said the combined company would lessen competition and harm consumers through higher prices and reduced choice. The combined company will produce an estimated 75 percent of the nation's top-loading washers and companion dryers.

Backers of the deal said the market would still include another strong domestic appliance maker, General Electric, and foreign appliance makers from Asia and Europe would also offer significant competition.

Maytag stockholders approved the $2.7 billion sale in December, but the deal hadn't closed, pending review by the U.S. Justice Department.

It wasn't clear how soon the deal would close, now that the justice department had announced that it wouldn't challenge the sale.

Maytag stockholders would get $21 for each of their shares, half paid in cash and half paid in Whirlpool stock.

Whirlpool's $1.68 Billion Takeover Of Maytag Approved (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 30, 2006

March 29 (Bloomberg) -- Whirlpool Corp. can complete its $1.68 billion takeover of Maytag Corp., the U.S. Justice Department decided as it rejected concerns from its own lawyers that the combination might hurt competition.

The acquisition, approved without any required divestitures, will create the world's largest appliance maker. It was the first merger decision by Thomas O. Barnett since he won Senate confirmation on Feb. 10 to head the Justice Department's antitrust division.

``I'm stunned," said Mirko Mikelic, a senior portfolio analyst with Fifth Third Bank in Grand Rapids, Michigan, with $21 billion assets including Whirlpool bonds. ``I thought they would need to do at least something to appease the Justice Department."

Shares of Maytag surged $4.73, or almost 28 percent, to $21.81 at 4 p.m. in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Whirlpool rose $6.38, or 7.1 percent, to $95.95.

``The proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," the Justice Department said in a statement. ``Large cost savings and other efficiencies that Whirlpool appears likely to achieve indicate that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare."

Government lawyers who investigated the combination had raised concerns that it would lead to higher prices for washing machines because Whirlpool and Maytag together control more than 70 percent of the U.S. market, said antitrust lawyers familiar with the matter who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the transaction.

Foreign Competition

Whirlpool, argued that growing foreign competition from makers such as China-based Haier Group Corp., LG Corp. of South Korea and Sweden's Electrolux AB would constrain its ability to raise prices.

The Justice Department said in its statement today that it is convinced the combined company can't raise prices because of competition from General Electric Co. and Electrolux AB's Frigidaire line. It also noted that foreign-made products sold by such companies as LG and Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. ``have quickly established themselves in recent years."

The Justice Department also cited competition from Sears Holdings Corp.'s Kenmore brand, which is manufactured by Whirlpool.

Whirlpool said its production of the Kenmore brand shouldn't be counted as part of its share of the washing machine market because Sears sets prices and promotes its own appliances.

Fourth-Quarter Loss

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Michigan, outbid Ripplewood Holdings last year for Maytag, which reported a fourth-quarter loss of $75 million, or 93 cents a share. Maytag's loss widened from $14.1 million, or 18 cents a share, in the same quarter a year earlier.

Haier withdrew its preliminary bid of $16 a share for Newton, Iowa-based Maytag after Whirlpool bid $17. Whirlpool then raised its offer three times to $21 a share before Maytag's board agreed to the deal.

U.S. manufacturers have ``excess capacity" and would be able to increase production, the Justice Department said today. Large retailers that account for most appliance sales -- Sears, The Home Depot Inc., Lowe's Cos. Inc. and Best Buy Co. -- have alternative suppliers to help them ``resist an attempt by the merged entity to raise prices," the department said.

The agency also noted that Whirlpool and Maytag ``substantiated large cost savings and other efficiencies that should benefit consumers."

Small Doesn't Mean Safe Under Antitrust Laws (LAW)

By John G. Calender and Phillip C. Zane, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 30, 2006

Enforcers don't focus their attention solely on multimillion-dollar companies

The big news in antitrust enforcement is always the international investigation that ends in a fine of tens or hundreds of millions of dollars, such as last year's agreement by Samsung to pay $300 million for fixing the price of DRAM chips or last week's agreement by Akzo Nobel to pay $32 million for fixing the price of hydrogen peroxide. Even when the Justice Department announces its statistics, the headline is the amount of money collected in fines. But if this gives comfort to small companies and their counsel, they should think again.

Although nonspecialists sometimes believe that the antitrust laws are aimed at limiting the power of big businesses, these laws, particularly the criminal provisions of the Sherman Act, are enforced against all manner of companies. Small businesses do get discovered, prosecuted and convicted.

Recent prosecutions of small companies have been as varied as the economy itself. The Justice Department has investigated roofing contractors in upstate New York for rigging bids. Electrical contractors, concrete suppliers and insulation manufacturers also have been prosecuted. Small computer firms have been targeted, as have small chemical companies. Moving and storage companies have been prosecuted for bid rigging. Scrap companies have been convicted of price fixing.

Under the Sherman Act the Justice Department will prosecute price fixing and bid rigging as crimes. Price fixing and bid rigging are usually responses to corporate pressures for profits and results, not acts of personal greed. As a result, price fixers rarely think of themselves as criminals. Small companies are no less vulnerable to this blind spot than large ones.

Individuals convicted of price fixing or bid rigging now face a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison for each count. The actual length of the sentence depends on a number of characteristics of the offender and the offense -- most important, the volume of commerce affected by the conspiracy. This does result in shorter sentences for convicted employees of small companies.

But it's not much help. Recent amendments to the federal sentencing guidelines have served to increase the lowest sentence available for price fixing (without a departure from the guidelines) to 10 months confinement, at least half of which must be served in prison. Bid rigging is treated more harshly; a person convicted of this offense must spend at least one year in prison.

Companies convicted of cartel activity face large fines calculated by looking at the volume of commerce affected by the price fixing. The base fine is 20 percent of the volume of commerce regardless of what the actual loss was. Even after adjustments for various factors, fines for antitrust offenses cannot be less than 15 percent of the volume of commerce. This may well be enough to bankrupt a small company, particularly if the company has few other products or services besides those whose prices were fixed, and especially if the price fixing lasted more than a year.

Lacking expertise in antitrust law, small companies may think that colluding to keep prices lower than would result from unrestrained competition is legal. No, it's not.

In recent years the Justice Department has prosecuted bidders who agreed to keep purchase prices at auction low so that they could make more money on resale in a number of real estate markets. Earlier this year the department prosecuted a similar scheme in the otter-pelt market.

When targets of an antitrust investigation lie to the grand jury or falsify or destroy documents, the Justice Department will prosecute for obstruction of justice -- even when no substantive antitrust offense is found. The department has launched such prosecutions against smaller businesses in a number of markets, including linen supply, feeder goldfish (fish sold to be fed to other fish) and computer products.

Even when the government is done with you, it's not necessarily all over. For every criminal antitrust offense, there is also a tort. Private parties may sue for treble damages suffered as a result of price fixing or bid rigging, as well as for attorney fees. And a criminal conviction is prima facie evidence of liability.

The lesson for small companies and their counsel is clear: Do not ignore the antitrust laws because you think they apply to someone bigger or more profitable. They apply to you too, and you ignore them at your peril.

Supreme Court Hears EBay Patent Case (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — EBay faced skeptical Supreme Court justices Wednesday as it argued that a company found liable for patent infringement should not necessarily be forced to stop using the patented idea.

Carter Phillips, an attorney representing eBay, argued that sometimes being forced to pay money damages is enough. If a judge issues an injunction while a company tries to design around the patents, that could stifle commercial innovation, Phillips said.

The dispute, coming just weeks after BlackBerry-maker Research In Motion settled a patent lawsuit, arises amid rapid changes and fierce competition in the tech world. EBay argues that the routine issuance of injunctions adds to the leverage of "patent trolls," entities that get patents on promising technology without intending to use them commercially. Instead, they seek settlements from companies that might infringe them.

The case traces not to eBay's popular online auction, but to a feature that allows customers to buy items for a fixed price. A jury found eBay liable for infringement of patents held by MercExchange, a Virginia company. The jury awarded damages: $35 million, later reduced by $5.5 million. The judge denied MercExchange's request for an injunction, saying it would not be irreparably harmed if eBay continued operating as it sought alternatives for its fixed-price marketplace. The judge noted that MercExchange had not put its patents into practice.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit reversed. It said once a jury has found infringement, the general rule is that an injunction is issued.

Phillips called that stance "extraordinarily stringent" and said trial judges should be able to decide on injunctions based on facts of individual cases. He said the appeals court rule could hinder tech advances and fuel companies that obtain patents for license fees rather than to make something.

MercExchange's attorney, Seth Waxman, objected to the notion that his client sought patents as a litigation strategy. "This is not a patent-troll case," he said. Waxman said the company's founder invented the technology. "He is no promiscuous licenser."

Waxman said the rule used by the appeals court is rooted in history. Only in "rare cases," he said, would the public be served by denying the injunction.

The justices who spoke up most appeared to find merit in the appeals court's ruling. Chief Justice John Roberts questioned why patent holders would have less protection because they did not make a product, as the trial judge suggested.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said if trial judges had more discretion on injunctions, a patchwork of policies would emerge. "You'd get a tremendous disparity among jurisdictions," she said.

EBay shares closed Wednesday at $39.32, up 1.2%.

High Court Considers EBay Case On Patent (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi And Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

The Supreme Court heard oral arguments yesterday in a crucial intellectual property case -- and the outcome could hinge on whether the justices think online auctioneer eBay Inc. is a larcenous corporate giant or the innocent victim of a greedy "patent troll."

At issue is the current rule in patent cases that patent holders who prove infringement get money damages and an injunction shutting down the businesses that violate their intellectual property rights. EBay, backed by tech firms such as America Online Inc. and Yahoo Inc., says the near-automatic injunction gives patent holders too much leverage, enabling patent holders who have no intention of using their inventions -- known as "patent trolls" -- to ambush companies with expensive lawsuits.

But MercExchange LLC, a Great Falls firm that says it created a process for selling goods at a fixed price online that eBay later infringed, argues that the real problem is the bullying of giants like eBay that refuse to pay patent holders for their intellectual property. Backed by the pharmaceutical industry, which has its own huge stake in patenting drugs that take years to develop, MercExchange argues that, without easy access to injunctions, small inventors would be helpless against the likes of eBay.

"This is not a patent troll case," MercExchange's lawyer, Seth P. Waxman, told the court. MercExchange came up with a legitimate invention that eBay offered to buy, he said, but when negotiations broke down, eBay "stole the technology." The invention is a method for allowing users to buy goods at a set price instead of bidding on them.

The case puts a spotlight on the nation's troubled patent system, which recent studies by the National Academy of Sciences and the Federal Trade Commission have described as plagued by questionable patents and costly litigation.

Research in Motion Ltd., the maker of BlackBerry wireless e-mail devices, recently settled a case brought by NTP Inc., a patent-holding company, for $612.5 million. RIM faced an injunction even though the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office had concluded that the patents were largely invalid.

Some patent experts said yesterday that eBay v. MercExchange , No. 05-130, is likely to spur action on Capitol Hill. A House bill introduced by Rep. Lamar S. Smith (R-Tex.) would essentially back software companies' interests by allowing permanent injunctions only in cases in which the patent holder could prove it would suffer irreparable harm without one. But the bill is on hold, stymied largely by opposition from the pharmaceutical industry.

"I think the biggest issue this is going to result in is a more urgent push for patent reform" among legislators, said Brian Ferguson, a patent attorney in Washington who did not represent either side in this case. "There is a concern that the patent office is overwhelmed and it isn't doing as good a job as it could" in reviewing existing technologies or issuing patents in new technology areas, he said.

The Bush administration, faced with a division within the business community, weighed in on MercExchange's side. But its cautious brief urged the court to address the specific issues in the case, instead of trying to address "general policy concerns respecting potential abuse of the patent system."

In 2003, eBay lost a jury trial to MercExchange. The jury awarded MercExchange $35 million, but the judge reduced the award by $5.5 million and denied MercExchange an injunction, saying the smaller company would not face "irreparable harm" without it.

The district judge reasoned that, among other things, MercExchange was not practicing the patents and was willing to license its technologies to other companies.

The judge also cited "growing concern over the issuance of business-method patents" as a reason that an injunction would not be in the public interest.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which has nationwide appellate jurisdiction over patent cases, reversed that ruling last year, saying MercExchange was entitled to an injunction because a "general concern" about business-method patents did not justify "the unusual step of denying injunctive relief."

It said MercExchange was entitled to an injunction to shut down eBay's "Buy It Now" feature. "Buy It Now" continues to operate, though, pending the case's final outcome. EBay also said there is no need for an injunction because it is planning to install a work-around that would allow the feature to function without infringing on the patents.

At the hearing yesterday, eBay's lawyer, Carter G. Phillips, argued that the appeals court's ruling is too inflexible to encompass the fast-changing world of software technologies. Those realities demand that district courts be allowed to consider the circumstances of each case before determining whether shutting down a business is necessary to address the property concerns of companies like MercExchange, Phillips argued.

"The time has come for this court to say, 'No, this is not what the Patent Act protects,' " Phillips said. District judges should be empowered to limit the relief to patent holders to cash alone, he argued.

But Waxman countered: "It is critical that this judgment be affirmed, because this is a real inventor. . . . Any suggestion of uncertainty to come out of this case would dramatically destabilize settled law . . . and the investment-backed expectations of inventors large and small."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. challenged Waxman, noting that since the lawsuit began, the Patent Office has rejected MercExchange's patent claims. Can the district court take that into account? Roberts asked.

Waxman said allowing parties to file for review after litigating cases in court would be an "open invitation" to manipulations of the patent process by infringers like eBay.

Justice Antonin Scalia seemed to agree with Waxman, asking questions that suggested he did not consider this case different from others regarding private property rights.

"We're talking about property rights; all he's asking for is, 'Give me my property back,' " Scalia said to Phillips. "Why isn't the free market adequate to deal with the problems you're talking about?"

A decision is expected by July.

High Court Hears EBay Patent Fight (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Several U.S. Supreme Court justices Wednesday appeared resistant to eBay Inc.'s call for broader leeway on whether federal courts issue an injunction in a patent-infringement case, although the justices also probed for how they might clarify injunction standards.

"You're talking about a property right here and a property right is the right to exclude," Justice Antonin Scalia said at oral arguments in eBay v. MercExchange. Justice Scalia wondered why the Supreme Court should rewrite patent laws. "Why can't we let the marketplace take care of the problem," he said.

Justice Scalia and several other justices indicated they were worried that watering down the role of injunctions in patent-infringement cases might harm inventor rights in the U.S. patent system. At the same time, some of the justices also probed for whether the Supreme Court should rule that federal trial judges - contrary to a recent lower court ruling by the Washington-based Federal Circuit Court of Appeals - have some discretion to withhold an injunction.

EBay went before the Supreme Court in its quest to avoid an injunction for infringing on patents held by MercExchange, a Great Falls, Va., patent holding company. The patents, among other things, deal with eBay's popular "Buy It Now" feature in online auctions.

The case is being watched closely by both Supreme Court and patent law experts and has been billed as one of the most significant patent appeals to reach the Supreme Court in recent years.

The justices who spoke at the oral arguments made it clear they don't take changes to the patent procedures lightly. "Are you devaluing the value of a particular patent by denying an injunction," Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. said. But Justice Roberts also worried about whether some patent holding companies may be abusing the patent system by leveraging questionable patents with the power of an injunction threat.

For example, Justice Roberts asked questions about the standards that should apply to inventors who do nothing but hold their patents and about situations where a patent covers a business process, such as the auction purchase feature at issue in the case, that may appear to be somewhat vague. He also asked what should happen if the U.S. Patent & Trademark Office reverses course and denies a patent when it is challenged in a dispute.

The core issue in the case is whether a federal judge should have handed down an immediate injunction barring eBay from infringing on patents held by MercExchange. The justices, reviewing almost 100 years of legal precedent, will decide whether the current standard for patent injunctions should be changed or, at a minimum, clarified.

"The Federal Circuit's rule is extraordinarily stringent," said Carter Phillips, a Washington attorney who represented eBay. Mr. Phillips urged the Supreme Court to give federal judges who handle patent disputes more discretion when deciding whether a company that has infringed on a patent deserves an injunction in addition to monetary damages.

Seth Waxman, a Washington attorney who represented MercExchange, said his client deserved injunction protection that patent law provides in infringement cases. "The jury found by clear and convincing evidence that eBay had infringed," Mr. Waxman said. He added that changing current injunction standards would upset settled patent law and harm inventor rights.

The U.S. government argued that the Supreme Court shouldn't change current legal precedent that leaves federal judges with limited discretion on injunctions. Jeffrey Minear, an assistant in the U.S. Solicitor General's office, said the Supreme Court should affirm the Federal Circuit's decision while providing new guidance for judges. He said injunctions are important in patent law because they "harness the market to determine what the market value of a patent is."

The fight has split the corporate world. Many technology companies, citing what they believe are legal shakedowns from patent holders that don't make any products, want the Supreme Court to ease precedent that calls for injunctions in many patent judgments. Biotechnology, pharmaceutical and other business segments that rely heavily on the development of single-product patents want strong injunction standards to remain in place.

EBay and several high-tech companies said in court filings that they already are being victimized by "patent trolls," small companies that sue larger firms over ideas they have never developed into products. Earlier this month, a $612 million settlement by Research in Motion Ltd., maker of the BlackBerry wireless e-mail service, occurred under threat of an injunction that could've barred use of technology that is essential to the popular device's operation.

"Under such circumstances, injunctions do not serve the goal of the patent system to promote innovation but turn that system on its head," lawyers for Time Warner Inc., Amazon.com Inc., Xerox Corp. and others wrote in a friend-of-the-court filing.

Pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies disagree. In court filings, their lawyers said developers of drugs or technology need protection not only for their ideas but also to recoup costs of their investments in developing new medicines.

MercExchange, founded by patent lawyer Thomas Woolston, sued eBay and its subsidiary Half.com Inc. in 2001, alleging infringement of patents dating to 1995, shortly before eBay's launch on the Web.

Mr. Woolston's idea was to use an electronic network of consignment stores that would ensure legitimacy of sales by taking possession of goods being offered. eBay's system was based on the belief that buyers and sellers could trust each other and deal directly.

A jury sided with MercExchange, finding that its business method patents had been infringed, and awarded the patent-holder $35 million. The judge later reduced the award by $5.5 million and refused to grant a permanent injunction, ruling that MercExchange would not suffer because it had not used its inventions commercially and had expressed an interest in licensing its patents to eBay. On appeal, the Washington-based Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, a special appeals court set up to handle patent cases, said an injunction is required.

UPDATE: EBay Arguments Run Into Skepticism At High Court (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones) - Ebay Inc.'s (EBAY) arguments that trial court judges should have discretion over when to grant injunctions in patent-infringement cases ran into tough questioning from several justices Wednesday at the U.S. Supreme Court.

The online auctioneer wants the high court to reverse an appeals court ruling that said a district-court judge erred in not issuing an injunction against eBay (EBAY)after a jury found the Internet giant violated patents held by MercExchange.

The case is part of an ongoing battle over U.S. patent law that pits high-tech companies like eBay (EBAY), who argued that such injunctions are granted too readily, against inventors, biotech firms and drug companies that rely heavily on patent law to protect their investments in intellectual property.

MercExchange, a small firm in Great Falls, Va., has sought an injunction to bar eBay (EBAY) (EBAY (EBAY)) from using its patented technology since winning a $25 million damage award in 2003.

An attorney for eBay (EBAY), Carter Phillips, argued at the high court that "monetary damages are a perfectly adequate remedy" for patent holders who've been infringed upon, and added that the judge in the case was "uniquely suited" to make a determination on whether an injunction was necessary.

But Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg countered that appellate courts have a role in standardizing such rulings, and Justice Antonin Scalia voiced skepticism about making significant changes to existing U.S. patent law.

"You're talking about a property right here," Scalia said, addressing the eBay (EBAY)lawyer. "Why isn't the free market adequate to resolve these problems?"

The lawsuit concerns patents related to eBay's (EBAY) "Buy it Now" feature, a service that lets buyers circumvent the auction process and buy a product immediately for a set price. That option accounts for one-third of the gross value of merchandise sold via eBay's (EBAY) Web site.

In the 2003 ruling, the U.S. District Court judge declined to issue an injunction, saying MercExchange had sufficient means to seek monetary damages for past and future infringement.

The Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which hears most patent case appeals, later overruled the district judge, saying a permanent injunction should be granted in most cases barring extraordinary circumstances.

"Injunctions historically are issued in all but the most rare cases," MercExchange attorney Seth Waxman argued in court Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0024152

In its suit, eBay (EBAY) asked the Supreme Court to reject the circuit court ruling and to allow the district judge's decision to stand.

MercExchange countered that the Supreme Court's intervention on eBay's (EBAY) behalf would dramatically undermine a century of settle law and cause massive confusion in the business world.

The federal government backed MercExchange in the case. The lawyer representing the U.S. Justice Department, Jeffrey Minear, said injunctions " force negotiations between the parties" and help figure out the market value of the invention that has been infringed.

Justice Anthony Kennedy appeared to agree, stating that injunctions often prove to be the quickest way to settle patent lawsuits.

Although several justices, including Chief Justice John Roberts, showed some sympathy for the idea that injunctions could be an unduly harsh remedy, none indicated an eagerness to change the existing law that allows judges discretion in such cases.

A decision in the case, eBay Inc. (EBAY) v. MercExchange, is expected by early summer.

Justices Seem Divided Over EBay Patent Injunction Case (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 30, 2006

Two veterans of the Supreme Court bar argued forcefully -- and inconclusively -- Wednesday in a high-stakes dispute over how easy it should be for a patent holder to win an injunction against an infringer.

From the tenor of the questioning in eBay v. MercExchange, justices seemed closely divided over the issue, alternately sympathetic toward Sidley Austin's Carter Phillips, arguing his 49th case at the Court, and then toward his adversary, WilmerHale's Seth Waxman, appearing before the high court for the 47th time.

The case has drawn wide interest, with businesses lining up on both sides. Some companies, including Intel, are siding with eBay, expressing concern that the holder of a single patent that covers one of thousands of processes inside a product could bring down that product too easily by obtaining a paralyzing injunction. The recent patent dispute that almost crippled BlackBerry service is cited as a prime example.

Phillips represented eBay, arguing that injunctions should not be granted automatically and that instead, judges should have broad discretion to balance equities and to decide, in some cases, that money damages are a "perfectly adequate" way to penalize infringers. Permanent injunctions, he said, represent a "sword of Damocles" over companies that can be wielded by small patent holders or "trolls" who do not even make direct use of the patent.

Waxman represented MercExchange, a small Virginia firm that sought an injunction against eBay. Both Court precedent and the will of Congress, he said, dictate that "a final judgment of infringement yields an injunction in all but the rarest of cases." He portrayed his client as a hardworking inventor, not a "patent troll" or a "promiscuous licenser" aiming to profit from his patent merely through litigation.

The dispute began in 2001, when MercExchange sued eBay for infringing its patent that enabled the "Buy it Now" feature used on the popular online auction site. A jury in the Eastern District of Virginia awarded MercExchange $35 million for infringement, and the company promptly moved for a permanent injunction to prevent future infringement by eBay.

Under a 1908 precedent, Continental Paper Bag Co. v. Eastern Paper Bag Co., there is a legal presumption in favor of an injunction against the infringer. But the judge denied MercExchange's motion, finding that the company, which licenses but does not practice its patents, would not suffer irreparable harm without an injunction. The judge also ruled that "growing concern" over business-method patents like those at issue cut against MercExchange's arguments.

But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit rejected the District Court's reasoning and said that nothing in the case justified deviating from the rule in favor of an injunction.

Supporters of eBay argue that so-called trolls that hold or license relatively insignificant patents can hold a high-tech company hostage by threatening to seek an injunction and winning disproportionately high licensing fees in exchange.

But other companies, joined by the Bush administration, argue that the precedent should be upheld to give needed protection to valid patents. Assistant to the Solicitor General Jeffrey Minear told the justices Wednesday that infringement by itself "normally is irreparable harm" and, therefore, should trigger an injunction against the infringer.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. seemed sympathetic at one point toward the "garage inventor" who might need the weapon of an injunction to keep a big company from erasing his livelihood. But then he also voiced concern that an injunction could sweep too broadly, especially if it was aimed at protecting a hard-to-define business-process patent. Justice John Paul Stevens also seemed concerned about the breadth of injunctions against patent holders.

Justice Antonin Scalia appeared sympathetic toward MercExchange, suggesting it would be unusual for the government not to order an infringer to, in effect, give back the patent holder's property.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, apparently perplexed by the terminology, asked Phillips whether the word "troll" in the patent context is "the scary thing under the bridge, or is it the fishing technique?" Amid laughter, Phillips indicated it was the former.

One problem on the horizon for the case before the Court, noted several times by Roberts, is the fact that on review, the Patent and Trademark Office has invalidated all of MercExchange's patents involved in the case.

Waxman said that determination was not final and should not prevent the Court from ruling in the case.

Inventors Have Rights, Too! (WSJ)

By Nathan Myhrvold

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Why is the tech industry out to squash the rights of inventors? Aren't tech companies pro-invention? That paradox played out yesterday as the Supreme Court heard a patent case between eBay and MercExchange. Ebay has been found guilty of willfully infringing a patent, and concedes as much (since that topic is not on appeal). The question the court will consider, then, is more abstract: Does an inventor also need to create and sell a product to enjoy the full rights of the patent system? If he does not, Ebay, supported by a set of large tech companies, wants to overturn 200 years of precedent by weakening or eliminating the right to injunction. Meanwhile, a collection of other innovative companies, universities and inventors disagree, and support MercExchange. So how did we reach this strange situation?

The roots of this case lie in differing corporate cultures and attitudes about the patent system. In some industries, like pharmaceuticals or biotech, patents are crucial to the business model, so they support and respect patent rights. Tech companies, on the other hand, win by muscling their way to sufficient market share to become a de facto standard (some would say monopoly). Because patents don't figure in this business model, tech companies don't hold the patent system in high regard. Patents are simply not a priority for many tech companies. Ebay, for example, has only 11 issued patents.

Other large tech companies do amass significant portfolios, but often not directly related to their business model. If a rival company asserts a patent, a company like this plays defense and threaten the asserter's products right back. While "defense" sounds benign, what it can mean in practice is having enough patents that you can steal from anybody else with impunity. Between big companies this works like a powerful shield, much like the doctrine of mutually assured destruction with nukes. But the shield is impotent against universities, companies without products or independent inventors. Owners of large defensive portfolios hate that.

In the 14 years I served as Microsoft's first chief technology officer, I saw this firsthand across the ranks of the computer industry. Tech companies work extremely hard to use state-of-the-art technology, and either be first to market or a fast follower -- all else falls by the wayside. Big tech companies are happy to hire the best people from rivals, universities and small companies. Their employees attend conferences and study technical papers to stay on the cutting edge. But they pretend that the patents on the technology in those papers, or from universities or small companies, don't exist. Many of the largest tech companies have a standing policy that engineers are not allowed to read patents or check whether their work infringes. Why bother to look, if you know you'll find lots of infringement? Besides the cost, it's a distraction that might hurt time to market. Their strategy is simple -- damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead.

The trouble is, this cavalier attitude toward the law runs afoul of the rights of legitimate patent holders and the big tech companies know this. Rather than pay out a small fraction of their huge profits, they're fighting a campaign to weaken patent laws for the little guy. Some of this has taken place in Congress under the banner of "patent reform." The eBay case aims to achieve the same ends in the courts.

It's hard to go to Congress or the courts and admit that you're one of the richest companies in the world, have huge profit margins and infringe lots of valid patents held by honorable people . . . but you don't want to pay them. So naturally, these companies paint a different picture. They claim that patents are low quality; yet there is no objective evidence of this. They claim patent litigation is exploding; but the actual figures show just the opposite. There are fewer patent lawsuits than copyright, trademark or other major forms of commercial litigation.

Perhaps the biggest myth is the danger "patent trolls" -- people who supposedly manipulate the patent system in a shady way. It does happen, but apart from some anecdotes, no evidence has been offered that patent trolls are a major problem. Court records show that only 2% of all patent lawsuits are due to plaintiffs that have no ongoing product business. Of that 2%, the vast majority are perfectly legitimate companies or universities. A tiny minority of patent suits are due to bad actors, but it's hardly a crisis. While I was at Microsoft, we encountered a couple of patent manipulators, but frankly we won those cases; at worst they were a nuisance.

RIM, the company behind the BlackBerry, recently paid $612 million to a company called NTP to settle a patent lawsuit. People love their BlackBerries, so it's tempting to see NTP as a villainous troll, but RIM wears the black hat in this story. It could have settled for a reasonable rate (several of its competitors did). Instead it bet the farm in court and proceeded to lose big. The judge ruled that "this was not a close case" and, further, that RIM's litigation tactics were "egregious" and "fraudulent." When a judge says things like that, most people would settle. Instead, RIM gambled on a series of ever more desperate legal maneuvers and enormously raised the stakes through brinksmanship. Hubris caused its loss, not the patent system.

The telling point in the troll debate comes if you look where tech companies pay big money for patents. It's not trolls, but rather small and completely legitimate patent holders -- the same ones that would be hurt by the "reform" proposals or the eBay case. As one observer puts it, Goliath is crying "Unfair! Take David's sling away!" Without full rights there is no way for a small inventor to get a big infringer to the table to settle. Instead, they'll stall and drown the little guy with legal fees. The courts would be put in the middle and have to decide all future licensing revenue. Is that the way we want to run an innovative economy?

The patent system exists to give economic incentive to create inventions -- not products. After all, profit is the incentive to create and sell products. In order to have a level playing field, inventors must have a full set of rights, regardless of whether they are big or little, or whether they make products or just invent. Those rights are what give them the incentive to work long and hard on new ideas that may not work. A lot of big innovative companies agree with this -- companies like DuPont, GE, Qualcomm and 3M, as well as the pharmaceutical and biotech industry, have filed amicus briefs in support of MercExchange and equal rights for all inventors.

Weakening patent laws, whether in the Supreme Court or Congress, is no more than a government bailout of the infringement problems big tech companies deliberately made for themselves. America needs to have future generations of inventions and technology. We can't mortgage our future by taking away the rights and incentive of our inventors.

Mr. Myhrvold, Microsoft's first chief technological officer, is currently CEO of Intellectual Ventures and holds 18 patents with more than 100 pending. He filed an amicus brief with the Supreme Court in support of MercExchange.

Fuel Standards Set For Auto Makers (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration will require auto makers to build more fuel-efficient sport-utility vehicles, minivans and pickup trucks, but standards finalized yesterday are no stricter than proposed last year despite rising gasoline prices.

The rules issued by federal highway officials are mostly a victory for auto makers, since environmentalists had argued that the rules should be increased even more, given government formulas for fuel-efficiency that take rising gas prices into account. Still, the rules will subject SUVs and vans that weigh more than 8,500 pounds to the standards for the first time, making it harder for manufacturers, particularly General Motors Corp., to reach the new targets.

Overall, the changes are the most sweeping since the program -- known as corporate average fuel economy, or CAFE -- was created in 1975 in the wake of the oil embargo that left Americans jittery about their dependence on foreign crude. In 2001, President Bush moved to overhaul the rules for light trucks, a category that includes SUVs, minvans and pickups and represents more than half of all new vehicles sold. Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta said the standards are the toughest in the program's history, and officials estimated the new rules will save 10.7 billion gallons of fuel.

Many auto makers will benefit from a change in how overall compliance is measured. The existing system requires them to meet a fleetwide average, which punishes GM and Ford Motor Co., in particular, for producing many large, low-mileage trucks. Under the new system, the mileage standard will be set based on the size -- though not the weight -- of the vehicle. The smallest vehicles will be required to get the best mileage, with the standards falling as trucks get bigger.

The Bush administration also said the new system would be a safety improvement because it removes incentives to build smaller trucks that are less able to withstand a crash. The new system, optional beginning in 2008, will be mandatory in 2011.

For model-year 2007, the standard was already set to rise to 22.2 miles per gallon for a manufacturer's entire light-truck fleet from 20.7 mpg in 2004. Under the regulation issued yesterday, the target will rise slowly to an estimated 24 mpg in 2011. Precise mileage targets will vary depending on the mix of trucks sold by each manufacturer.

The standards are nearly identical to those proposed last year. Since then, though, the official government estimate of future gasoline prices has risen. In its earlier analysis, it put gasoline prices at $1.51 to $1.58 a gallon over the lives of the affected vehicles; it currently puts prices at $1.96 to $2.39 in constant dollars. Given that alone, the cost-benefit calculation required by law would justify increased fuel-economy targets.

However, the administration made countervailing changes to the formula. For instance, it revised estimates as to how quickly auto makers will be able to adopt new technology. In addition, by subjecting the largest SUVs and vans to the rules, the final regulation increases the cost of compliance to manufacturers and therefore helps counter the higher gas prices. Pickup trucks would still be exempt.

The new rules now include GM's Hummer H2, which weighs just enough to escape the current regulation. The administration estimates that this provision will affect some 240,000 SUVs and vans. GM makes the great majority of them, though some of Ford's E-Series vans will be newly subject to the standards as well. (See related article2.)

In addition, the new rules will close a loophole in 2012 that let companies count as light trucks high-mileage vehicles that are really cars, such as DaimlerChrysler AG's PT Cruiser and GM's Chevrolet HHR.

Auto makers said the new regulation will still be challenging. "This means seven straight years of increases in fuel-economy standards," said Eron Shosteck, a spokesman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers. "Auto makers view it as a challenge, but they are committed to meeting the new standards."

But the rules prompted environmentalists to question President Bush's commitment to reducing the nation's dependence on foreign oil. "Gas prices went up, we had two hurricanes and the president admitted we were addicted to oil, and yet we couldn't get anything more out of them?" said David Friedman of the Union of Concerned Scientists. "To me, it defies logic." Others question the program's effectiveness, saying that when vehicles become more fuel-efficient, people simply drive more.

Auto makers and environmental groups submitted hundreds of pages of comments after the proposed regulation was published. In its analysis, the administration acknowledged that Ford and GM have had a difficult stretch, cutting jobs and losing market share.

To some extent, the market has already drifted away from the most-gas-thirsty vehicles. Sales of traditional large and large luxury SUVs, those built on heavy-pickup-truck frames such as the Ford Expedition and Chevrolet Tahoe, slid to 830,000 in 2005 from nearly one million vehicles in 2002.

U.S. Raises Standards On Mileage (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

BALTIMORE, March 29 — The Transportation Department announced new fuel economy standards Wednesday for sport utility vehicles, pickup trucks and minivans that will make some of them go farther on a gallon of gasoline than the average car does, and will apply to many of the biggest S.U.V.'s for the first time.

But the overall fuel savings, 8.1 percent when the rule is fully phased in, were characterized as too modest by many conservation advocates, who also noted that the biggest pick-up trucks will still be unregulated. Remarks by auto manufacturers were restrained.

The transportation secretary, Norman Y. Mineta, speaking on the fifth-floor walkway at a football stadium, said that the cost of the new rule would be justified by the fuel saved, but that more than economics was involved.

"Saving fuel is as important to our national security and economic viability as it is to preserving our environment," he said, a tangle of highways in the background.

The final rule that Mr. Mineta announced on Wednesday was slightly tougher than the one his department proposed last summer. He said this was partly because of the president's commitment in the State of the Union address in January to reduce the nation's "addiction" to imported oil. But oil consumption would continue to rise under the new rule, he acknowledged.

The rule covers "light trucks" in the model years from 2008 to 2011. The current rules cover vehicles weighing up to 8,500 pounds. But the new one will cover S.U.V.'s that weigh up to 10,000 pounds. That includes the heavier variants of the Chevy Suburban and the Hummer H2. (The H1 is over 10,000 pounds and still exempt.)

The rule does not cover heavy pickup trucks, like the Ford F-250, on the theory that those are used mostly in agriculture or business. While many of the vehicles covered under the new rule are used primarily for personal transportation, often with a single person inside, Mr. Mineta said that the people of Baltimore and the rest of the nation understood how important light trucks were "to maintaining our way of life."

The rule will save 10.7 billion gallons of fuel over the lifetime of the vehicles in those model years, the department estimated. Currently, the United States uses that much gasoline in less than a month.

Transportation officials estimated that the rule would cost vehicle manufacturers about $6.7 billion, a big number even by the standards of federal rule-making, and would add about $200 to the cost of the average vehicle. But owners would save that much within four years, officials said, based on a fuel price of $2 a gallon at the beginning of the period, rising to $2.39 over the vehicle's lifetime. In fact, average gasoline prices are already slightly above the second figure.

The standard is 21.6 miles a gallon for the current model year; it would rise to about 24 miles a gallon in 2011, the last year of the rule, but it would be calculated differently. The new rule sets a fuel economy standard based on the vehicle's "footprint," or how far apart the wheels are. Actual fuel economy will depend on the mix of vehicles sold.

The smallest S.U.V.'s, like the Suzuki Grand Vitara and the Jeep Wrangler, would have to meet a standard of 28.6 miles per gallon. The car standard is 27.5 miles per gallon.

Changing the rules to take into account the size of each vehicle has another effect: it puts pressure on all the companies that sell vehicles in the category, and not just those that sell the biggest, thirstiest vehicles.

Stephen R. Kratzke, the associate administrator for rule-making at the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, said that the current standard was irrelevant to companies that built only small S.U.V.'s and pickups, because their fleet average was within acceptable limits even if their vehicles were not particularly fuel efficient for their size.

American manufacturers had complained that the current system burdened them but made no difference to Asian makers that sold few or no vehicles at the top end of the range.

Mr. Kratzke said that manufacturers would more widely deploy technologies that are already in limited use. Those include six-speed automatic transmissions, power steering systems that run on electricity instead of a belt that draws power from the engine, hybrid-electric drive trains and superchargers. Aluminum might be more widely used as an alternative to steel, but composite materials are still too costly, he said.

At the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, which represents all the major manufacturers but Honda, Eron Shosteck, a spokesman, said, "It is going to be a challenge for automakers, but automakers are committed to meeting it."

Sherrie Childers Arb, a spokeswoman at General Motors, said that when her company analyzed the rule as proposed last year, engineers found it "challenging but achievable." This one will be tougher, but the company has not finished analyzing it, she said.

Others were more critical. Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert, a New York Republican who is the chairman of the House Science Committee, said the Bush administration had missed an opportunity. "It's remarkable to me how long we keep making the same mistake over and over," he said. "Nothing is preventing us from making our nation more prosperous and more secure except political failure of will."

At Environmental Defense, a nonprofit advocacy group, Eric Haxthausen, an economist and expert on cars, said the expansion from 8,500 to 10,000 pounds in vehicle weight should have covered pickups, which make up 80 percent of the category, and the whole standard should have been more aggressive.

"We have to credit them with some modest steps forward," he said. "But given the urgency of the global warming issue and oil dependency issue, this is not the bold step that is called for."

But Ron DeFore, a spokesman for a group run by industry lobbyists called the S.U.V. Owners of America, said, "With the manufacturers, even tenths of a mile per gallon are hard to eke out." He said 20 million Americans have "something that's towable," from a trailer to a boat, and need powerful engines. And, he added, "in an era when we're at $2.50 a gallon plus, the real question is why you need a rule like this anyway." Economic self-interest will make people buy higher-mileage vehicles, he said.

Automakers Use New Technology To Beef Up Muscle, Not Mileage (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

John Elsden relishes the excitement of the mint-condition '65 Mustang convertible he takes out of his garage in eastern Virginia only on sunny days. The sporty coupe with a 289-cubic-inch engine growls, rumbles, vibrates and shakes when he puts his foot on the gas pedal.

But the Mustang, Mr. Elsden said, is not as zippy as his daughter's year-old sports wagon, a Nissan Murano, and accelerates hardly better than his wife's 2001 Jeep Grand Cherokee. Mr. Elsden, a car buff who has owned a variety of muscle cars, said the average sedan today accelerated faster than many cars designed to turn heads in the old days.

For two decades automakers have been developing technology that could make vehicles go farther on a gallon of gasoline. But instead, they have chosen pep and size — making vehicles like the new Murano accelerate faster than cars like the old Mustang, and making them bigger.

The average vehicle, which 25 years ago accelerated to 60 miles an hour in 14.4 seconds, now does it in 9.9 seconds, a pace once typical only of sporty or luxury cars like Camaros and Jaguars. And vehicle weight now averages about 4,100 pounds, up from about 3,200 in the early 1980's, as many buyers switched to larger, roomier cars or to sport utility vehicles and minivans, and as automakers added safety equipment.

Buyers like the extra zoom and room, but these have come at a cost: average fuel economy has fallen slightly over the last two decades. The government's new standards for light trucks like S.U.V.'s, published yesterday, will require an 8.1 percent increase in miles per gallon over the four model years from 2008 through 2011. [Page C1.]

But over the longer term, significant improvement appears to be lagging. As scientists and engineers look for ways to satisfy the fast-growing demand for energy and to slow climate change, many of them say that fundamental changes are needed in the way fuel is produced and consumed.

They say that ways must be found to replace oil and gas, and to get more energy from coal, which will become increasingly important as an energy source, without adding to carbon dioxide emissions.

And they say that greater fuel efficiency is imperative as the number of motor vehicles, which the Worldwatch Institute says has nearly doubled worldwide in the last two decades, could double again in 15 years. The United States has the highest per capita gasoline consumption of any major country.

Higher mileage would also significantly reduce emissions of global-warming gases that come from burning gasoline. The increase in vehicle acceleration and weight alone has raised emissions of carbon dioxide in the United States by about 5 percent.

If 2005 model vehicles, with their better technology, had the performance and size of those in 1987, they would use only 80 percent of the gasoline they do today, according to the Environmental Protection Agency. That alone would get the country nearly halfway to the goal President Bush set in his State of the Union address: to cut American oil consumption enough to nearly eliminate the need to import from the Middle East.

But because Americans have not insisted on better fuel economy, "we can take the technology in the cars and turn the knob toward performance," said Karl H. Hellman, an automotive development expert who retired from the E.P.A. two years ago.

Improving mileage now would be easy if drivers sacrificed some zip in new cars, he said, "but in this country, we don't sacrifice for anything."

Just as significant as vehicle weight is how much faster autos accelerate, even as more driving is done on congested roads. The E.P.A. does not calculate how much of the poorer fuel economy results from acceleration and how much is attributable to weight, but it publishes figures suggesting that the split is about even.

The 2005 Toyota Camry, one of the most popular sedans, accelerates more quickly than some 1975 Pontiac Firebirds. The Chevrolet TrailBlazer, an S.U.V., can reach 60 miles an hour in 8.2 seconds — about half the time of its 1985 ancestor. The 2006 Cadillac STS-V, which can reach 60 m.p.h. in less than five seconds, is one of many cars that now have more than enough horsepower to pull an 18-wheeler.

Philip H. Kosak of High Point, N.C., owns a 1965 Mustang, a 2005 Mustang, a Chevrolet TrailBlazer S.U.V. and an extended-cab Silverado pickup. The whole country, himself included, is spoiled, he said.

He has thought about buying something smaller and more fuel-efficient, especially with gasoline prices often running near $3 a gallon, but he has driven a pickup for years. "Once you've graduated to that, it's tough to go back. It's like moving back into a smaller home."

Mr. Kosak, who owns a company that produces snack food, said he drove 30,000 miles a year. He could save hundreds of gallons of gas a year with something smaller, he said, but even at today's fuel prices he can afford the extra expense and does not want to give up the fun of something that performs well. Mr. Kosak, who is 50, says he is looking forward to a lot of driving just for enjoyment.

But nearly a hundred million households burning an extra few hundred gallons a year add significantly to pollution and a greater reliance on imported oil. That contributes to a larger trade deficit and, at times, the use of American power to protect foreign supplies.

Representative Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, who has pushed for years for higher fuel economy standards, said, "We can talk all we want about our addiction to oil, but words have to be followed with deeds."

"It wouldn't be a sacrifice at all. No one really needs that greater power, except specialized vehicles for law enforcement purposes."

The carmakers say they give customers what they want. "Performance and safety, those factors are salable into the marketplace," said Gerald M. Roussel, manager for energy and environment at the Ford Motor Company's government relations office. And they have done so while reducing emissions of pollutants that cause smog and acid rain, he and others pointed out.

In improving fuel economy, virtually everyone agrees that there is a way only if there is a will. "There is no shortage of technology," said John M. DeCicco, a senior analyst at Environmental Defense, a nonprofit advocacy group.

Technologies already in use include four valves for each cylinder, which allows more power from a smaller, lighter engine, and computer-controlled fuel injection, which increases efficiency and cuts pollution.

More changes are coming. For example, gas-electric hybrids are increasingly common, but have been used in some cases more to make the vehicle accelerate faster than to go farther on a gallon of gasoline.

Indeed, Mark P. Mills, a physicist and energy expert, said that improvements in vehicle efficiency would not reduce consumption because without a significant rise in gasoline prices to encourage buyers to save fuel, most people would simply take advantage of the advances to demand bigger, faster vehicles.

Mr. DeCicco agreed. "What we're really talking about here is the need to, through a combination of public policy and awareness, use the technologies at hand with a different set of priorities in mind," he said. "Until we do that, all the invention in the world isn't going to make a difference."

Light Trucks' Mileage Rules Toughen (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

The federal government set gas-mileage goals for the largest sport-utility vehicles for the first time yesterday and said minivans, pickup trucks and SUVs as a group must increase their fuel efficiency by 11 percent over the next five years.

Big, gas-guzzling SUVs are hit the hardest under the rule. The three-ton Hummer H2, for instance, which gets an average of 13.8 miles per gallon, will have to achieve 22 mpg by 2011. The Ford Explorer SUV will have to increase its fuel efficiency from 17.7 mpg to 25.2 mpg, while a Dodge Caravan will need to inch up from 22.7 mpg to 23.5 mpg.

"No SUV gets a pass," said Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta in announcing the changes. The new standards represent the most ambitious fuel economy goals for light trucks -- SUVs, minivans and pickups -- ever developed in the program's 27-year history, he said.

Nevertheless, environmental groups derided yesterday's announcement, saying the rules are too modest for an administration that has called on the nation to kick its oil addiction.

Mineta's announcement comes as gasoline prices are nearing their six-month high, with a gallon of regular averaging $2.50 per gallon, or 35 cents more than it cost a year ago, according to the U.S. Department of Energy. At the same time, General Motors Corp. is staking its turnaround in profit this year on a new batch of large SUVs.

Mineta said the new rule is being phased in over the next five years to lessen the impact on the "fragile" U.S. auto industry, hit by declining market share and huge financial losses.

The new National Highway Traffic Safety Administration standards aim to raise the fuel economy of the light-truck category to 24 mpg by 2011 on an industry-wide scale, up from 21.6 mpg on 2006 models. The new standards do not apply to passenger cars.

The rule could force automakers to spend $6.7 billion to update light trucks with fuel-saving technology needed to meet the new regulations, Mineta said. He added that the rule will save 10.7 billion gallons of gasoline over the next five years and help the overall economy, outweighing the expense to automakers. Additionally, the system closes a loophole that excluded the largest and least-efficient SUVs in the industry from the fuel-economy rules.

The Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, the industry's primary lobbying group, said meeting the standards of the new rule will be a "challenge" for automakers.

Environmental groups continue to seek tougher standards.

"The biggest single step that the president could take to cut our oil addiction, curb global warming and save consumers money at the gas pump is raising [fuel economy] standards substantially, and that's not what they're doing," said Dan Becker, director of the global warming program at the Sierra Club. "They are tinkering around the edges rather than using the most powerful tool they've got."

Becker and other environmentalists also complained that NHTSA retained a fuel-economy exemption for the industry's largest pickup trucks. Vehicles such as the Ford F250 and F350 pickups are excluded from the fuel standards.

GM and Ford Motor Co. depend heavily on profit from large SUVs. Demand for the vehicles collapsed last year as rising gas prices roiled the U.S. market for new cars and trucks. The resulting slide in profits has led to a major restructuring in the industry. GM and Ford have announced turnaround plans that include cutting billions of dollars in costs and eliminating as many as 60,000 jobs over the next few years. Executives at both companies have said developing more vehicles with greater fuel economy is essential to fixing the companies' financial problems.

Chris Preuss, a GM spokesman in Washington, said the run-up in gas prices is already shifting consumer demand toward more fuel-efficient models. "As fuel economy becomes more of a part of the purchase equation to consumers, it proves to be easier to deal with at the manufacturing level," he said.

Mineta said the 2011 deadline for the more fuel-efficient SUVs gives automakers enough time to act. The rules affecting minivans, pickup trucks and smaller SUVs will be phased in starting next year.

Hybrid cars, such as the Toyota Prius and the Honda Insight -- the vehicles that get the highest mileage -- typically get about 55 mpg, according to the federal government. However, consumers have complained of getting lower numbers.

Mineta said NHTSA is studying ways to improve the fuel economy of passenger cars. The average mileage requirement for all cars has been stalled at 27.5 mpg since the 1975 Energy Policy Conservation Act was signed by President Gerald Ford. The law set initial fuel economy standards after the OPEC oil embargo.

Higher Mpg Required Of SUVs (BSUN)

By Michael Dresser

The Baltimore Sun, March 30, 2006

The U.S. Transportation Department made some of the most far-reaching changes to its fuel economy standards in the 27-year history of the program Wednesday -- adopting rules that will raise mileage requirements for minivans, SUVs and some pickup trucks.

But environmental groups expressed disappointment at the regulations, contending the Bush administration had missed an opportunity to make meaningful strides toward cleaning the air and meeting the president's stated goal of breaking a national "addiction" to imported oil.

The new rules, which will apply to 2008-to-2011 vehicles, raise the average mileage requirements for the vehicles from the current 21.6 miles per gallon to 24.1 mpg by 2011 in annual steps. They should save an estimated 10.7 billion gallons of fuel over the lifetime of those vehicles.

It marks the second time the Bush administration has increased the mileage targets for the group of vehicles, some of which had been exempt from the fuel efficiency rules.

The administration previously raised the target from 20.7 mpg -- where it had been frozen by Congress for almost a decade -- to 22.2 mpg for 2207.

In unveiling the new requirements Wednesday at the Baltimore Ravens' stadium, Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta called them "significant improvements" in standards for the vehicles.

While they are collectively known as "light trucks," the category includes minivans and SUVs.

Transportation officials selected an upper level of the Camden Yards football stadium that provided a panoramic view of various modes of transportation -- including light rail, freight trains and a spaghetti bowl of highway interchanges.

Billing the changes as the first "complete reform" of fuel economy requirements for light trucks since standards were introduced in 1979, Mineta said they "close loopholes that have long plagued the current system."

"We are pushing the envelope," he said.

Last August, the administration first proposed higher standards but did not include the heaviest vehicles -- those between 8,500 and 10,000 pounds. The revised rules include about 240,000 SUVs -- including such behemoths as the Hummer H2, Chevrolet Suburban and Ford Expedition -- that fall into that weight category.

"We decided we could ask more of the manufacturers than we did last August," said Mineta.

While the administration decided to extend the fuel economy rules to the heavier SUVs, it continued to exclude a larger number of pickup trucks in the same weight category. Officials said such vehicles are mostly used for commercial purposes -- an assertion questioned by environmentalists.

The rule changes do not apply to passenger cars, which now must meet a standard of 27.5 mpg.

Mineta said the administration tried to be mindful of the economic impact of the rules. Domestic automakers, especially Ford and General Motors, have posted heavy losses in recent quarters and have been taking steps to severely cut back their work forces.

"The automobile industry is in a very fragile state right now," he said.

Jennifer Moore, public affairs manager for Ford Motor Co., expressed general satisfaction with the latest changes to the Corporate Average Fuel Economy (CAFE) program:

"The new CAFE standards will pose significant challenges, but at Ford, we're confident that our drive toward innovation will result in fuel economy gains."

Sherrie Childers Arb, director for communications on the environment and energy for General Motors Corp., described the rules as "slightly more stringent" than last year's proposals. She noted that the company had called those proposed standards "challenging" but "achievable."

Environmental groups were unimpressed with the final standards, saying they fall far short of their expectations. They said the rules are only marginally stricter than those proposed last year, which would have set the standard at 24 mpg.

"Why such a modest change?" was the reaction of Eric Haxthausen, an economist with Environmental Defense in Washington. He said his organization had hoped to see a standard closer to 26 miles per gallon.

"This is less than a week's worth of gasoline," he said.

Roland Wong, a spokesman for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said the standards don't come close to the action needed to deliver on President Bush's promise in his State of the Union address to reduce U.S. dependence of foreign oil suppliers.

"We think this administration proposal is a baby step when bold action is required," he said. "Bold rhetoric is not being matched by bold action."

In Congress, environmental advocates also expressed dismay. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, a New York Republican and chairman of the House Science Committee, de scribed the changes as "a missed opportunity." He said the new CAFE targets could have been set much higher "in a safe and cost- effective manner."

"The president rightly pointed out in his State of the Union address that when it comes to oil, we are a nation of addicts," Boehlert said.

"And we're behaving exactly as an addict would behave -- not admitting our problem, not taking even the simplest steps to address our problem, not acting in our own best interests."

Lon Anderson, government affairs director for AAA Mid-Atlantic, called the new standards "a small step in the right direction" but said the administration had missed a good opportunity to include large pickup trucks.

"Especially right now, with gas prices stuck in the stratosphere, I think it's for sure that consumers will be much more interested in fuel economy when making purchasing decisions than they were in the past," he said.

Haxthausen also questioned the decision to exclude large pickup trucks, pointing to a 2005 survey commissioned by his group showing that two-thirds of the use of such vehicles was for personal travel.

Glassman said transportation department officials were relying on information about the truck use from the Environmental Protection Agency and had not done their own studies.

Glassman put the cost of the change to the industry at $6.7 billion. But she estimated that consumers could recoup the extra passed-on costs with fuel savings over a four-year period.

Big SUVs To Face New Fuel-economy Rules (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, March 30, 2006

The nation's largest SUVs and vans will have to meet government fuel-economy rules for the first time under a new rule announced Wednesday.

If the new National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) rules were in effect now, it would cover a quarter million SUVs — including the Hummer H2 — that had never been covered by fuel-economy rules.

All other SUVs, pickups and minivans will be required to get improved mileage — some even better than the 27.5 mpg required for 2006 cars. The new average fuel economy for these trucks will be 24 miles per gallon — up from the current 21.6 mpg. The new rules will take effect in 2011.

The Hummer H2, which currently doesn't have to meet fuel-economy standards, would have to get 22.3 mpg in 2011, up from the 10 mpg it now gets.

General Motors spokeswoman Sherrie Childers Arb says GM should still be able to sell the H2 even if it can't achieve the new fuel-economy numbers. The NHTSA rules allow a company's more fuel-efficient vehicles to offset those that use more fuel.

Ford spokesman Ed Lewis said the rules “pose significant challenges” but said the company's hybrid and car-based SUVs should help it improve its trucks' mpg.

Ron DeFore, a spokesman for the Sport Utility Vehicle Owners of America, a non-profit consumer group, questioned whether the rules were needed given high gas prices. He says he fears the standards will lead to higher vehicle prices, reduced performance and fewer options such as V-8 engines and four-wheel drive.

The Transportation Department says the rules will save nearly 11 billion gallons of fuel — including 2 billion from the largest SUVs alone. But environmentalists say they don't go far enough.

“Fighting America's oil addiction with these standards is like fighting lung cancer by smoking 49 cigarettes a day instead of 50,” said Don MacKenzie, a Union of Concerned Scientists engineer.

Some environmentalists' concerns were addressed in the rule. Groups had complained that an August plan to assign fuel-economy targets based on six size categories of trucks would have encouraged automakers to make trucks bigger to move them into a category with a less stringent mileage number.

NHTSA scrapped the categories to reduce the risk of this “gaming” and instead is assigning a separate mpg number for each size of vehicle.

Ethanol Shortage Could Up Gas Prices (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0024161

By James R. Healey
USA Today, March 30, 2006

Gasoline prices will be unusually high and shortages might occur this summer, because the U.S. ethanol industry can't keep up with the demand for fuel-grade alcohol to mix with gasoline, the head of the U.S. Energy Information Administration told a Senate committee Wednesday.

Merely "short-term challenges," countered Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol trade group. Whatever can't be produced here can be imported, he said. But imported ethanol, mostly from Brazil, carries a 54-cents-per-gallon tariff that would boost fuel prices even more, unless it were waived.

Ethanol — grain alcohol made mainly from corn in the USA — is being promoted by the auto and ethanol industries and the government as a substitute for gasoline, usually in a mix called E85 that is 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline.

But the comments Wednesday at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee underlined how distant a goal that is. The hearing wasn't even about a goal as ambitious as E85. It was to discuss ethanol as a substitute for MTBE, a clean-air additive in gasoline. Replacing it with ethanol would require only about 8% as much ethanol as E85 requires.

Refiners have used MTBE for years and now are discontinuing it because MTBE can taint water supplies and Congress has refused to protect them from MTBE lawsuits. Ethanol is the only ready substitute.

Dinneen pointed out that 33 ethanol plants are under construction and that some of the 97 others already producing are being expanded. But EIA, in a report last month warning of shortages, said that "new (ethanol) facilities will not start soon enough to meet 2006 demand." That, EIA head Guy Caruso told the committee, "could cause temporary supply dislocations and may cause price volatility."

Ethanol mainly is made in the Midwest. But demand should be heaviest in the Northeast and Texas because of special clean-air fuel requirements there. Shipping alcohol costs more and takes longer because ethanol attaches to any moisture present and could contaminate petroleum pipelines — the cheap, fast way to ship.

EIA has forecast summer gasoline prices averaging about $2.50 per gallon, or 12 cents more than last year. It has not, however, directly blamed ethanol shortages.

EIA reported Wednesday that U.S. inventories of gasoline — though still robust — dropped 5.4 million barrels last week, the biggest drop since the week ended Aug. 22, 2003.

The wholesale price of gasoline for summer-month delivery rose several cents a gallon, to about $1.91.

Ethanol, by contrast, ranged from about $2.49 to $2.52.

EPA Plans Tougher Smog Rules For Mowers (WSJ)

By Sara Schaefer Muñoz
The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

The Environmental Protection Agency is planning new emissions standards for lawn equipment that would cut air pollution and save gas. But manufacturers say the rules could increase the risk of fires and lead to higher prices for consumers.

The new standards would affect all lawn mowers. Currently, there are 52 million residential and commercial mowers (both the ones you push and the ones you ride) and other large lawn equipment that the EPA estimates are in use nationwide. Such lawn equipment is operated about three billion hours a year, the agency says, and a typical push mower emits as much hourly pollution as 11 cars, with a riding mower emitting as much as 34 cars.

To control emissions, lawn equipment would likely need catalytic converters, devices that manufacturers and fire safety advocates say could increase the risk of fires and burns. An EPA safety study released earlier this month, however, found no risk from adding the devices to engines in lawn mowers.

The move toward tighter regulation comes at a time when the landscape industry is booming: Residential lawn and garden equipment, supplies and services generated sales of $24 billion in 2004, up 5% from 2003, according to the most recent data available from Packaged Facts, a division of New York-based MarketResearch.com. It also comes during a period of intense industry innovation.

So-called zero-turn riding mowers, for example, a type of rear-engine machine that can turn in place, are able to make grass-cutting more efficient. Manufacturers are also launching a wave of bigger, more sophisticated mowers (which also guzzle more gas than push models). The Bloomington, Minn.-based Toro Co. recently unveiled a new tractor with cruise control. MTD Products in Cleveland this year rolled out its biggest mower yet under the Cub Cadet brand: It weighs 843 pounds and is designed for properties of six acres or larger.

The EPA has not formally proposed the new emission standards, but officials say a preliminary version of nationwide rules should be published this fall. They will likely be similar to those created in California. The California rules ban tanks and hoses made of gas-permeable materials like plastic, which can allow fumes to evaporate, and set strict limits for hydrocarbon emissions, the building blocks of smog. The California regulations are expected to go into effect in January.

"Given the fact that across the country we have areas that have unhealthy air, and localities and states are looking for strategies to reduce smog, we believe it is very appropriate to look at these [lawn-equipment] sources," said Margo T. Oge, the EPA's director of transportation and air quality.

Small engine manufactures say tighter standards will require costly redesigns. The Wauwatosa, Wis.-based Briggs & Stratton Corp., the country's biggest maker of engines for outdoor power equipment, estimated that the California regulations would raise the retail cost of lawn mowers by 31%, and said expenses associated with upgrades could force them to move plants overseas. The EPA estimates that adding converters could cost $8 per engine. The retail cost of mowers is around $100 to more than $10,000 for large, riding models.

Opposition to tighter standards from Sen. Kit Bond (R., Mo.), whose state is home to factories owned by Briggs & Stratton, delayed the EPA's emission rules when he called for further study of possible fire and burn risks associated with pollution-control devices in small engines.

The central concern is the catalytic converter, a device used for decades in cars that filters emissions and can generate high levels of heat. The converters have long had fire-safety advocates urging drivers not to park on dry grass or underbrush due to safety concerns, "but you can't tell someone to keep a lawn mower off the grass," says George Miller, chairman of the International Consortium for Fire Safety, Health and the Environment, a nonprofit group devoted to fire protection. The group is working with manufacturers to do their own safety study, to be completed at the end of the year.

Under any new guidelines, the EPA won't specifically ask companies to install catalytic converters in their equipment. But the devices are one of the most effective ways to reduce smog-causing engine emissions.

The EPA's safety study found if systems are retooled to allow for cool air to flow through them, small catalytic converters can successfully be installed in lawn mowers without elevating the risk of fire. The study looked at roughly 60 different engines and 30 types of catalytic converters, and found that temperatures in the equipment could be the same or cooler than current models that don't use the devices. Use of a catalytic converter can cut small engine hydrocarbon emissions by 35%, EPA officials say.

Some companies are already moving toward more environmentally friendly products: This year's line of riding mowers from Deere & Co.'s John Deere, which include a fully enclosed engine to mitigate noise and seats with better lumbar support, were also upgraded to include nonpermeable fuel lines to keep gas from evaporating.

A few manufacturers are also offering electric mowers. These are quieter, use only several dollars a year worth of electricity, and don't require engine tune-ups or oil changes. But because they need cords and batteries they are practical only for smaller lawns. Black & Decker, for example, makes the MM875, a 19-inch blade, electric mower that sells for $249, and a cordless version priced at $449. Other alternative mowers don't need gas or electricity, but trim grass by push-power only.

America's obsession with manicured lawns has created a backlash in many areas of the country, as municipalities have restricted the use of mowers and other lawn equipment, such as leaf blowers, because of pollution and noise concerns. Palo Alto, Calif., banned gas-powered leaf blowers in July, and a new ordinance in Pound Ridge, N.Y., prohibits use of commercial landscaping equipment on Sundays. Other cities have incentives to cut down on gas-powered equipment. Fort Collins, Colo., offers a $15 rebate for mowers that are electric or motor-free.

Some consumers welcome the crackdown. Gene Lottner, a 56-year-old comptroller in Stamford, Conn., says he is frequently bothered by the noise and fumes from commercial lawn companies in his neighborhood. If lawn equipment is being used next door, "I can smell it if I have the windows open," he says.

Pollution and noise aren't the only drawbacks to the greater use of lawn equipment. According to the Consumer Product Safety Commission, hospitals saw 14,607 injuries from riding mowers in 2004, up from 9,001 in 2002. There was also an increase in injuries associated with walk-behind mowers: There were 3,485 in 2004, up from 2,450 in 2003.

Report Asks Congress To Set Limits On Fishing (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Only 13 percent of federally managed ocean fish stocks are known to be healthy and not overfished, says a report by the Marine Fish Conservation Network (MFCN), which urges Congress to impose strict limits on fishing and penalties for those who exceed them.

The report, released yesterday by a coalition of 175 groups that include fishermen and environmentalists, comes as Congress prepares to consider reauthorization of the 1976 Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, the nation's primary fisheries law.

During a press briefing at which the report was released, Lee Crockett, MFCN's executive director, said a new reauthorization measure should include annual "catch limits set by scientists" and "accountability" to deal with regional fisheries management councils that exceed those limits.

One option formerly included in a Senate version of the measure, approved by the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee in December, would require councils that catch more than their allowable limit one year to have their quotas reduced by that amount the following year. But the punishment language was cut from the Senate measure as a result of pressure from New England lawmakers.

Yesterday, Rep. Frank Pombo, California Republican, and Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, introduced a House version of the reauthorization bill that would provide no penalties for exceeding catch limits.

In an interview, Mr. Crockett called the Pombo-Frank bill "a good step in the right direction" because it would have scientists set annual catch limits.

"But there are other troubling parts," besides the lack of penalties for management councils that exceed limits, he said. The bill would provide additional exemptions to a provision in the current law that requires a rebuilding of depleted fish stocks within 10 years, he said.

Mr. Crockett said that, in the next few days, Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest, Maryland Republican, will introduce a bill "that will be stronger than the Senate" version of the reauthorization and "without some of the troubling things the Pombo bill contains."

The MFCN's report found that in 2004 only 91 of 686 ocean fish stocks were not being overfished, a figure that had not changed since 2001

This should not be happening, Mr. Crockett and others at the briefing said, because legislation passed by Congress in 1996 required an end to overfishing and the strengthening of depleted stock. MFCN said the National Marine Fisheries Service "hides its lack of progress" on this front "with administrative shell games."

Peter Baker of the Cape Cod Commercial Hook Fishermen's Association and Gerald Leape, vice president of marine conservation at the National Environmental Trust, who also participated in the briefing, agreed that protection of ocean fish must be strengthened.

"We are not seeing full implementation of what Congress passed in 1996," when the Magnuson-Stevens act was last reauthorized, Mr. Leape said.

Mixed Message On Bird-Flu Vaccine (WSJ)

By David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Effectiveness Is Exhibited, But Only in High Doses, Posing Production Difficulty

An experimental bird-flu vaccine under development by the U.S. government and Sanofi-Aventis SA is effective only at high doses, making it difficult to mass-produce in the event of a pandemic, according to a new study.

The findings provided a mixed message of hope for an answer to the deadly disease, but only if manufacturing ramps up ahead of any widespread contagion. Production of avian-influenza vaccines is restricted by the limited capacity of vaccine makers and the fact that the virus particles used to develop the vaccine have to be grown in fertilized hen eggs.

"This is more of a clear indication that we have a way to go," said Anthony Fauci, the director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, in an interview. "This is not the answer in and of itself." Dr. Fauci's agency is spearheading the government research on bird flu.

The study published in this week's New England Journal of Medicine found the vaccine from Sanofi Pasteur, a unit of Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, was only effective at six times the standard dose. In addition, two doses were needed to get the best result -- and even then it only produced the desired immune response in 54% of the patients tested. The study detected no significant side effects associated with the vaccine.

"Given that this is a new kind of influenza virus for the body to experience, we anticipated it would take more of a punch to elicit an immune response, and that is certainly the case," said William Schaffner, chairman of the department of preventive medicine at Vanderbilt University School of Medicine who served on the safety-monitoring board for the study. "What we learned is it takes a lot more. We anticipated a better response at the low dose."

Dr. Fauci said researchers are turning their attention to figuring out ways to get more of a reaction from the vaccine to reduce the need for huge quantities of it. One method being studied is to add immune-system boosters, known as "adjuvants," to produce a stronger reaction from lower doses of the bird-flu vaccine. Among the adjuvants being studied are aluminum, which is already used in other vaccines, and another substance known as MF59.

Sanofi Pasteur, in a statement, said it is boosting its production capabilities by building a plant in Swiftwater, Pa., that will double its U.S. capacity by 2009, and expanding its facility in Val de Reuil, France. The current world-wide manufacturing capacity is estimated to be such that it can only produce enough vaccine for 75 million people, according to an accompanying editorial in the NEJM.

U.S. health agencies have awarded contracts to Sanofi and Chiron Corp., of Emeryville, Calif., to produce and test vaccines to protect against the H5N1 virus, which has proved to be the deadliest of the 16 subtypes of avian-influenza viruses. There are no approved vaccines for the virus.

The U.S. government has stockpiled enough bulk concentrate of the bird-flu vaccine to immunize 3.8 million people, which is well short of the goal of 20 million set by health officials. The two companies have also produced thousands of experimental doses for clinical trials.

The H5N1 virus was first detected in Hong Kong in 1997. The virus is spread by birds and has continued to move into Europe and Africa from Asia.

Avian Flu Vaccine Produces Limited Success (USAT)

By Steve Sternberg

USA Today, March 30, 2006

Researchers claimed only partial success Thursday in the largest human trial of an avian flu vaccine. (Related video: Vaccine needs boost)

They showed the vaccine is safe and generates what appears to be a protective immune response. But it worked just half the time and only when given in a total dose that is 12 times the amount used in seasonal flu vaccine, study leader John Treanor of the University of Rochester says.

"Every journey starts with the first step," Treanor says, saying researchers hope to use chemicals called adjuvants to boost the vaccine's effectiveness.

The study, in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, marks a milestone in the joint government-private sector push to guard against avian flu by developing new vaccines and better ways of producing them. Without an effective vaccine, the Congressional Budget Office estimates, a flu pandemic in the USA could kill 2 million people.

So far, the avian flu virus, H5N1, has mainly killed birds. As of March 24, the World Health Organization reported 186 human cases and 105 deaths.

The virus's lethality, and its ongoing mutations, make it unlikely that any one vaccine will be enough, experts say.

"If this virus evolves to a point of being able to spread person to person, and we hope it never does, it will be different than the strain" used in this vaccine, possibly limiting its effectiveness, says Anthony Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, the study's main sponsor.

Although the vaccine is not a perfect match, "we would hope there would be some benefit from deploying it."

The vaccine, made by Sanofi-Aventis, carries inactivated genes from an H5N1 virus taken from a patient in Vietnam. It was given to 451 healthy adults ages 18 to 64 who were broken into four groups. Each group received a different dose ranging from 7.5 micrograms to 90 micrograms. Just more than half of those who got two 90-microgram doses 28 days apart made enough protective antibody to match the levels that occur after standard flu shots.

Standard flu shots contain vaccines against three types of virus and are 75% to 90% effective in the age group studied in the trial. Each of the three doses totals just 15 micrograms.

The amount of vaccine needed to provide protection will be crucial in a pandemic. As the dose increases, the number of people who can be vaccinated shrinks, because there are limits to how much vaccine manufacturers can make.

Current global manufacturing capacity is about 900 million 15-microgram doses. At the high dose used in the trial, only 1.2% of the world's population, 75 million people, could be vaccinated, Gregory Poland of the Mayo Clinic Foundation wrote in an NEJ editorial.

The biotech firm Chiron also has produced an avian flu vaccine that is now in human trials.

And Thursday, officials at GlaxoSmithKline were to announce the launch of two studies of the company's vaccine. About 30 other avian flu vaccines are in early testing stages, Fauci says.

Doubt Cast On Stockpile Of A Vaccine For Bird Flu (NYT)

By Denise Grady

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

A bird flu vaccine being stockpiled by the government in preparation for a possible pandemic protects only about half the people who receive it, scientists are reporting. In addition, it must be given in such high doses that if a pandemic were to start soon, manufacturers could not begin to make enough vaccine for all who would need it.

DOJ_NMG_0024165

A dose 12 times the amount used in a standard flu shot protected 54 percent of the people in a study being described today in The New England Journal of Medicine. That level of effectiveness is "poor to moderate at best," said Dr. Gregory A. Poland of the Mayo Clinic, who wrote an editorial accompanying the report.

But Dr. Anthony S. Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Disease, which paid for the development and testing of the vaccine, called the results "muted good news."

"We have a long way to go," Dr. Fauci said, but he said the research was a step in the right direction, adding, "You have to go through these early steps."

The new report is the first to include results on all the participants, 451 adults ages 18 to 64 who were inoculated at three medical centers in the United States. They received two shots a month apart. No serious side effects occurred, though some got sore arms from the shots.

Dr. Fauci and Dr. John Treanor of the University of Rochester, the lead investigator of the study, discussed the results on Tuesday in a telephone news conference.

The vaccine, developed by government and other researchers, is being made by Sanofi Pasteur under a government contract. It is designed to prevent the disease caused by the A(H5N1) virus, which has been spreading rapidly through Asia, Europe and Africa. The disease has not reached the Americas.

The virus attacks mainly birds, but some humans have been infected, almost all of them through contact with birds, and half have died. Some health officials are concerned that the virus could mutate in a way that would make it more contagious in people and start a lethal pandemic.

Vaccines work by activating a patient's immune system. Standard flu shots, even with their smaller doses, are more effective than the new bird-flu vaccine: they protect 75 percent to 90 percent of people under 65, and 50 percent to 60 percent of those who are older, Dr. Fauci said.

The standard shots probably work better because the viruses they protect against have been around for a long time, and most adults have some immunity to them. The vaccine acts like a booster shot to enhance an immunity that is already there.

Researchers say the bird flu vaccine may be less effective because hardly anyone in the United States has been exposed to the A(H5N1) virus. People have no resistance to it, and so it takes a lot of vaccine to jump-start the immune system.

The study used blood tests, which measured immunity to the virus, and researchers set the bar fairly high. Dr. Treanor said he thought that the vaccine might actually work better than it appeared from the study.

A next step in the research is to try adding a substance called an adjuvant to the vaccine, to try to make it work better and at lower doses. Adjuvants stir up the immune system. Alum is a common one.

The government has stored a "modest" amount of the Sanofi vaccine, Dr. Fauci said, about seven million to eight million doses. He said that such a small amount would not be of much help to the public, but he described it as stopgap.

If the disease emerged, he said, the main purpose of the supply would be to inoculate health care workers and people involved in the rush to make a vaccine specific for the virus strain causing the outbreak.

Currently, the United States does not have the production capacity to make bird flu vaccine and the usual vaccines for seasonal flu.

The bird flu vaccine can be made only between runs of the seasonal vaccines, which have to take priority because those types of flu occur every year, and bird flu is a theoretical threat.

Dr. Fauci said the government was spending several hundred million dollars to increase the nation's ability to make flu vaccine.

Another company, Chiron, also has a government contract to make millions of doses of bird flu vaccine. But Chiron, which has a history of manufacturing problems, has produced only 70 percent of the amount it promised the government it would provide by now, and it will not begin making the rest until this fall.

Avian Flu Vaccine Falls Short In Trial (LAT)

By Jia-rui Chong And Denise Gellene

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

Setting back plans to shield the nation from a potential bird flu pandemic, the first study of a human vaccine showed that even a massive dose failed to protect nearly half of those inoculated, according to a study released today.

The vaccine for the avian flu strain known as H5N1 was far less effective than the standard seasonal flu vaccine, which protects 70% to 90% of the people who get the shot, according to the study in the New England Journal of Medicine.

The experimental bird flu vaccine required 12 times the dose of the seasonal inoculation. That in effect would cut down the nation's stockpile of the vaccine, purchased for about $160 million, to approximately 4 million courses — enough to inoculate only some healthcare and vaccine workers.

The current pandemic flu plan, issued by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services in November, calls for enough vaccine for 20 million people, though it does not set a timetable for acquiring the shots.

"It's disappointing in that it takes so much," said Robert Webster, a virologist at St. Jude Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, Tenn., who has been studying this particular strain of bird flu since it emerged in 1997. "We have to … find ways to do better, to get more bang for the buck."

Dr. Anthony Fauci, who heads the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, acknowledged that the current vaccine "cannot be the answer to where we want to be." He said, however, that the study did demonstrate that the vaccine was partially effective and safe to use.

"It's a bit of muted good news in that we're going in the right direction, but the sobering news is we have a long way to go," he said.

Developing a human vaccine for bird flu has been the cornerstone of the nation's efforts to deal with a potential pandemic.

The virus, which originated in Asia, rarely infects people, but scientists fear a mutation could make it more easily transmissible, sparking a pandemic.

Since 2003, the World Health Organization has recorded only 186 human cases. But H5N1 is clearly lethal: 105 of those people died.

In the last two months, the virus has been detected in birds in Europe, Africa and the Middle East.

Experts believe it could arrive in North America as early as this summer, carried by migrating birds into Alaska or northeastern Canada.

The Department of Health and Human Services has funded studies of more than 30 candidate vaccines. Results from some of these studies are expected to appear in the next six to 12 months.

The study reported today, which was funded by the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, involved 451 healthy adults who were injected with vaccine made by French drug maker Sanofi Pasteur.

The patients received either placebos or dosages that ranged from 15 to 180 micrograms, split into two injections given 28 days apart. The standard dose for seasonal vaccine is 15 micrograms for each of three flu strains.

The researchers could not expose any of the subjects to the disease, so they later tested antibody response to gauge the effectiveness of the vaccine.

Two separate tests found that 54% and 58% of the people who received the highest dose had the same level of protection provided by a seasonal flu shot.

But the remaining subjects who got the highest dose — 46% and 42% in the two tests — fell below that level, meaning that they failed to reach the standard of protection.

Of those given lower doses, fewer than half were protected from the virus.

"We certainly hoped it would be better," said lead author Dr. John J. Treanor of the University of Rochester in New York.

But he said that even people who were not fully protected might have enough immunity to reduce the severity of the illness.

Sanofi spokesman Len Lavenda acknowledged that the results were disappointing.

"We're not satisfied with the level of protection, and we're working diligently to improve the immune response," he said.

Nonetheless, Sanofi is in discussions with the Food and Drug Administration about obtaining approval of its vaccine, Lavenda said.

The high doses needed cause serious problems for the nation's pandemic planning.

Dr. Wendy Keitel, an infectious disease specialist at Baylor College of Medicine in Houston who is leading a trial of another Sanofi vaccine, said requiring two shots was impractical.

"Two high doses are quite problematic if you think about vaccinating people in a pandemic," she said.

The massive doses also would strain the world's manufacturing capacity, which at best can make bird flu vaccine for only 75 million people each year.

That is "really a no-go," said Ripley Ballou, a research vice president at GlaxoSmithKline, which is also developing a vaccine. "It is just not even conceivable that all the manufacturers in the world could produce" enough to meet the demand in case of a pandemic.

The Sanofi vaccine is made in the traditional manner, using an altered virus grown in chicken eggs — a process considered slow and inefficient.

"This is slide-rule technology," said Michael Osterholm, director of the Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy at the University of Minnesota. "We need to be dealing with a modern vaccine."

British-based Glaxo and Sanofi have announced plans to build or expand factories, which could add hundreds of millions of doses of the pandemic flu vaccine to the global supply. But the added capacity won't be available for several years.

To stretch the supply, researchers are experimenting with the use of a drug additive, known as an adjuvant, that could boost the effectiveness of the vaccine. The adjuvant works by making the vaccine more easily perceptible by the immune system.

The concept isn't new. Childhood vaccines against tetanus and bacterial meningitis contain adjuvants. Most trials of adjuvants use alum, a mixture of aluminum salts.

Emeryville, Calif.-based Chiron Corp., which has also made millions of H5N1 doses for the U.S. stockpile, is testing an adjuvant derived from shark oil that it now uses in seasonal flu shots in Europe. The adjuvant isn't approved for use in the U.S.

Glaxo will announce plans today to launch clinical trials using different adjuvants with experimental avian flu vaccine.

Sanofi has already tested a bird flu vaccine with an adjuvant that produced a "good immune response" and would meet European standards for licensing seasonal flu vaccines, Lavenda said.

Bird Flu Fatalities Climb, Mark Deadliest Quarter Yet (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jason Gale

Bloomberg, March 30, 2006

March 30 (Bloomberg) -- Bird flu fatalities in Egypt, which may be confirmed by the United Nations this week, will bring the year's global death toll to 31 people and mark the quarter as the deadliest yet as the virus spreads from Asia to Europe and Africa.

The World Health Organization is scheduled to report within a few days the results of tests on two women who died this month, the UN agency said on its Web site yesterday. Three other people in Egypt also tested positive for the lethal H5N1 avian flu strain by a U.S. Naval Medical Research Unit, the WHO said.

``Since the first outbreak was confirmed on Feb. 17, more than 25 million birds have died or been destroyed'' in Egypt, the WHO said. ``Egypt has a large population of poultry, many of which are kept on roof terraces in close proximity to humans.''

More people are becoming infected after 31 countries reported initial outbreaks in animals since February. Diseased fowl raise the risk to humans and create opportunities for the virus to mutate into a pandemic form that may kill millions of people. A human case was reported every second day on average this year. The fatality rate rose to one every three days, compared with one a week in the first quarter of 2005.

Since 2003, the H5N1 strain of avian flu has killed at least 105 of 186 people infected, the WHO said on March 24. It will adjust the tally after tests are completed on the Egyptian cases, it said yesterday.

Cameroon Outbreak

A second outbreak of H5N1 was found in a wild duck in northern Cameroon, Agence France-Presse reported yesterday, citing a statement from the West African country's Agriculture Ministry. The outbreak occurred at Lake Malape, near the border with Nigeria, and about 1,000 kilometers (622 miles) north of the capital Yaounde.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan yesterday asked wealthy countries to keep their promises made in January to give money for the fight against bird flu and said significant new funds may be needed for Africa.

Health officials in poorer nations need help monitoring the avian flu virus and small farmers need payment for poultry they've killed to slow its spread, Annan said in a statement. The original pledge of $1.9 billion, made at a conference in Beijing, may not be enough, he said.

``Nowhere is this more the case than in Africa, from where I have just returned,'' Annan said in the e-mailed statement. ``As I learned at first hand, there is an immediate and desperate need for expertise, funds, transport and equipment.''

Fears the H5N1 virus will mutate and spawn a deadly pandemic-causing variant have focused attention on antiviral medication and vaccines.

Relenza Drug

GlaxoSmithKline Plc's Relenza drug yesterday won U.S. approval for the prevention of influenza, giving doctors another weapon against an illness that kills about 36,000 people in the U.S. each year.

The medicine, an inhaled powder, already is approved by the Food and Drug Administration to treat the flu. Roche Holding AG's Tamiflu, a capsule, is the only treatment also approved for prevention. The drugs would help protect people who are exposed when the flu breaks out in a family or a community, and aren't intended to replace vaccinations, the FDA said.

Study On Whale Stranding, Sonar Is Inconclusive (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Federal ocean scientists said yesterday they were unable to determine whether Navy sonar caused a mass stranding of whales on the North Carolina shore last year.

DOJ_NMG_0024168

In their report on the stranding -- one of the largest and most troubling in two decades -- the National Marine Fisheries Service researchers concluded that Navy ships had used sonar in the area the day before the whales came onshore. But detailed necropsies and analyses did not find any physical signs of a connection between the loud sonar pings and the whales' rush to shore.

"Experts from around the country worked on these samples and tests, and the bottom line is that we are not able to reach a definitive cause for the stranding," said Aleta Hohn, the Fisheries Service's lead scientist on the report.

The report concluded that most of the animals were otherwise healthy. In all, 33 pilot whales, two pygmy sperm whales and a minke whale stranded and died within two days. Strandings of more than one species at a time are rare.

The report on the January 2005 stranding had been anxiously awaited by the Navy and environmentalists because the animals died near the proposed site of a 660-square-mile underwater sonar testing range.

The Navy has said the sonar range is essential to train sailors and will not be a danger to the many whales in the area. Some environmentalists disagree, saying that the growing number of strandings around the world linked to naval active sonar make the range -- which is near a major whale migration path -- a threat to animals.

The two sides, which are battling in court over sonar, interpreted the report differently. "The NOAA report clearly acknowledges that there is no pathology implicating sonar as a cause of the stranding," said James A. Symonds, director of the Navy's environmental programs.

"We believe the time frame and the distance at which active sonar was used, two to three days prior to the stranding and over 50 nautical miles from [the site of the stranding] make it extremely unlikely that our sonar affected the animals in any way," he said.

Michael Jasny of the Natural Resources Defense Council disagreed. "Today's report by the federal government establishes that sonar was a possible cause of the January 2005 mass stranding," he said. "It confirms that the event itself was highly unusual, being the only mass stranding of offshore species ever to have been reported in the region; and that it shared 'a number of features' with other sonar-related mass stranding events."

Navies worldwide have been using powerful mid-frequency sonar for years, but the link to whale strandings is quite recent. The U.S. Navy acknowledged that its sonar caused a mass stranding in the Bahamas in 2001, and numerous other suspected cases have been reported. Most recently, Spanish officials concluded that beaked whales that came ashore along the Costa del Sol most likely did so because of naval sonar.

Fisheries Service acoustics specialist Brandon Southall said the amount of sonar used in the area prior to the North Carolina stranding was not unusual. But he said it was impossible to say whether the sonar led to the strandings.

Report: MLB To Investigate Drug Use (USAT)

By Hal Bodley

USA Today, March 30, 2006

Former Senate majority leader George Mitchell will be named to head Major League Baseball's investigation into past steroid use by Barry Bonds and other major leaguers, ESPN reported Wednesday.

An announcement could come as early as today.

Without citing sources, ESPN stated that Mitchell, a Maine Democrat and close friend of Commissioner Bud Selig, will head the investigation but not be the lead investigator.

MLB President Bob DuPuy, who refused to confirm the ESPN story, told USA TODAY: “The commissioner has given a great deal of consideration to the subject of an investigation over the past weeks and if one were to be conducted to its scope. I am confident he is well along in the deliberative process and will make his final decision shortly.”

The Associated Press reported Wednesday that a baseball official said the final plans for the investigation were pending, as was a definite answer from Mitchell.

MLB spokesman Richard Levin said neither he nor the commissioner would comment on the ESPN and AP reports.

Mitchell is the chairman of the board of the Walt Disney Co., parent company of ESPN. He is also on the board of directors of the Boston Red Sox and was a key member of Selig's blue-ribbon economic study committee. He stepped down as Senate majority leader in 1994.

Selig, after the publication of the book Game of Shadows, written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters, has repeatedly said he would consider an investigation. The book details the use of steroids, human growth hormone and insulin by Bonds for at least five seasons beginning in the fall after the 1998 season.

MLB did not ban steroids until after the 2002 season.

The league began testing for illegal performance-enhancing drugs in 2003.

Mitchell To Lead Steroids Inquiry (LAT)

By Tim Brown, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK — George Mitchell, a Washington lawyer and the former Senate majority leader from Maine who previously has advised Major League Baseball, will lead Commissioner Bud Selig's investigation into alleged steroid use by Barry Bonds and other players.

Under persistent pressure from Congress and in light of a new book that claims Bonds used performance-enhancing drugs for at least five years, Selig will outline his investigation in a news conference today at his office here, baseball sources said.

Mitchell, 72, served on a blue ribbon panel that reported on the financial state of baseball in 2000. He will be the point man in Selig's first hard look at baseball's so-called "steroid era," in which many of the game's foremost players have been accused of using illegal performance-enhancers. Mitchell is expected to attend today's news conference.

It is unclear what action Selig would — or could — take if Mitchell and his investigative team found evidence that Bonds and others had taken steroids. The commissioner has appeared resistant to erasing tainted records, and probably would face a legal battle if he employed his "best interests of the game" authority to suspend guilty players.

One, New York Yankee Jason Giambi, reportedly admitted to a federal grand jury that he used steroids, and in a subsequent news conference offered a vague apology. He hasn't been disciplined because he apparently did not test positive under baseball's steroid policy. Neither has Bonds.

Major League Baseball did not begin its testing program until 2003, did not suspend its first player until a year ago, and only this year strengthened its policy to sufficiently satisfy Congress.

Certain members of Congress remain unconvinced. In a letter sent to Selig two weeks ago, Rep. Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.) cited "apparently credible allegations that [Bonds] used steroids," and demanded that Selig disclose "your involvement and authority to police against illegal performance-enhancing drug use."

Stearns, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection, and Rep. Edward Whitfield (R-Ky.), chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Investigations, asked Selig to respond to six queries — two directly related to Bonds — by today. According to a source in the commissioner's office, Selig has received an extension to respond at a later date.

Mitchell will conduct his investigation independently, as when another lawyer, John Dowd, investigated Pete Rose for gambling on baseball in 1989. Dowd submitted a 225-page report and Rose was banned for life by then-commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti.

Twelve major leaguers and 81 minor leaguers were suspended last year under baseball's previous policy, the major league portion of which suspended first-time offenders for 10 days. The current policy requires a 50-game suspension for a first offense, 100 games for a second offense and a lifetime ban for a third.

"Game of Shadows," a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters and released last week, claims to detail steroid use by Bonds, Gary Sheffield, Jason Giambi and others, most of whom were alleged to have received designer and anabolic steroids from the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative.

The timing of the investigation will be particularly delicate for Bonds and the San Francisco Giants. Bonds is approaching Babe Ruth on the all-time home run list and is 47 short of Hank Aaron's career record of 755. The Giants open the regular season Monday in San Diego.

Mitchell Is Expected To Oversee Inquiry Into Steroid Use (NYT)

By Ben Shpigel

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

Major League Baseball is expected to announce today that George Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader from Maine, will head a panel that will investigate past steroid use by major league players, and will take a thorough look at Barry Bonds's suspected involvement.

No one in the office of Commissioner Bud Selig would confirm Selig's intentions, but a team executive with knowledge of the situation said the announcement on Mitchell would come today. The person was granted anonymity because details had not been finalized.

Mitchell was expected to oversee the investigation, but it was anticipated that someone else would lead the panel's day-to-day activities. The decision to create the panel comes after the release of "Game of Shadows," a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters that links Bonds to the ongoing steroid scandal that has engulfed baseball and created a huge problem for Selig.

Mitchell, a director of the Red Sox who served on Selig's panel on baseball economics in the late 1990's, lends prestige and immediate credibility to the investigation, which comes after months of Congressional pressure on Selig and baseball. In choosing Mitchell, Selig again finds himself reacting to voices in Congress and in the news media that have criticized baseball for looking the other way as steroid use became popular.

Over the past 13 months, Selig has fended off Congressional pressure to enact steroid legislation by twice persuading Donald Fehr, the executive director of the players union, to reopen the collective-bargaining agreement to introduce stricter language and tougher penalties for players who violate the league's steroid policy.

The first change came in 2004, when baseball mandated a 10-day suspension for the first positive test, a 30-day suspension for the second, a 60-day suspension for the third and a one-year suspension for the fourth.

The second change came in November, when Selig announced that, for the first time, testing would include amphetamines and that players who failed a steroid test this season would be suspended 50 games. The penalties increase to 100 games for a second positive test and a lifetime suspension after a third.

Despite these concessions, Selig has found himself needing to take another step by creating the panel. At the center of the controversy is Bonds, whose march on the career home run record will ensure that the focus remains on steroids. Bonds, who enters this season with 708 career homers, is bearing down on Babe Ruth (714) and Hank Aaron (755), and was bound to find himself embroiled in controversy even without the publication of the book and its incendiary charges.

The book asserts that Bonds, who has denied knowingly using steroids, began using performance-enhancing drugs in 1998 because he was jealous that Mark McGwire had captured the spotlight during his record-setting home run race with Sammy Sosa that season. It offers a lurid timeline of Bonds's devoted steroid use, contending that he was given the drugs by Greg Anderson, a friend and personal trainer, and later became involved with Victor Conte Jr., the owner of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, which concentrated on offering performance-enhancing drugs to athletes.

The book also alleges that Bonds lied before a federal grand jury investigating Balco when, on Dec. 4, 2003, he testified that he did not think that products he had used described as "the clear" and "the cream" were steroids.

To complicate the investigation, the collective-bargaining agreement did not include drug testing until the owners and the players union agreed to it in 2002, which may make it difficult for baseball to penalize anyone who used steroids before then. Testing began in 2003, and penalties were introduced in 2004.

The investigation could also introduce new names and verify alleged users, creating additional headaches for Selig as he tries to undo the damage done to the sport by a scandal that refuses to go away.

Report: MLB To Launch Steroid Investigation (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, March 30, 2006

New York, NY (Sports Network) - Major League Baseball is reportedly expected to launch an investigation into past steroid use by its players, with former Senate majority leader George Mitchell reportedly heading the panel.

The New York Times reported late Wednesday that the announcement of Mitchell's appointment could come as early as Thursday. The paper also reported that, while Mitchell will head the investigation, someone else will handle the day- to-day activities.

Mitchell served on Commissioner Bud Selig's baseball economic panel in the late 1990s and is currently a director with the Boston Red Sox. He served as a senator from Maine (D) from 1989-1995.

San Francisco Giants outfielder Barry Bonds will also reportedly get a close look in the investigation. Bonds once again became synonymous with alleged steroid use after the book "Game of Shadows," was released.

According to the book, written by reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams of San Francisco Chronicle, Bonds began using steroids after the 1998 season because of his jealousy stemming from the attention that Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa garnered during their chase, and eventual passing, of Roger Maris' single-season home run mark.

Bonds eventually broke McGwire's mark of 70 after he jacked 73 homers during the 2001 season. He has continuously denied knowingly taking steroids and has even attempted legal action against the recently released book.

Major League Baseball has been constantly battling the alleged use of steroids in its league for some time now, and in November, announced a new steroid policy with stricter penalties for offenders.

The new penalties include a 50-game suspension for first-time offenders, 100- game suspension for a second offense and a lifetime ban for a third violation. Players banned for life will have the opportunity to seek reinstatement after two years.

Also, the new policy will include random testing for amphetamines. First time offenders for amphetamines will have to undergo mandatory evaluation and follow-up testing. Subsequent positive tests will carry suspension of 25 games, 80 games and up to a lifetime ban.

The former penalties for steroid use called for a 10-day suspension for a first offense, a 30-day ban for a second violation and 60-day penalty for a third offense. The penalty for a fourth positive test was a one-year ban and the penalty for a fifth offense was left to the commissioner's discretion. There was no penalty for amphetamine use.

MLB To Investigate Steroid Abuse (BBC)

BBC, March 30, 2006

Bonds is one of several players expected to be investigated Major League Baseball will launch an investigation into alleged past steroid by players, including slugger Barry Bonds, according to reports.

Former US senate majority leader George Mitchell is expected to lead the probe.

Performance enhancing drugs were not officially banned until after the 2002 season and Bonds has denied ever knowingly using any drugs.

But there has been increasing pressure on MLB to deal with the steroid issue, especially between 1998 to 2002.

Two recent books - Game Of Shadows by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters and Love Me, Hate Me: Barry Bonds And The Making Of An Antihero by Jeff Pearlman - have accused Bonds of using steroids.

MLB also faces questions from the United States Congress regarding the issue.

The organisation has yet to confirm the investigation but the New York Times reported in its Wednesday editions that commissioner Bud Selig was on the verge of making it public.

Probe Of Shadows (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, March 30, 2006

Selig expected to start investigation focusing on performance-enhancers and targeting BALCO, Bonds, Sheffield, Giambi

Steroids and baseball have been linked since 1988, when public suspicion concerning Jose Canseco arose.

Now, days before the 2006 season will begin, the game's leadership will finally, formally investigate those who allegedly have used the performance-enhancing drug.

Today, Bud Selig likely will announce that he is opening an examination of players who have been accused of steroid usage. Former Senator George Mitchell will lead the investigation, and the queries will start, not surprisingly, with those implicated in the BALCO scandal - with Barry Bonds and the Yankees' Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield ranking as the big names.

Although the BALCO scandal has been public for more than 2 1/2 years, the release last week of "Game of Shadows" - the book written by the San Francisco Chronicle reporters (Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams) who broke many of the BALCO stories - clearly precipitated this dramatic step by Selig.

Baseball last appointed an independent investigator to look into the transgressions of Pete Rose, in 1989, and that resulted in Rose's expulsion from baseball for gambling on games involving the Reds, whom he managed from 1984-89. But this effort is murkier in both goal and scope.

Once baseball established that Rose indeed bet on the Reds, breaking the game's cardinal rule, it became relatively easy to kick the all-time hits leader out of the game. Yet even if Mitchell and his investigators can somehow prove conclusively that Bonds, et al, used steroids prior to 2003, that won't necessarily lead to suspensions of any kind.

Steroids weren't explicitly banned - and weren't tested for, therefore - until 2003. And there was no disciplinary system in place for steroid users until the 2004 season.

Bonds, Giambi and Sheffield all testified in front of a BALCO grand jury in December 2003, and "Game of Shadows" submits strong evidence that both Bonds and Sheffield - who reportedly spoke of unknowingly using steroids - perjured themselves. To date, however, the federal government hasn't brought perjury charges against either player; such an indictment would give Selig far more latitude to act.

Selig has a "best interests of the game" power, as granted by baseball's owners, yet that likely wouldn't hold much water, legally.

The timetable on baseball's investigation isn't clear, although the endeavor will play against Bonds' pursuit of Hank Aaron's all-time home run record of 755. When Bonds' Giants begin the season Monday at San Diego's PETCO Park, the 41-year-old slugger will bring 708 homers to the plate. He is six away from tying Babe Ruth for second place and needs 47 to tie Aaron, an event baseball's leadership would love to somehow avoid.

BALCO represents Mitchell's most obvious starting point because it is the only major laboratory to have been caught. It will be far more challenging for Mitchell and his assembled staff to track down other producers of illicit substances, both domestically and internationally.

Mitchell, 72, a native of Maine, represented his home state in the Senate from 1980 until 1995, when he retired. A Democrat, he served as the Senate Majority Leader from 1989 until 1995.

Most important for this job, Mitchell is a close friend of Selig. Earlier this decade, he served on the commissioner's highly publicized "blue ribbon panel," which produced a study reflecting Selig's desire to overturn the game's economics.

Mitchell is listed as the "director" of the Boston Red Sox. It's not clear whether he'll need to resign from this job to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest.

A Black Issue? (USAT)

By Bob Nightengale

USA Today, March 30, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — They arrive with no return addresses and, of course, with no signatures.

These are the hate letters San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds and his publicists say they receive each week, arriving with greater frequency since spring training began. Some are thrown away. A few are kept. Others, the ones that threaten his life, go to Major League Baseball security officials.

As opening day looms Monday and as baseball prepares an investigation of steroid use in the major leagues, the letters keep arriving — and a debate gathers momentum:

Is Bonds, seven home runs from surpassing Babe Ruth for second on baseball's all-time home runs list, the latest African-American athlete to suffer the effects of racism, similar to the experience of all-time leader Hank Aaron?

Or is the anger directed toward Bonds a product of mounting evidence he used performance-enhancing drugs to reach this point in history?

Or could he be paying the price for a career of surly behavior toward fans and the media?

Whatever side of the debate they take, the participants — Bonds, other major league players and observers of the game — fervently and heatedly argue they're right.

“White America doesn't want him to (pass) Babe Ruth and is doing everything they can to stop him,” says Leonard Moore, director of African and African-American Studies at Louisiana State University. “America hasn't had a white hope since the retirement of (NBA star) Larry Bird, and once Bonds passes Ruth, there's nothing that will make (Ruth) unique, and they're scared. And I'm scared for Bonds.

“I think what he'll go through will be 100 times worse than what Aaron went through” when he surpassed Ruth in 1974. “I pray for him every night.”

Those who insist race is a non-factor cite the overwhelming evidence of Bonds' steroid use in the leaked grand jury testimony and documents reported by the San Francisco Chronicle in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO) investigation and more recently in the book Game of Shadows.

The mass of data includes affidavits filed by government investigators, evidence seized from BALCO and memos detailing statements of BALCO founder Victor Conte and Bonds' trainer and friend, Greg Anderson, to Internal Revenue Service special agent Jeff Novitzky.

That evidence, they say, has no overtones of racial or gender discrimination; those identified in the book as using steroids range from Bonds to former NFL player Bill Romanowski, who is white, and track star Marion Jones.

“Barry was my childhood hero growing up, and what he's going through I wouldn't wish on my worst enemy,” Oakland Athletics third baseman Eric Chavez says. “But as far as this being race-related? I totally disagree. If Big Mac (Mark McGwire) was playing, he'd be in the same boat. This is a case where if there is a beast, you chop the beast's head off. That happens to be Barry. I think we all want to see the end of the story. I want the right information.”

Giants managing partner Peter Magowan says: “I don't believe this is a case of racism. In fact, I think this shows how far we've come. If the media brought this up 20 years ago, they would have been considered racists.”

Moore sees the grand jury testimony differently. “To black America, this is just another example of the judicial system trying to railroad an African-American male,” Moore says.

The controversy has done little to slow Bonds this spring. He batted .625 and hit four home runs in 16 at-bats in Cactus League exhibition games. The lingering effects of three knee surgeries in 2005 and a strained elbow limited him to 24 innings in the field; he is expected to play in two of the Giants' exhibitions this weekend in the Bay Area.

Bonds, whose 708 home runs are 47 shy of Aaron's record 755, was reticent last week about discussing the role of race in the recent steroid allegations. He says he realizes his personality, which has led to few endorsement opportunities, plays a factor.

"I've done some f----- up things, I admit it," Bonds said Friday at the Giants spring training facility. "We all make mistakes in life. But there's only one perfect person in our society, and they put him on a cross. For what? For being kind? For loving people?"

Bonds' reluctance to nurture his public image may hinder him, says Harry Edwards, a former University of California-Berkeley sociology professor who organized the 1968 Olympic Games black athlete protest.

"Barry has never really cultivated the media and cultured the media the way Magic Johnson did and Michael Jordan did or the way Tiger Woods has done," Edwards says. "So he doesn't have the reserve of public relations capital to call upon.

"The same animosity and resentment that Hank Aaron suffered through when he broke Babe Ruth's record has been exacerbated because of the cloud of steroid suspicion. This is a visceral response to a black man (passing) Babe Ruth."

Game of Shadows, by Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, claims Bonds began taking steroids after the 1998 season. Commissioner Bud Selig has been reviewing the matter and according to ESPN will launch an investigation of Bonds and other major leaguers. USA TODAY could not independently confirm the investigation.

Several players say Bonds' differences with the media, rather than his race, make him a target. Would the media act the same toward New York Yankees shortstop Derek Jeter if he were going for the record?

"I'm a big believer in karma," says San Diego Padres center fielder Mike Cameron, who is African-American. "What goes around comes around. If you don't treat people right, things come back to bite you."

Bonds, the son of former major league player Bobby Bonds and godson of Hall of Famer Willie Mays, says he never worries about diplomacy and knows he's one of the most disliked players in the game.

He caused a furor two years ago when he said he wanted to break all of Ruth's records but wouldn't mind falling short of Aaron, who started his career in the Negro leagues. Yet when Bonds was criticized for his comments, construed by some as racist, he reminded everyone that his first wife was white.

"This is something we, as African-American athletes, live with every day," Bonds said. "I don't need a headline that says, 'Bonds says there's racism in the game of baseball.' We all know it. It's just that some people don't want to admit it. They're going to play dumb like they don't know what the hell is going on."

Bonds, who insists he has never taken steroids, says he has been tested several times for steroids since 2003. Major League Baseball confirms that every test was clean. Yet the suspicions refuse to go away, particularly after the leaked grand jury testimony and documents discovered by the Chronicle in the BALCO investigation.

Game of Shadows reports that Bonds, spurred by jealousy of the attention generated by McGwire's season home run record in 1998, began taking the steroid Winstrol after that season. It says Bonds took human growth hormone and Deca Durabolin after the 1999 season and, before his 73-home run season of 2001, the BALCO-created "clear" and "cream" drugs as well as Clomid, a women's infertility drug, and Modafinil, a narcolepsy drug used as a stimulant.

Co-author Fainaru-Wada says Game of Shadows and the Chronicle investigation never were about Bonds.

"The premise that the media is going after Bonds is false," Fainaru-Wada says. "People are reporting on a federal investigation that is about steroids, in which Bonds is a major part of the investigation. We haven't had anyone characterize (the book) in any racial terms.

"But this is not a Barry Bonds book. It was born from a federal investigation in which he was a part."

Yet many African-American players in baseball believe the constant allegations can be construed as racially motivated.

"It's so obvious what's going on," Minnesota Twins center fielder Torii Hunter says. "He has never failed a drug test and said he never took steroids, but everybody keeps trying to disgrace him. How come nobody even talks about Mark McGwire anymore? Or (Rafael) Palmeiro (who tested positive for steroids in 2005)?

"Whenever I go home (to Pine Bluff, Ark.), I hear people say all of the time, 'Baseball just doesn't like black people. Here's the greatest hitter in the game, and they're scrutinizing him like crazy.' It's killing me because you know it's about race."

Before the period of alleged drug usage detailed in Game of Shadows, Bonds' career high in home runs was 46, achieved in 1993 at age 28. From 2000 to 2004, between the ages of 35 and 39, he averaged 51.6 home runs a season and hit his record 73 homers.

Bonds has gained nearly 50 pounds since his 1986 rookie season; he weighs about 235 pounds and never had a drastic weight loss once steroid testing was implemented.

"People keep talking about how he's not supposed to keep hitting homers and doing phenomenal things because he's 40-plus," says baseball agent Dave Stewart, a former 20-game winner and front office executive.

"Well, (seven-time Cy Young winner) Roger Clemens is 40-plus, too, and nobody ever brings his name up. Why not? Is it because one's black and the other is white?"

Seattle Mariners outfielder Matt Lawton, one of 12 major league players who tested positive for steroids last season, even has difficulty understanding why the guilty have been forgotten.

"If (Bonds) were white, he'd be a poster boy in baseball, not an outcast," Lawton says.

Selig and Donald Fehr, executive director of the players association, refused to publicly comment about the possible racial implications if an investigation is launched against Bonds.

Public perception is mixed. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll of baseball fans taken this month showed 49% think Bonds should be inducted into the Hall of Fame and 43% think he shouldn't.

If Major League Baseball ever concludes Bonds is guilty of taking steroids, 52% of fans believe his records should be taken away.

"People would breathe a deep sigh of relief if he didn't break Hank's record," says Edwards, the former Berkeley professor.

"If he had the grace to step aside for Hank, I think it would get him into the Hall of Fame.

"It's sad to think that's what it would take because of all his accomplishments, but it's true."

A Drug Dealer's Toll On Americans (WP)

The Washington Post, March 29, 2006

Marc Emery, who distributed millions of marijuana seeds throughout the country, admits the accuracy of the Drug Enforcement Administration's charges against him, but he denies harming Americans ["High Crimes, or a Tokin' Figure?" Style, March 18].

Like all dealers, Mr. Emery turns a blind eye to marijuana's victims -- people like Victoria Rogers, a mother driving with her children when she was killed by a marijuana-intoxicated motorist.

Marijuana feeds thousands of addictions -- so many that more teenagers enter treatment for marijuana dependency than for all other drugs combined. Thousands of adolescents whose brains are still developing also suffer from depression, memory impairment and diminished judgment because of marijuana. Users destroy their lungs because marijuana smoke contains 50 to 70 percent more cancer-causing chemicals than tobacco smoke.

That Mr. Emery sees no consequences of his actions does not change the fact that they destroy innocent American lives and that he should and will face legal consequences as a result.

Cali Cartel Co - Founder's Son Sentenced (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

MIAMI (AP) -- A federal judge on Wednesday sentenced the son of a co-founder of Colombia's Cali cocaine cartel to nearly 22 years in prison.

William Rodriguez-Abadia, 40, could serve less than the 21-year, 10-month term if prosecutors agree that his cooperation has been substantial in a case against his father and uncle.

Rodriguez-Abadia surrendered to U.S. authorities in January and pleaded guilty to drug trafficking.

He admitted that he took over much of the cartel's operations after the 1995 arrests in Colombia of his father, Miguel Rodriguez-Orejuela, and uncle, Gilberto Rodriguez-Orejuela.

Both are jailed in Miami on U.S. charges and are awaiting trial.

Rodriguez-Abadia has agreed to forfeit more than $300 million in assets linked to drug profits.

The Cali cartel was once the world's largest cocaine smuggling enterprise, earning more than $1 billion in profits, prosecutors say.

Experts from the United States and Britain have stepped in to help Kenyan officials test and destroy 1,141 kilograms of cocaine. The drugs were netted in 2004 during the biggest cocaine seizure in the country's history. How will the Kenyans get rid of all that blow?

They'll burn it. The plan is to incinerate the cocaine at the Kenya Medical Research Institute after officials finish testing the bundles to ensure that they're narcotics and possibly to determine their origin. Kenya's attorney general estimates that it will take at least eight hours to burn all of the contraband. The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime has advised the country on internationally accepted destruction methods, which include testing the ashes to verify the absence of drugs.

In the United States, the Drug Enforcement Administration burns illicit drugs such as marijuana, ecstasy, and cocaine at contract facilities. DEA officials transport seized drugs to the incinerator and load them into the device. (DEA agents do not allow the drugs to leave their custody.) Most incinerators have at least two chambers. The first chamber burns the drugs in a natural-gas fire to release CO2 vapor, while the second chamber burns off the vapor at a higher temperature. Hazardous chemicals, like the ether and methanol used to make methamphetamine, are incinerated separately, according to Environmental Protection Agency regulations.

Temperatures inside an incinerator can reach up to 1,500 degrees Fahrenheit. Leftover ash is generally a product of the drug's packaging. The ashes are disposed of according to local regulations. (Some landfills prohibit the waste.)

Drugs are destroyed after they are no longer needed for legal proceedings. The DEA incinerates seized drugs if the U.S. Attorney's Office does not send a letter requesting that the substances be preserved for use in an ongoing trial or investigation. If a stash is taking up too much space in DEA storage facilities, a sample might be preserved while the rest is destroyed.

Local law enforcement may use incinerators at hospitals, veterinary clinics, and other facilities. Virginia state police flush small amounts of drugs down the toilet. Springdale, Ark., police reportedly burn drugs in barrels. Canadian officials sometimes render drugs unusable by mixing them into a plaster that is later buried.

Pair Charged In Intimidation Slaying (PTR)

PittsburghTribune-Review, March 30, 2006

Two men accused in a 2004 slaying designed to intimidate the victim's son from testifying in a Beaver County drug trial now face federal charges -- and possibly the death penalty, state and federal authorities said Wednesday.

Jelani Solomon, 27, of Beaver Falls, and Claron Hanner, 28, of Pittsburgh's Knoxville neighborhood, are charged with an array of drug and weapons offenses in connection with the Jan. 19, 2004, slaying of Frank Helisek Jr., 53.

Hanner used a Glock 9 mm handgun to shoot Helisek on the doorstep of his New Brighton home, authorities said. The hit was ordered by Solomon to send a message to Shawn Helisek, the victim's son, who was scheduled to testify the following day against Solomon.

The trial never happened. Solomon pleaded guilty the day after Helisek's killing to one count of cocaine possession with intent to distribute.

Solomon agreed to pay Hanner for killing Frank Helisek, said U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan, who declined to discuss the price of the contract because that information will be presented at trial.

Hanner, who was identified by a cell phone left at the scene of the slaying, was arrested and charged with criminal homicide, authorities said.

Beaver County District Attorney Dale M. Fouse vowed repeatedly to seek the death penalty and hasn't backed away from that stance, even though the case now is being handled by federal prosecutors.

"It's still our hope and intention that the death penalty be sought in this case," said Fouse, calling Helisek's death a contract murder.

Buchanan said she will decide in the next few days whether to recommend seeking the death penalty. The final decision will be made by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Buchanan said she has sought the death penalty in the past. She said this is a serious crime that was substantially planned and premeditated.

"This is an offense that involved the murder of a father of a witness in a drug-trafficking trial," Buchanan said.

Also included in the indictment -- handed up by a Pittsburgh grand jury Tuesday and unsealed yesterday -- is Solomon's mother, Wanda Solomon, 46, of Ambridge, Beaver County. She is accused of helping her son run the drug operation.

Wanda Solomon pleaded not guilty yesterday in federal court. She has a prior drug conviction and another pending federal indictment. She could face 10 years to life in prison if convicted.

From 1999 through November 2005, authorities allege, Jelani Solomon distributed more than five kilograms of cocaine. While Solomon was in jail, Buchanan said, he continued to run his drug ring with the help of his mother and other people.

DOJ_NMG_0024176

A two-year investigation into Jelani Solomon's drug enterprise, which the federal Drug Enforcement Administration dubbed "Operation Enough is Enough," has netted 44 arrests so far.

"This investigation will continue until each person involved in this drug conspiracy and the murder of Frank Helisek is charged," Buchanan said.

Jelani Solomon and Hanner will appear in federal court within the next two weeks, Buchanan said.

Police Chief Sentenced On Crack Conviction (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) - A former Lutcher police chief was sentenced Wednesday to more than seven years in prison for distributing crack cocaine.

Corey Pittman was arrested in 2005 after federal agents and St. James Parish sheriff's officers caught him giving crack to an undercover officer on three occasions, federal authorities said. Pittman, 30, pleaded guilty earlier to three counts of distributing crack.

U.S. District Judge Ginger Berrigan sentenced him to seven years and eight months in prison and ordered him to serve three years of supervised release after his term ends. The charges carried up to 40 years.

The investigation began when an area law officer, but not one in Pittman's department, tipped off federal agents that the chief might be involved in selling drugs, according to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

Former Lutcher Chief Gets Seven Years (ADV)

Advocate, March 29, 2006

Former Lutcher Police Chief Corey Pittman was sentenced to seven years in prison on Wednesday. Pittman, 30, received the sentence following a guilty plea to three counts of crack cocaine distribution.

In the summer of 2005 Pittman distributed crack cocaine to an undercover agent who was part of an operation involving the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the FBI and officers of the St. James Parish Sheriff's Office.

"The conviction and today's prison sentence of former police chief Corey Pittman -- an admitted crack cocaine dealer -- will serve as yet another strong signal to the citizens we in federal law serve, that we will tolerate no abuses or betrayals by officials who are sworn to protect and serve the public," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

As part of the sentence, Pittman will have to serve three years of supervised release following his incarceration.

Evidence Suppressed In Drug Raid (PDN)

By Mark-Alexander Pieper, Pacific Daily News

Pacific Daily News, March 30, 2006

A federal judge yesterday granted a motion to suppress evidence obtained against two people arrested during the Sept. 8 drug raid at the Guam Reef Hotel.

That means the federal prosecutors may not use the items, including an ice pipe, ice straws and the bag from which they were obtained, to prosecute defendants Justin Keith Guerrero and Renea Dorleen Cruz-Taitano.

Prosecutors have until April 6 to decide whether to continue to pursue the case against them or drop the charges. Four others have been arrested in connection with the alleged ice-manufacturing scheme. Defense attorney Curtis Van de Veld had argued that all statements and articles seized from Guerrero and Cruz-Taitano during the raid should be suppressed because the search was not conducted properly, and therefore, violated the defendants' Fourth Amendment rights that protect them from unreasonable searches.

U.S. District Court of Guam Judge Joaquin Manibusan, in a written opinion, stated that the arresting officers lacked probable cause to detain Cruz-Taitano and Guerrero at the time of the raid.

In her court testimony in January, Guam Customs Officer Barbara Tayama, who detained Cruz-Taitano, said she had not read Cruz-Taitano her Miranda Rights before detaining her, questioning her and asking to search her bag, which contained the suspected drug paraphernalia.

Last month, Manibusan decided to admit evidence obtained in the raid in the case against the other defendants: Joseph Anthony Mesa, Jeffrey Anthony Espinosa, Ginger Perez Hamamoto and Shardae Roxanne Love. The four were arrested and charged with manufacturing ice in Room 755 of the Guam Reef Hotel. The case against them is ongoing.

On Sept. 8, agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Guam Police Department and Guam Customs and Quarantine raided the hotel room based on a tip they had received earlier that morning.

Real Estate Agent Pleads Not Guilty To Money Laundering (CRG)

Cedar Rapids Gazette, March 30, 2006

Cedar Rapids real estate agent Harriette Cooper pleaded not guilty to six money laundering charges during a brief appearance this morning in federal court in Cedar Rapids.

Cooper, 52, is accused of taking cash from drug sales and obtaining six cashier's checks during April 2003 to avoid the filing of federal Currency Transaction Reports. She also faces one count of structuring financial transactions for obtaining the money orders, then acting in her role as a real estate agent, using the checks to make a down payment on a house at 267 Tomahawk Trail SE in April 2003.

U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John Jarvey set a May 22 trial date and released Cooper under the supervision of the U.S. Probation Office.

If convicted she faces up to 20 years in prison and a $250 fine on each of the six money laundering charges. The seventh charge carries a possible sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney C.J. Williams and was investigated by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Iowa Division of Narcotics Enforcement and the Criminal Investigation Division of the Internal Revenue Service.

Trio Indicted On Federal Charges In Alabama Church Fires (AP)

By JAY REEVES, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 30, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) -- A federal grand jury indicted three college students Wednesday in a series of nine church fires that plagued rural Alabama last month, accusing them of conspiracy and arson.

The three, who were arrested earlier this month after an investigation by dozens of local, state and federal authorities, also face state charges. And prosecutors say still more counts could be added once county grand juries hear the cases.

"Churches are important centers, especially in our rural communities, so these acts of heartless criminal destruction strike at the heart of these rural communities," U.S. Attorney Alice H. Martin said in a statement.

Attorneys for two suspects said they anticipated discussions with prosecutors that could lead to guilty pleas.

"We intend to work toward a resolution of this matter to begin the process of healing," said Tommy Spina, representing Matthew Cloyd, 20. "This is really day one of the beginning of that process."

Defense lawyer Brett Bloomston said his client, Russell DeBusk Jr., 19, also wanted to conclude the case soon, but added: "It's premature to predict how it will be resolved, especially in light of the state charges that are out there."

A lawyer for Benjamin Moseley, 19, did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Spina said the next step in the case is an arraignment hearing where the suspects are required to enter initial pleas of not guilty. The three could change their pleas after that hearing, expected in mid-April.

The three have been jailed since March 8 on federal charges in a series of early morning fires that destroyed or damaged churches in four rural counties over two days in early February. The charges initially covered one church arson. The indictment charged the three in five Bibb County fires and Cloyd and Moseley in four others.

Court documents filed by prosecutors indicate at least two of the suspects confessed to being involved in the fires. Investigators matched tire tracks found at several of the fires to the type of tires that were on a sport-utility vehicle driven by Cloyd, investigators said.

Evidence indicates the fires started as a prank that got out of control on a night of drinking and illegal hunting in Bibb County, south of Birmingham. The three are accused of torching five churches there.

A sworn statement by an investigator said Moseley told agents he and Cloyd set four more fires in three west Alabama counties as a diversion four days later to throw off police. Only Moseley and Cloyd were indicted in those fires.

Defense attorneys have said the fires were not crimes of hate.

Moseley and DeBusk attended Birmingham-Southern College, where they were aspiring actors studying theater. Cloyd transferred from Birmingham-Southern last fall to the University of Alabama at Birmingham, where he hoped to become a doctor, like his father.

Each man faces a mandatory minimum sentence of seven years imprisonment and a fine of $250,000 if convicted, prosecutors said.

A judge previously approved bond of $50,000 for each of the suspects on the initial federal charges, but all have remained jailed in a suburban lockup near their homes rather than make bail and be transferred to one of the jails in the rural counties where the nine fires occurred.

No arrests have been made in a 10th church blaze that was believed to be the work of a copycat. Other articles:

Bush In Mexico For Talks With Fox, Harper (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, March 30, 2006

President Bush began a trip Wednesday intended to strengthen ties with Mexico and Canada on issues like terrorism, trade and problems along the long borders the United States shares with its neighbors.

Bush said he was concerned that a "protectionist tendency and isolationist tendency" could emerge among the three countries and make cooperation more difficult, particularly in the face of economic challenges from countries like China. In an interview with Canadian television, he said the strong relationship with Mexico and Canada needs to be further strengthened.

The president arrived in Cancun Wednesday evening to an understated welcome from just a few local officials gathered at the bottom of Air Force One's stairs. Bush is meeting Thursday and Friday with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

While thousands of U.S. students lounge on the beach in this spring break spot, Bush, Fox and Harper will grapple with issues like trade, terrorism and border and immigration problems.

The student crowds are smaller this year with the beachfront still rebounding from last year's Hurricane Wilma, and Mexican officials are no doubt hoping the international attention from the summit will help boost tourism again.

"Cancun will be the eyes of the world," said cab driver Luciano Salgado Campos as he drove past downed trees lining the road from the airport to the beachfront resorts. "President Bush will be able to see how much progress has been made already."

Fox's government has spent millions to rebuild the beaches and dredge sand from the ocean floor to replace what was swept away in October, when Wilma brought winds reaching 150 mph. Many hotels still are closed.

The three leaders will gather at the Fiesta Americana Condesa on Thursday and Friday. By Tuesday, police had already set up roadblocks around the perimeter and security forces patrolled from the air and water.

Bush plans to spend less than 48 hours in Cancun, squeezing in bilateral and group meetings and a visit to the Mayan ruins at Chichen Itza — a rare cultural detour for the president who normally keeps a tight diplomatic schedule on foreign visits.

Before climbing aboard Air Force One to fly here, Bush joked that no one would see him in a skimpy bathing suit at this beach resort. "No Speedo suit here. Thankfully," he told an audience after a speech in Washington.

With a debate over border security raging at home, Bush is using the summit to try to strengthen ties with leaders of America's northern and southern neighbors who have their own concerns about the flow of people and goods with the United States.

The summit comes a year after the three countries signed a pact at Baylor University near Bush's Texas ranch that was designed to make trade more efficient and borders more secure. The agreement, called the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America, aims to combat terrorism and drug trafficking while making U.S., Mexican and Canadian products more competitive with imports from China and other nations.

Yet there are concerns, particularly on the Canadian side, about a new U.S. requirement going into effect next year that says anyone coming into the United States must show passports or other secure ID instead of a simple driver's license or birth certificate. Critics say it could slow commerce with the United States' largest trading partner. Meanwhile, Mexico is closely watching how the U.S. will change its laws concerning as many as 12 million illegal immigrants.

In Washington, the Senate began to debate the emotional issue this week, while hundreds of thousands of protesters took to the streets nationwide in protest. Some Republicans are demanding tougher border standards, including the installation of fencing and criminal penalties for those who sneak across, citing national security concerns in the post-Sept. 11 world.

Bush says border security is important, but he also insists that immigrants who are willing to work for low wages perform a vital contribution to the U.S. economy. He is pushing Congress for a visitor program that would let foreigners — many of whom have sneaked in over the Mexican border — work temporarily in the United States.

But Bush said the way to control U.S.-Mexico immigration in the long term is for Mexico to improve its economy.

"Moms and dads in Mexico are anxious to put food on the table for their children," Bush told reporters from Mexico and Canada earlier this week. "And, therefore, many of them are willing to come great distances and lengths to be able to provide for their families. And I think most people would rather be providing for their families close to their homes."

The three leaders plan joint meetings, and Bush also will talk privately with each leader on bilateral issues. The border passport requirement and a long-running dispute over tariffs on Canadian lumber are expected to be part of his first meeting with Harper, a conservative who has less than two months on the job leading traditionally liberal Canada.

Both Canada and Mexico objected to Bush's pursuit of war in Iraq, and the dispute strained relations in Bush's first term. But the president insisted this week that the relationship has remained strong because of their strong economic, cultural and historic ties.

"Face it, part of the problem that we had was because of my decision to go into Iraq," Bush said. And the government of both countries didn't agree. And I understand that. War is terrible, it's an awful thing. And yet we're still able to maintain good relations."

Bush Arrives In Cancun For Talks (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

CANCUN, Mexico — With the emotions of the immigration debate roiling politics to the north, President Bush arrived here Wednesday evening for meetings with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

The three-party conference, aimed at bolstering a year-old economic and security partnership, comes at a sensitive moment in U.S.-Mexican relations. The Senate is debating a proposal that would overhaul the United States' immigration laws. It would tighten border restrictions and create a program that would allow some of the nation's estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants to become citizens without having to leave the country.

It is unclear whether the United States' latest effort to tighten its borders will interfere with Bush's ongoing agenda to invigorate economic cooperation, and how much can be accomplished at the meeting today and Friday, with each leader in uneasy domestic political circumstances.

Bush is struggling to overcome the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, Fox is in the final year of a six-year term and cannot run for reelection, and Harper, who heads a minority Conservative government, came to power only two months ago after an election in which he was accused of being too cozy with the Bush administration.

Bush favors allowing restricted numbers of foreigners to work legally in the United States in a "guest worker" program. But he opposes giving undocumented immigrants in the U.S. an edge over those seeking American citizenship from abroad.

Fox, who has praised the Senate measure as "a step forward," is expected to assure Bush that Mexico will implement greater security measures along the border if the bill becomes law, Mexican media reported.

On Tuesday, Fox said he was "moderately optimistic" about the legislation's prospects, adding that the bill resembled the immigration program he promised to seek soon after taking office in 2000. His inability to make good on the vow has been one of the disappointments of his presidency.

With the Mexican presidential election little more than three months away, Fox is under pressure to demonstrate that he remains an effective leader who can stand up to the United States to defend his country's interests.

Fox also has been working hard to pump life into the campaign of Felipe Calderon, the candidate of his center-right National Action Party. Calderon trails leftist contender Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador by a wide margin in polls.

Both presidential candidates are united in opposing an immigration bill that the U.S. House of Representatives approved last year. It would make illegal entry into the United States a felony, criminalize humanitarian assistance to undocumented immigrants, and add 700 miles of barriers along the U.S.-Mexican border.

Before leaving Washington, Bush reiterated his position on the immigration bills. "You cannot enforce the border without having a temporary guest worker program — the two go hand in hand," he said during a question-and-answer session with the nonprofit Freedom House advocacy group. "There are people doing jobs Americans will not do. Many people who have come into our country are helping our economy grow. It's just a fact of life."

After a session of sometimes pointed questions on the Middle East, Afghanistan and other issues, Bush appeared eager to head for a resort that is popular with U.S. tourists.

"No Speedo suit here," he assured the Freedom House audience.

The Cancun conference follows a similar three-way meeting a year ago at Bush's vacation home near Crawford, Texas, at which he, Fox and then-Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin established the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America, a loosely structured framework intended to enhance cross-border protections and economic cooperation.

For Bush, the program has become part of his initiative to advance U.S. competitiveness in the global economy, unveiled two months ago in his State of the Union address.

The partnership would enable the three signatories to the North American Free Trade Agreement to boost trade beyond the continent.

As it is, trade within North America is huge: Canada is the United States' largest trading partner with daily trans-border business greater than $1 billion; Mexico is the third largest, behind China. Canada is the United States' largest supplier of imported oil; Mexico ranks second.

Just as the unresolved disputes over immigration have exposed the shaky foundation of the U.S.-Mexican relationship, disagreements also color the United States' ties with Canada.

Washington and Ottawa have been at odds for several years over subsidies Canada provides to its softwood lumber industry. U.S. lumber producers say the assistance undercuts competition.

Bush Heads To Mexico, Doesn't Pack Speedo (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 29, 2006

President Bush had a plane to catch for his meetings along the sugar-white sands of Cancun, Mexico. But that didn't stop him from lengthening a Washington speech and question-and-answer session Wednesday with more jokes.

After delivering considerable opening remarks and giving long answers to more than a half-dozen questions, Bush finally warned his audience that his time with them was almost up.

"Final question, then I'm going down to be with the president of Mexico and the prime minister of Canada," Bush said a couple of hours before his scheduled departure for the resort known as a hedonistic spring break draw.

While beer and bikinis dominated the beaches of Cancun, the president was to spend two days with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

But Bush made one thing clear. "No Speedo suit here," he promised.

Though the 59-year-old president has been deemed in excellent shape for his age, he added a wry "Thankfully" that earned laughter from the crowd.

Then Bush told the man he had chosen as his final questioner that he was only trying to see if he could throw him off.

"Just testing your concentration," the president said.

Immigration On Agenda As Bush Meets Fox In Mexico (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

CANCÚN, Mexico, March 29 — President Bush arrived here on Wednesday evening for a summit meeting that was intended in part to allay this country's concerns that he will not have sufficient political capital to push through broad-ranging changes in American immigration policy.

The meeting is a long-scheduled North American summit meeting, for which President Vicente Fox of Mexico is the host and which Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada will also attend.

But it comes as the United States Congress is in the midst of a debate over a proposal that would legalize an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants and expand guest worker programs for an estimated 400,000 immigrants each year.

The changes are vitally important for Mr. Fox, who is leaving office at the end of this year and has staked much of his legacy on seeking reforms to benefit the estimated six million illegal Mexicans working in the United States, along with the estimated hundreds of thousands of Mexicans who abandon their homeland to move north of the border every year.

Momentum on the measure turned in Mr. Fox's favor this week when the Senate Judiciary Committee passed the proposal. In an interview on Tuesday, Mr. Fox applauded the Senate's action, which was the first small victory in his government's five-year campaign for immigration reform, but he acknowledged the proposal still faced a fight in Congress.

During talks in Cancún, Mr. Fox is expected to ask Mr. Bush to press Republicans to support the measure, so that it can be passed before the end of the year. Aides to Mr. Fox said Tuesday that he would also ask Mr. Bush to use this summit meeting to restore the confidence that marked the beginning of their administrations five years ago by making Mexico a higher political priority. They also said Mr. Fox would urge his counterparts from Canada and the United States to agree to hold summit meetings every year.

"I believe that migration brings great benefits to the United States," Mr. Fox said in the interview. "I trust that American businessmen understand the productivity and quality of Mexican labor. And I trust that American governors recognize the enormous contributions that immigrants make to their states."

Mexico's prosperity depends even more heavily on immigrants in the United States. Remittances from the United States to Mexico exceeded $16 billion last year, the nation's second-highest source of revenue, after oil. Migration also serves as an escape valve that takes pressure off a government unable to create enough decent-paying jobs for its people.

"Mexico is an immigration addict," said Rafael Fernández de Castro, an expert on United States-Mexico relations at the Technological Autonomous Institute of Mexico. "If 400,000 people were not able to migrate every year, I don't want to think about what would happen."

Mr. Fox has been pushing the United States to open the border to a greater flow of workers since he was elected Mexico's first opposition president five years ago, putting a peaceful end to seven decades of authoritarian rule by the Institutional

Revolutionary Party. But after the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, the Bush administration shelved migration talks with Mexico, and the United States demanded tighter control of the border. The closeness between the governments ended when Mexico voted against the war in Iraq in the United Nations Security Council. Since then, tensions over migration have flared repeatedly.

Political analysts have said that the meeting here could be Mr. Fox's last best chance to get Mr. Bush engaged on Mexico and migration. "If President Bush were to commit to annual summits with his counterparts, that would be a positive step and some vindication for President Fox and for the North American community he has been trying to build," said Robert Pastor, the director of the Center for North American Studies at American University in Washington. He said Mr. Bush and Mr. Fox had limited political capital, with Mr. Fox soon leaving office and Mr. Bush with the lowest approval ratings of his presidency.

"It will be up to their successors to push a bolder agenda," Mr. Pastor said.

Down On Border, 'La Linea' Isn't So Clear (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

NOGALES, Mexico -- Troops. Barricades. Guns.

On the border, this is the vocabulary of U.S.-Mexico relations. Here at one of the busiest crossing points, dingy metal walls separate the United States from Mexico, rich from poor. The walls are spray-painted with crude images of American border patrol agents, their pistols leveled at brown-skinned men.

Even as differences over immigration and border security -- roiled this week by congressional debates and massive protests by Latinos across the United States -- threaten to dredge a deeper divide between the nations, it is clear that they are increasingly knit by an exchange of business, ideas and, above all, human beings.

On Thursday and Friday, when President Bush meets in Cancun with President Vicente Fox, there will be no topic more pressing than the border -- "La Linea," as Mexicans call it -- a barrier that dominates a relationship marked both by enormous potential and overwhelming problems. Bush arrived in Cancun Wednesday night.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper will also participate in the talks at the coastal resort, the second session since the formation of the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America, intended to foster cooperation among the United States, Mexico and Canada.

Historic feelings of mistrust remain strong on the Mexican side of the border with the United States. Business is booming, but so is crime, and the rapid but lopsided economic development of the region has highlighted the persistent differences in living standards between the two countries.

In 2005, the United States imported a record $170 billion in goods from Mexico and exported $120 billion to its southern neighbor, according to the U.S. Department of Commerce. Twelve years after the implementation of the North American Free Trade Agreement, American business people tap into high-speed, Wi-Fi networks in the lobbies of U.S.-style hotels in border towns such as Nogales.

But out in the remote deserts, the border sizzles with a different kind of activity. An all-time high of 1.17 million people, the great majority of them Mexican migrants, were arrested by U.S. agents for illegal border crossing between October 2004 and October 2005. A record 473 people died while trying to cross, according to the U.S. Border Patrol.

Uncounted hundreds of thousands more make it into the United States illegally and blend into a nationwide pool of surreptitious, cheap labor. They work on cleanup crews in Houston, construction sites in Virginia and onion fields in California, ever one step ahead of deportation.

At the same time, Mexico remains a major conduit for illegal drugs, turning border towns such as Nuevo Laredo and Juarez into virtual shooting galleries and further complicating relations with the United States.

In the 700-mile corridor between El Paso and Nuevo Laredo, U.S. drug enforcement agents seized 1,220 kilos of cocaine in 2005, up from 700 kilos four years earlier. The amount of methamphetamine confiscated between the Texas border cities of Laredo and Brownsville nearly tripled in those years, to 354 kilos, while marijuana seizures in the Phoenix border-crossing area more than doubled, to 285,000 kilos.

The torrent of drugs and migrants across the Arizona border -- an especially hazardous trip because of the dangers of dehydration in the vast desert -- has turned that state into a flash point for confrontation.

Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) issued an executive order this month allowing her to dispatch more National Guard troops to the border, even as she stated that "we are not at war with Mexico." The state legislature has tried to take steps of its own to marshal troops, and the volunteer Minuteman Civil Defense Corps launched citizen border patrols.

Outside Nogales, a city of 20,000 where the main roads funnel north to the Arizona border, the cycle of attempted crossings, arrests, deportations and more attempts revolves like a surreal game.

One recent afternoon, Abram Gutierrez, a 23-year-old migrant with chipped fingernails and a dirty sweat shirt, devoured a bowl of instant noodles outside the building housing Grupo Beta, a humanitarian aid program funded by the Mexican government. Hours before, he had been caught in Arizona and taken back to Nogales. Now he was plotting a second try -- and a third and fourth, if need be.

"We'll see who gets bored first," Gutierrez said, laughing. His friend, Lasaroa Damian, 27, said Bush and Fox should realize that migrants "are like cats" who find another way into a house after the front door is closed.

In the United States, debate over illegal immigration has become super-heated with election-year politics. The House of Representatives passed a bill in December that would make it a felony for a person to be in the United States illegally, and some members have proposed building a wall along the entire U.S.-Mexico border.

Now the divisive issue has moved to the Senate, where this week the Judiciary Committee approved a bill that would create a large temporary-worker program and allow an estimated 11 million illegal immigrants to apply for work visas after paying fines. But Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has proposed stiffening penalties for businesses that hire illegal immigrants, and many conservatives strongly oppose any amnesty.

The Fox government took out full-page ads last week in several major U.S. newspapers, including The Washington Post, urging an immigration pact that would allow assimilation of undocumented workers living in the United States. "We are your friends and neighbors. Let's work together," the ads read.

"Mexico and the U.S., I think, are becoming more aware that they are interdependent, and perhaps neither of the countries feels entirely comfortable with that interdependence," Geronimo Gutierrez, Mexico's undersecretary for North American affairs, said in an interview. "The relationship is at a fairly complex moment of catharsis."

But Fox, who cannot run for reelection and will leave office in December, has responded angrily to U.S. proposals to tighten the border. In a recent speech, he predicted that by 2010, the United States would "beg" Mexico for workers in vain, suggesting that by then the Mexican economy would generate enough jobs to sustain its 100 million-plus people.

"The rhetoric is more strident. The politics is driving this," Michael Shifter, director of the nonprofit Inter-American Dialogue, said by phone from Washington. "The U.S. and Mexico have a knack for bringing out the worst in each other."

It wasn't supposed to turn out this way. When Fox was elected in 2000, many here and in the United States predicted an era of what was dubbed "ranchero diplomacy," with the two leaders bonding at Bush's Texas ranch and Fox's hacienda. On Sept. 5, 2001, Bush declared that Mexico represented the most important international relationship for the United States.

Six days later, terrorists smashed planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, and the U.S. focus shifted to the Middle East and South Asia. Mexico later alienated the United States by not supporting the war in Iraq.

Mexicans weren't entirely surprised to see their relationship drop from the forefront of U.S. foreign policy. But Shifter said that "the question Mexicans raise is, did it have to completely disappear?"

A disappearance of another sort, beyond the vigilant gaze of border patrol agents, is exactly what Abram Gutierrez wants. For him, the other side of the border represents " el color verde " -- the color green, the color of money. Sitting in the hot Nogales sun last week, he vowed to make it across this time, whether by "holes or tunnels or the desert."

Francisco Loureiro, who runs a shelter in Nogales that has housed 600,000 migrants in 24 years, recognizes Gutierrez's determination. It is a quality, he said, that he has seen over and over in the men who pass through his shelter.

Loureiro says the only solution is a broad guest-worker program, something the Bush administration recently proposed. But he said his expectations are low for the upcoming meeting between the U.S. and Mexican leaders.

"Every time they talk, I have hope," he said. "But things are getting worse."

When the sun drops, Loureiro's little shelter will be full, as it is every night. When Gutierrez disappears, he knows, thousands more will follow.

Ahead Of Summit, Promising Ties Unfulfilled (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

CANCÚN, MEXICO - "Los Dos Amigos," everyone called them then. They slapped each other's backs, made jokes, gave each other custom-made cowboy boots, and toasted what was to be the beginning of a great friendship between neighbors.

But that was more than five years ago, when the newly inaugurated President Bush dropped in for a friendly visit to the newly inaugurated Mexican President Vicente Fox's family ranch.

Thursday marks the first time in a year that the two leaders have had a face-to-face meeting, and a different sort of atmosphere is expected as they sit down with newly elected Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Cancun for two days of talks.

Bush is in his second term, heading into the midterm elections. Fox, who is barred constitutionally from seeking a second term, will step down after July elections here. And yet the friendship that was to have characterized their administrations - and was expected to be the basis of major immigration initiatives - never really materialized.

Despite the expected cheerful appearances before the cameras, this summit is likely to be marked by an underlying tone of unfulfilled promise.

When Fox took office in 2000 one of his top foreign policy goals was to win sweeping US immigration reform in favor of millions of Mexicans working illegally across the border. Fox's then-Foreign Secretary Jorge Castañeda referred to the plan as "the whole enchilada."

In Bush - the Texan who understood border issues, made his first foreign trip as President to Mexico, and pledged to reform immigration - Fox felt he had a partner.

But then came 9/11 - to which Fox, Washington felt, responded late with expressions of solidarity - and soon after, Mexico's opposition at the UN Security Council to the war in Iraq. Relations tensed. And, as the US turned its focus toward the war on terror, it turned away from Latin America. Security fears meanwhile led to a tightening of all US borders, and Mexicans began worrying that the dreams of being welcomed into the US legally someday were only getting farther away.

While other issues are expected to be raised at the trilateral summit - among them trade, labor disputes (particularly between the US and Canada over lumber tariffs), and the rising influence of China in the region - the main topic on the table, and on everyone's mind, remains immigration.

The decision by the Senate Judiciary Committee Monday to adopt a comprehensive immigration bill, complete with a serious guest worker program that could eventually legalize some 2 million Mexican illegal immigrants has been received well in Mexico. It has given new hope that a solution may yet be found for many of the estimated 6 million illegal Mexican immigrants in the US today, and the approximately 400,000 that sneak through the border every year looking for jobs.

But the journey to realizing that bill is expected to be long, with battles that need to be fought both within the Senate as it takes up the proposals this week - and later as the Senate turns to squaring its final bill with a far more conservative immigration bill passed by the Congress last December. Bush, a vocal supporter of comprehensive reform together with a guest worker program, will nonetheless be likely to impress upon Fox that Mexico also has work to do before a final bill is passed and will ask for more commitment to fixing the root causes of illegal immigration. Mexico's recent adoption of a new immigration policy that calls for creation of economic and housing programs that would lure Mexican workers back home has been praised by Bush.

So too, have Mexican efforts to stem the rising violence at the border. Despite a sharp increase in drug trafficking along the border, US officials have stressed that cooperation between the US and Mexicans on the drug war front is actually improving.

Earlier this month, US Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Mexican Interior Minister Carlos Abascal met in Texas to announce a plan to jointly respond to border crime. The plan calls for immediate communication and response, "bilateral coordination of investigations" and "appropriate patrolling of the border region."

Still, years of disappointment with any real movement on immigration reform seem to have tempered Fox's expectations. "If the full Congress ultimately approves the [Senate Judiciary Committee's] proposal it would be good news, but of course now we just have the start," President Fox's chief spokesman, Rubén Aguilar, told a news conference Tuesday, downplaying the Senate committee's action. "It's headed in the right direction, but from Mexico's point of view it doesn't resolve the entire problem."

North American Leaders Get Together In Cancun (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, March 30, 2006

President Bush is in Mexico for his second annual joint meeting with the leaders of the United States' two closest neighbors, Mexico and Canada. Among the topics the leaders will discuss is a pact the three countries agreed to last year: the Security and Prosperity Partnership of North America. The partnership was designed to coordinate the three nations' business and border-policing strategies. The goal was to make sure that increased border security would not mean less trade, and that increased trade would not mean less security.

Where: Cancun, Mexico

DOJ_NMG_0024184

The meeting site rotates among the countries. This year it's Mexico's turn to be host. Last year, leaders met in Waco, Texas, near Bush's Crawford ranch. Next year's meeting will be in Canada.

When: Today-Friday

Bush arrived in Cancun on Wednesday night, but the formal work doesn't begin until today, when he meets separately with the other leaders. The three will have dinner tonight, then meet again Friday. They'll conduct a joint news conference before Bush leaves Friday afternoon to spend time at his ranch.

Who:

Mexican President Vicente Fox. Fox won office the same year Bush did, and the U.S. president initially made Mexico one of his top foreign policy priorities. Fox was the guest of honor at Bush's first state dinner, a week before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The relationship cooled after the attacks as Bush turned his attention to the war on terrorism. Fox protested U.S. immigration policy and opposed the Iraq war. The two get along better these days as Bush tries to push a temporary guest-worker program through Congress that would clear the way for thousands of Mexican workers to come to, or stay in, the USA. Mexican law limits Fox to one term, and he leaves office later this year.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Harper won election just this year, replacing Paul Martin of the Liberal Party, who attended last year's meeting. Harper would seem to be right up Bush's alley: a founder of the new Conservative Party of Canada and a westerner with family ties to the oil industry. Harper's opponents have accused him of being too much like the U.S. president, who is controversial in Canada. Harper may not want to give his critics any more ammunition, especially because the Conservatives lack a majority in the Canadian Parliament. Harper has said one of his major goals is to make progress on a bitter dispute over Canadian lumber exports. The United States imposes tariffs on Canadian lumber, alleging that Canada unfairly subsidizes the industry; Canada disagrees, as does a special NAFTA panel. Bush told the Canadian network CTV that he hopes to resolve the dispute before he leaves office.

What to expect:

Mexico. Bush and Fox may be as close as they've ever been on immigration with Bush's support of the temporary guest-worker program. It's unclear whether Bush's position will prevail in the current congressional struggle over an immigration bill; many of Bush's fellow Republicans oppose any kind of guest-worker program. The question for Fox is how — and whether — to address this issue; comments from a foreign leader can cause a backlash when Congress is embroiled in debate. Bush and Fox would like to go out on a high note.

Canada. This is a feeling-out time for Bush and the new Canadian leader. In addition to the lumber dispute, the two could discuss differences over Canada's reluctance to join the U.S. missile-defense shield and whether cross-border travelers must carry passports. This might not be a time for major agreements; Chris Sands, a Canada expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, says Harper wants to raise his approval rating and might soon call a "snap election" to seek a parliamentary majority.

Leaders Take On US-Canada Lumber Dispute (CSM)

By Josie Newman

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

TORONTO - As President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper meet at the NAFTA summit that starts Thursday in Cancún, Mexico, there are signs that the two leaders may be ready to compromise in a contentious 20-year lumber dispute.

"Both sides will need to see some sign from the other that the work won't be in vain. Softwood lumber has become an irritant that is really contaminating the relationship and it's time, if the conditions are right, to talk about a solution," said Canadian Trade Minister David Emerson after preliminary trade meetings last Friday.

At heart of the disagreement between America and its No. 1 trading partner is $5.2 billion Canadian ($4.4 billion) in US duties that Canada says should never have been levied. It demands they be refunded.

The US government contends that the taxes compensate for what amounts to government subsidies. Since provincial governments own most Canadian forests, it says, the lumber can be sold at a price that undercuts American lumber producers, whose product comes mainly from privately owned forests. Canada, supported by a NAFTA ruling, contends that its industry is not subsidized and thus the countervailing duties should be lifted.

The lumber trade is critical to both countries. Approximately $10 billion Canadian ($8.5 billion) worth of Canadian softwood lumber, close to 70 percent of Canada's lumber production, is sold to the US annually. Those imports supplement US domestic industry, which can supply only 50 to 60 percent of its own needs.

Barry Cullen, executive director of the US Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports, says his organization would like to see a long-term lumber agreement between Canada and the US. "In the past, Canada's provincial governments couldn't come to an agreement amongst themselves on this issue, but we stand in unity on ours. In the past couple of years, we've put forward several positions and gotten no response from Canada."

But the steady warming of relations between the two neighbors since Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper was elected in January may facilitate resolution of the lumber dispute.

In his first interview with Canadian reporters since he took office five years ago, President Bush said this week that he'd like to resolve the softwood lumber issue and wants his government to work hard to bring it to a conclusion.

On March 17, a NAFTA panel ruling dropped the countervailing duties to less than one per cent from 8.7 percent.

"This is a huge victory for Canada," John Allan, president of the British Columbia Lumber Trade Association, told reporters in a conference call after the announcement. "I would also note the panel was unanimous in its decision - three Americans, two Canadians." The US has until April 27 to appeal the decision.

Last November, the panel called for the US Commerce Dept. to drop all countervailing duties - then at 16 percent. But a last-minute US appeal resulted in an 8.7 percent duty.

Daniel Ikenson, a trade-policy analyst with the Cato Institute's Center for Trade Policy Studies in Washington, says one reason the lumber dispute has dragged on is the Byrd Amendment, which ensured that duties imposed on Canadian lumber were given to petitioning US lumber producers instead of to the US Treasury. The trade amendment was repealed last December after the World Trade Organization declared it illegal, but the repeal won't take effect until Oct. 1, 2007.

Senate GOP Debates If Bill Equals Amnesty (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, March 30, 2006

The Senate opened debate on an election-year immigration bill Wednesday, and leading Republicans swiftly clashed over whether the legislation would amount to amnesty for millions of illegal residents in the United States.

The legislation "goes too far in granting illegal immigrants with what most Americans will see as amnesty," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, the first to speak on the bill. "I disagree with this approach ... because granting amnesty now will only encourage further and further disrespect for the law."

Moments later, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, bluntly rebutted his fellow Republican. "I want to disagree with him head on. It is not amnesty," he said. Specter said illegal residents would have to be current on their taxes, undergo background checks and clear other obstacles before gaining a place on a "citizenship track."

The disagreement underscored not only the divisions within the Senate, but the extent to which the fate of 11 million illegal immigrants has come to dominate the issue. Adding a fresh layer of political complexity, Hispanics make up a fast-growing segment of the electorate and have demonstrated by the hundreds of thousands in recent days in opposition to punitive legislation.

In general, the bill under consideration in the Senate is designed to strengthen enforcement of U.S. borders, regulate the flow into the country of so-called guest workers and determine the legal future of the illegal population scattered across all 50 states.

The House has passed legislation limited to border enforcement. Republican leaders have signaled in recent days they are receptive to an expanded measure, and immigration has taken on added importance for the GOP in the run-up to midterm elections.

"We are not going to discount anything right now," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said several hours before the Senate debate opened. "Our first priority is to protect the borders. We also know there is a need in some sectors of this economy for a guest worker program," added the Illinois Republican.

President Bush has urged Congress to approve legislation that strengthens border security and contains enforcement at the workplace and a temporary guest worker program.

"There are people doing jobs Americans will not do," Bush told reporters Wednesday. "Many people who have come into our country are helping our economy grow. That's just a fact of life."

Specter shepherded legislation through the Judiciary Committee on Monday on a vote of 12-6. The outcome was unusual in the Republican-controlled Senate since there were more GOP committee members against the measure than voting in favor.

The Pennsylvania Republican said at the time he would continue to seek agreement on changes, and he repeated his remarks on the Senate floor. "If there is a better way to bring these 11 million people forward so that we can identify them, we are open to any suggestions which anyone may have," he said.

Frist and Specter were not the only lawmakers to address the issue of amnesty, an emotionally charged label that political candidates all hope to avoid.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, sided with the panel's chairman. "Opponents of a fair, comprehensive approach are quick to claim that anything but the most punitive provisions are amnesty. They are wrong," he said.

But Sen. Jeff Sessions (news, bio, voting record), R-Alabama, was quick to counter. "The truth is this bill is amnesty," he said, adding that if others insist on saying otherwise, "we'll keep talking about it every day this week."

The legislation that cleared committee would double the Border Patrol and allow for a virtual wall of unmanned vehicles, cameras and sensors to monitor the U.S.-Mexico border. It also calls for detention facilities for an additional 10,000 immigrants who may face deportation.

The committee voted down proposed criminal penalties on immigrants found to be in the country illegally.

The bill would establish a temporary program for up to 1.5 million farm workers who are in the country illegally, giving them an opportunity to achieve legal status.

Separately, it creates a new guest worker program for would-be immigrants, allowing them to enter the country under a three-year visa, renewable for another three years, then apply for legal permanent residence without leaving the United States. The program would initially be open to 400,000 individuals a year, a figure to be adjusted annually based on the labor market.

Hastert Hints At Compromise On Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said Wednesday that he and other House Republicans recognized the need for a guest-worker program, opening the door to a possible compromise with the Senate on fiercely debated immigration legislation.

"We're going to look at all alternatives," Mr. Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said at a news conference. "We're not going to discount anything right now. Our first priority is to protect the border. And we also know there is a need in some sections of the economy for a guest-worker program."

Many House Republicans and conservatives in the Senate still oppose any legislation that would grant citizenship to illegal immigrants, like the bill passed by the Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday. And as the Senate began its debate on immigration on Wednesday, Republicans were deeply divided over the fate of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States.

Mr. Hastert's comments were the first public hint of an olive branch.

Senator Arlen Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said he was heartened by the remarks. He said they were a significant shift for the House, which defied President Bush's call for a temporary-worker program and passed a border security bill in December that would criminalize illegal immigrants.

Since then, Mr. Bush and business groups have urged Republicans to support a temporary-worker program to help fulfill the economy's needs for labor.

"I'm very pleased that Speaker Hastert has demonstrated flexibility on that issue," Mr. Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said, adding that he was prepared to support a compromise that would not provide a path to citizenship for all illegal immigrants in an effort "to present an even more balanced approach."

On Monday, before his committee voted, Mr. Specter proposed a compromise that would require illegal immigrants to return home briefly after spending six more years in this country. They could then participate in a temporary-worker program or move toward citizenship if they are highly skilled, hold supervisory positions or have a close relative who is a citizen or permanent resident.

Mr. Specter and his committee ultimately voted for the legislation that would grant all illegal immigrants the possibility of citizenship.

Senators Debate Fate Of Illegals (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Usa Today

USA Today, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate opened debate on immigration Wednesday as President Bush delivered an impassioned plea for civility and a bill that will “uphold the decency of America.”

“I think a system which forces people underground and into the shadows of our society, which causes people to have to sneak across our border and risk their life, is a system that needs to be changed,” Bush told a Washington audience.

Senators acknowledged they are heading into emotional territory. “The debate, when you boil it down to its essence, is about the American dream,” said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

A key question facing the lawmakers: What to do with the as many as 12 million people now living in the country illegally — a figure greater than the population of Ohio?

Republicans are divided on the issue. The Republican-controlled House of Representatives in December ignored Bush's call for a plan that includes expanded opportunities for foreigners to work here legally and an adjustment for those living here illegally. The House bill focused on tightening the nation's borders and cracking down on illegal immigrants and their employers.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., signaled a willingness to negotiate.

“We're not going to discount anything right now,” he said. “There is a need in some sectors of the economy for a guest-worker program.”

Some Republican conservatives say a Senate Judiciary Committee bill that would give a chance at citizenship to those now working in the country illegally amounts to rewarding lawbreakers. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., is hosting a “Just Say No to Amnesty” rally today.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said his panel's bill exacts a stiff price by insisting that illegal immigrants pay fines, pass background checks, pay back taxes and wait 11 years before becoming citizens.

The bill is “smart and tough,” said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vermont. “This is not an amnesty bill.”

Frist Retreats From 'Amnesty' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said yesterday that the Senate likely will pass a version of immigration reform that includes more than the border-security overhaul he has proposed.

"It's critical that the Senate address comprehensive immigration legislation including both border security and economic provisions," he said in a reference to a guest-worker program that President Bush has called for, but which conservatives and House Republicans adamantly oppose until border security has been enhanced and current immigration laws have been enforced.

"The enforcement provisions included in both my bill and the Judiciary Committee's bill are a step in that process," he said in a prepared statement before officially beginning floor debate on the explosive issue. "I fully expect that the final bill will be a comprehensive approach to border security and immigration reform."

But Mr. Frist -- who is widely expected to run for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- later distanced himself from the bill finished this week by the Senate Judiciary Committee. That proposal would fine illegals but let them remain in the U.S. while they apply for full citizenship.

That bill "goes too far in granting illegal immigrants with what most Americans will see as amnesty," he said on the Senate floor. "I disagree with this approach not just as a matter of principle but because granting amnesty now will only encourage future and further disrespect for the law. It will undermine our efforts to secure our homeland."

Previously, Mr. Frist has maintained that the Senate would take up a bill dealing only with border security but left open the possibility that a guest-worker program of some sort might get added later through amendments. His statements yesterday were the clearest yet about what he expects the Senate to ultimately produce.

Whatever the Senate produces must then be hammered out with House Republicans, who last year approved a border-security bill that has no guest-worker provisions and doesn't deal with the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegals already in the country.

While the Senate is technically debating Mr. Frist's border-security-only bill, Republican leaders say that will be swapped out with the committee's bill that includes a guest-worker program and angers conservatives for containing provisions they call "amnesty."

Many senators still have many questions about the committee's bill, however, since it still hasn't been committed to paper. The Judiciary Committee sped through the bill so quickly Monday that the massive legislation was largely pieced together verbally.

"There will be passionate arguments, that is certainly true," Committee Chairman Arlen Specter said yesterday. "Emotionalism runs very high on these issues. Some say that we are a nation defined by the rule of law and that has been flagrantly violated by 11 million people who have come to this country without conforming to United States law. And at the same time, we pride ourselves on being a compassionate nation."

One thing everyone seemed to agree upon was that the immigration system is broken.

"We have ignored the tough conditions endured by the undocumented, and the harmful ripple effects undocumented employment has on some U.S. workers," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0024188

Past fixes by Congress, he said, were "well-intentioned," but ended -- as many conservatives say of today's legislation -- predictably. "By ending legal migration, but allowing employers to bid for immigrant labor, Congress all but guaranteed a generation of undocumented immigrants would emerge," Mr. Kennedy said.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, the Alabama Republican who voted against the proposal in the Judiciary Committee, said the Senate was at a historic crossroads to fix once and for all the country's immigration system.

"The system as it operates today makes a mockery of law and we all know that," he said. "It rewards bad behavior. It places bureaucratic hurdles and delays in front of those who want to do the right thing about coming here."

There were poignant moments, too, as yesterday's debate was an opportunity for senators to discuss their own roots as immigrants.

"My own family is exhibit A," said Mr. Specter, a Republican from Pennsylvania. "My father came to this country in 1911 when he was 18 because the czar wanted to send him to Siberia. He preferred Pennsylvania, so he came to the United States."

Senate Tries To Reconcile Immigration Approaches (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senators took on the task of overhauling the nation's immigration laws Wednesday, a two-tiered process in which they publicly considered two competing bills while working behind the scenes to find common ground.

Despite tensions, particularly within the Republican Party, some senators said they were optimistic about finding consensus, and the House leadership indicated that agreement was possible between that chamber's already-passed bill and whatever might emerge from the Senate.

Still, the emotional question of how to deal with the estimated 12 million people illegally in the United States remains the point on which all efforts pivot.

The Senate's debate will focus on two bills, an enforcement-only measure from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and a bill approved Monday by the Senate Judiciary Committee that includes enforcement, provisions for a guest-worker program, and a way for those here illegally to work toward citizenship.

Opponents of the committee bill contend that it offers amnesty to individuals who broke the law.

"The committee bill goes too far in granting what most Americans will see as amnesty," said Frist, whose enforcement-only bill is the first to be debated.

"It is not an amnesty," countered Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). In amnesty, "lawbreakers do not have to pay for their transgressions," he said, outlining the requirements that undocumented immigrants would have to meet to attain citizenship.

Senators began debating the issue shortly after President Bush threw his weight behind a plan that would allow those now here illegally, along with new guest workers, to work toward citizenship.

In the House, which produced a tough enforcement-only bill in December, leaders signaled for the first time that they might be able to find common ground with the Senate if it passed a guest-worker program. A House-Senate conference committee would need to agree on compromise legislation before an immigration bill could go to the president to be signed into law.

"We're not going to discount anything," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

An influential, largely Republican caucus in the House opposes any deviation from a security-only approach, but Hastert's comments signaled that the House Republican opinion on immigration was not monolithic.

"Our first priority is to protect the border. And we also know there is a need in some sectors of the economy for a guest-worker program. But we want to see what the Senate comes forward with, and we will go through the process," Hastert said.

Debate on the Senate Judiciary Committee bill begins today and is expected to end next week, before the Senate leaves on recess.

On the enforcement front, that bill would add fences along the Arizona border, double the number of border agents and criminalize tunnel-building.

It also sets forth a path to citizenship for people now here illegally. They would have to work for six years, pay fines and back taxes, and learn English and civics before they could apply for a green card indicating legal permanent resident status. Five years after gaining that status, they could seek citizenship.

But these workers would receive no special consideration: Their green card applications would be processed after those from people outside the United States.

The bill would also allow up to 400,000 people a year to enter the country to work for up to six years. Once they had worked for four years, they too could start working toward citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0024189

A competing proposal by Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) and Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) would not allow guest workers to gain citizenship and would require those now here illegally to return to their home countries.

On Wednesday, Bush spoke up for the first time in favor of a guest-worker program that leads to citizenship.

"I believe that we ought to say to somebody doing a job an American won't do, 'Here is a tamper-proof identity card that will enable you to be here for a period of time,' " Bush told a meeting of Freedom House, an independent organization that supports the expansion of democracy. "And if that person wants to become a citizen of the United States, because we're a nation of law, they get at the end of the line, not the beginning of the line."

Bush, who arrived in Cancun, Mexico, on Wednesday, is to meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox today.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a Judiciary Committee member who favors a guest-worker program that leads to citizenship, said Bush was "one of the keys" to brokering a compromise. "He can validate a comprehensive approach" that includes enforcing immigration laws as well as ensuring a labor supply, Graham said.

He was among several senators optimistic about the prospects for compromise. "I think it's possible to get a consensus," he said.

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who came to the United States from Cuba as a teenager, also sounded a hopeful note. "People are talking — they're not necessarily agreeing, but I can see a way we can get to a compromise," he said, without offering details.

Martinez, the Senate's only immigrant, also backs a guest-worker program.

Frist said he expected several amendments to the Judiciary Committee bill to "tighten" its "amnesty" provisions, indicating he favored a result similar to the Kyl-Cornyn model.

Specter said he was still trying to find a compromise. "It's not possible to describe what that compromise will look like; things are too fluid," he said, predicting stormy debate in the days ahead.

"Emotionalism runs very high on these issues," he said.

Frist urged his colleagues to keep their debate civil.

Immigration Reform A Two-edged Sword For GOP (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill see immigration reform as an opportunity to shake the party's image as hostile to minorities and immigrants, and other Republicans warn that embracing what many call "amnesty" will tear the party apart.

"They are absolutely up in arms," said Bobby Eberle, who runs the conservative Web site GOPUSA.com that reaches 600,000 subscribers. "They think that's a total cave-in, basically rewarding illegal behavior."

Sen. Jim DeMint, a conservative Republican from South Carolina, said yesterday he constantly hears concerns about illegal immigration from constituents.

The great majority want tighter border security, and some business owners want "a guest-worker plan that works," he said. "But nobody is calling to say they want citizenship for illegals. That's not something we hear too much."

Republicans, he said, are torn between doing what their constituents want and burnishing their image with minorities and immigrants.

"Republicans do not want to be seen as anti-immigrant -- and we're not -- but they think if we draw the line on illegal immigration and enforce our laws, Democrats will demagogue us," Mr. DeMint said.

It isn't clear how many Republicans in the Senate support the proposal drafted this week by the Senate Judiciary Committee, but already four have cast votes in support. Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsay Graham of South Carolina and Sam Brownback of Kansas all voted Monday for the proposal in the committee.

Sen. Elizabeth Dole, North Carolina Republican and chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, is charged with getting Republican candidates re-elected this fall and worries about the bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"It's extremely important that we pass a good bill that secures our borders, but I'm opposed to legislation that has amnesty," she said yesterday. "I personally think that's wrong, and I also think we'll pay a political price for it."

Polls show that more than 80 percent of Americans view immigration as a "serious" problem, and more than 60 percent of Americans oppose making it easier for illegals to become citizens. Those percentages are even higher among Republicans.

Though House Republican leaders have thus far declined to rule out the Senate Judiciary Committee's proposal, they continue to say the border security-only bill they passed last year is the way to go.

"The American people see it as a clear imperative," said House Republican ConferenceChairman Deborah Pryce of Ohio. "They're demanding that action be taken, and I don't think we have any choice but to get a bill to the president's desk."

DOJ_NMG_0024190

Republicans should be careful what they send to the president, Mr. Eberle said.

"The administration and the Senate -- none of these Republican leadership groups have been able to sell to conservatives that this guest-worker program isn't amnesty," he said. Conservatives "are definitely nervous about the direction they think this is going."

Mr. DeMint argued that doing nothing would be bad, as well.

"It hurts Republicans a lot worse than Democrats if we don't do something this year," he said.

G.O.P. Risking Hispanic Votes On Immigration (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — The battle among Republicans over immigration policy and border security is threatening to undercut a decade-long effort by President Bush and his party to court Hispanic voters, just as both parties are gearing up for the 2006 elections.

"I believe the Republican Party has hurt itself already," said the Rev. Luis Cortes, a Philadelphia pastor close to President Bush and the leader of a national organization of Hispanic Protestant clergy members, saying he delivered that message to the president last week in a meeting at the White House.

To underscore the contested allegiance of Hispanic voters, Mr. Cortes said, he also took a delegation of Hispanic ministers to meet with the leaders of both parties last week, including what he called a productive discussion with Howard Dean, the Democratic chairman.

The immigration and security debate, which has sparked huge demonstrations in recent days by Hispanic residents of cities around the country, comes at a crucial moment for both parties.

Over the last three national elections, persistent appeals by Mr. Bush and other Republican leaders have helped double their party's share of the Hispanic vote, to more than 40 percent in 2004 from about 20 percent in 1996. As a result, Democrats can no longer rely on the country's 42 million Hispanic residents as a natural part of their base.

In a lunch meeting of Senate Republicans this week, Senator Mel Martinez of Florida, the only Hispanic Republican in the Senate, gave his colleagues a stern warning. "This is the first issue that, in my mind, has absolutely galvanized the Latino community in America like no other," Mr. Martinez said he told them.

The anger among Hispanics has continued even as the Senate Judiciary Committee proposed a bill this week that would allow illegal immigrants a way to become citizens. The backlash was aggravated, Mr. Martinez said in an interview, by a Republican plan to crack down on illegal immigrants that the House approved last year.

The outcome remains to be seen. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said on Wednesday that he recognized the need for a guest-worker program, opening the door to a possible compromise on fiercely debated immigration legislation.

Democrats see an opportunity to "show Hispanics who their real friends are," as Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, put it.

But the issue is a delicate matter for Democrats as well. Polls show large majorities of the public both support tighter borders as a matter of national security, and oppose amnesty for illegal immigrants. Many working-class Democrats resent what they see as a continuing influx of cheap labor.

The stakes are enormous because Hispanics now account for one of every eight United States residents, and for about half the recent growth in the country's population. Although Hispanics cast just 6 percent of the votes in the 2004 elections, birth rates promise an imminent explosion in the number of eligible voters.

"There is a big demographic wave of Hispanic kids who are native born who will be turning 18 in even greater numbers over the next three, four and five election cycles," Roberto Suro, director of the nonpartisan Pew Hispanic Center, said.

Nowhere is the immigration debate more heated than Arizona, where about 28 percent of the population is Hispanic and where Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican sponsor of an immigration bill, faces what could be a difficult race for re-election. Both Mr. Kyl and his Democratic challenger, Jim Pederson, have hired Hispanics or Hispanic-dominated firms to manage their campaigns.

A mostly Hispanic crowd of about 20,000 gathered outside Mr. Kyl's office last weekend to protest criminal penalties against illegal immigrants that were in the House Republican bill, even though Mr. Kyl's proposal does not include the measure.

Mario E. Diaz, the campaign manager for Mr. Pederson, faulted Mr. Kyl's proposal, which would require illegal immigrants or future temporary workers to return to their countries before becoming eligible for legal status in the United States.

"Speaking the language that Kyl does, which is round them up and deport them, is offensive and disgusting to the Latino community," Mr. Diaz said.

Mr. Kyl, for his part, accused Democrats of race-baiting by painting all Republicans as anti-Hispanic, a practice he said most Hispanics resent. But the senator also acknowledged some fears that the immigration debate could repel Hispanic voters.

He added, "I would hope that some of our colleagues who don't have much of a Hispanic population in their states would at least defer to those of us who do."

Pollsters from each party say Hispanics, like other groups, typically rank immigration lower in importance than other issues, especially education. But they respond strongly when they believe the rhetoric surrounding the debate demonizes immigrants or Hispanics, as they did when Gov. Pete Wilson of California, a Republican, backed a 1994 initiative to exclude illegal immigrants from public schools and services.

Many analysts say the backlash from Hispanics wrecked the California Republican party for a decade.

As governor of Texas, Mr. Bush opposed such measures, and pushed Republicans to woo Hispanics.

Last week, Sergio Bendixen, a pollster for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, released a rare multilingual poll in which 76 percent of legal Latin American immigrants said they believed anti-immigrant sentiment was on the rise. A majority of immigrants said they believed the immigration debate was unfair and misinformed.

But Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, dismissed such concerns. Mr. Mehlman said the party's image was defined by President Bush, who supports a temporary-worker program and has repeatedly urged Republicans to avoid inflammatory rhetoric.

"In an emotional debate like this," Mr. Mehlman said, "people need to lower their energy and remember that ultimately the goal is something that is consistent with being a nation of laws and a nation of immigrants."

Danny Diaz, a spokesman for the Republican Party, said it had pushed ahead on recruitment of Hispanic candidates and voters. He noted that Mr. Mehlman had appeared frequently at events with Hispanic groups, hitting classic Republican themes about lower taxes and traditional values. A particular focus has been Hispanic churchgoers and pastors like Mr. Cortes, who receives money from Mr. Bush's religion-based social services initiative.

Democrats say that Mr. Bush's success with Hispanics has not gone unnoticed. Democratic leaders in Congress have expanded their Spanish-language communications, and after 2004 the Democratic Party vowed to stop relying on payments to Hispanic groups and organizations to help turn out Hispanic voters.

"How can you spend your money on get-out-the-vote when you are beginning to lose your market share?" Mr. Bendixen said. "But Democrats had no experience in campaigning for the hearts and minds of Hispanic voters. They treated them like black voters who they just needed to get out to the polls."

Still, both sides say it is the tenor and ultimate outcome of the immigration debate that may give the Democrats their best opportunity to attract Hispanic voters.

Senator Martinez, a Cuban immigrant who delivered part of a Senate speech in Spanish a few months ago, alluded to the nervousness among Hispanics when he was asked whether he would do the same again in the debate on immigration. "I am about to be sent back as it is," he said, joking. "I better be careful."

Immigrants, Finding Their Voice (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

By turning out close to a million people in cities from Los Angeles to Washington for demonstrations against punitive immigration laws, the Hispanic community has delivered a timely reminder of the often-forgotten voice in this national debate.

For too long, others with shaky claims to authenticity have attempted to speak on behalf of the immigrants who are most affected by the laws and regulations being debated in Congress.

It was not until this month that the first substantial poll of immigrants was taken. Its findings give the lie to one of the most frequent claims from those who want to "crack down" on illegal immigration: the assertion that undocumented workers are resented by those who have come to this country legally.

This week Sergio Bendixen, a respected professional pollster, briefed me on the survey his firm had just completed of 800 legal immigrants, from 43 different countries, living in 47 states -- a cross section carefully designed to mirror the makeup of the 26 million legal immigrants the Census counts. To ensure accuracy, Bendixen arranged to interview subjects in their native languages whenever they requested.

When he probed these legal immigrants for their attitude toward the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants living in the United States, Bendixen asked two key questions. By a margin of 81 percent to 11 percent, the legal immigrants said they think the illegals are taking jobs that legal residents and citizens do not want to do, rather than taking jobs away from them.

And 73 percent of them said the illegals help the economy by providing low-cost labor, while only 17 percent said they hurt the economy by driving down wages -- a favorite contention of those who want to restrict immigration.

Backers of the tough House-passed bill to make it a crime to illegally enter the country contend that a guest worker program of the kind the Senate Judiciary Committee included in its bill this week would allow illegals to "cut into line" ahead of those who are waiting to become citizens legally.

But Bendixen said the interviews found that "the resentment isn't there." He said that one woman, an accountant, who gained her citizenship by following the rules, explained, "I came first-class. The illegals are coming coach -- they do jobs I didn't have to do, and they live outside the law."

"She didn't feel that she was in competition with them," Bendixen said. "She felt sympathy for them."

That mind-set explains the legal immigrants' hostility to the main provisions of the House bill -- and also the emotion that pulled so many thousands of immigrants into the streets for demonstrations during the past week.

Majorities of about 70 percent or more oppose all these steps: arresting illegal immigrants and charging them with a felony; deporting all illegal immigrants; imposing stiff penalties on employers who hire illegals or groups that help them; or building a wall between the United States and Mexico to discourage illegal immigration.

On the other hand, two-thirds of the legal immigrants favor President Bush's proposal to provide work permits for temporary employment, with a proviso that the recipient return to his or her home country. And even more -- eight out of 10 -- favor the kind of legislation that came out of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which would open a path to eventual citizenship for illegals who remain in this country for an extended period, learn English, pay fines and have no criminal record.

That legislation was backed by all the committee Democrats but only a minority of its Republicans. But Bendixen's survey, completed before the committee vote, found skepticism among the legal immigrants about the stance of both parties on immigration issues. Only 22 percent said the Republican Party was doing a good job on immigration issues; for Democrats, the approval score was 38 percent, just six points higher than the rating for Bush on immigration.

Bendixen said that suggested to him that "the jury is out" as the current debate unfolds.

Disturbingly, the survey found that two-thirds of the legal immigrants believe that anti-immigrant sentiment is growing in the United States, and more than half said it has affected them and their families personally. Racism against Latino and Asian immigrants is blamed by more than six out of 10 for fueling this development.

The demonstrations are a reminder of the risks in policy that feeds such fears.

Immigration Exposes Rifts For Evangelicals (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Kit Danley says she has waited for months for evangelical Christians to join together on the illegal immigration issue. An evangelical Christian herself, she's watched as Catholic, Episcopalian, Methodist and Jewish clergy converged on Capitol Hill, lobbying legislators to grant illegal residents permanent status. Ms. Danley, president of Neighborhood Ministries, an evangelical mission to the poor in Phoenix, says she would like to see a united front for liberal reform.

But that is unlikely to happen anytime soon. Major evangelical groups have been more muted on immigration than other Christian organizations. In fact, the dispute is exposing rifts in the evangelical community. Evangelicals who favor a tough stance toward illegal immigrants also want their leaders to speak out on the issue. "Our side is so afraid of sounding unmerciful," says Cathie Adams, a member of a nondenominational Dallas Bible church. "It's like it's a nonissue in the church. . . It's very frustrating."

The majority of influential Christian conservatives have either delayed taking a stand, such as the National Association of Evangelicals, or have no position, such as the Southern Baptist Convention, the National Black Evangelical Association, James Dobson's Focus on the Family and Concerned Women for America.

When united, the evangelical movement has had considerable success influencing U.S. politics in recent years, helping to elect President Bush, working to scuttle Harriet Miers as a Supreme Court nominee, and influencing stricter laws on abortion. But as evangelicals attract more adherents, it will be increasingly difficult for the groups to reach consensus on many issues.

"We will see a larger number of arguments, disputes and debates among evangelicals," says John C. Green, a political scientist and senior fellow with the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "That could potentially lead to divisions in the voting booth."

Despite their past unity on other issues, some evangelicals are divided over how to treat people who are breaking the law and worried they will be tainted as racist if they advocate penalties. "When someone speaks out, they're portrayed as being against immigration," says Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a conservative Christian group. "They're being more cautious, afraid of being misconstrued."

Several board members of the National Association of Evangelicals, the largest group in the movement, say they need time to study the issue and to gauge what their congregations want. "If we don't speak with a true Biblical voice, we will alienate millions of people," says the Rev. Richard Cizik, the group's vice-president.

Others say issues involving right-to-life are central to their mission, not immigration. Focus, known for Mr. Dobson's popular radio show, has decided that immigration isn't "something that defines an evangelical," spokesman Stuart Shepard says.

The issue is critical for some parts of the evangelical movement. The National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference, an evangelical group which claims to speak for millions of Latinos, supports President Bush's call -- and a Senate bill -- for a guest-worker program. The bill would post patrols along the Mexican border and create a plan to allow workers into the country and grant them credits toward obtaining visas if they paid taxes and learned English. The Senate has been debating the bill this week.

But the Hispanic group has received little support from the National Association of Evangelicals. The Christian Coalition opposes the bill, saying the plan would reward lawbreakers.

At the same time, the Hispanic Conference group opposes a House bill that would return illegals to their native lands and jail those who aid illegal immigrants. One of the House bill's sponsors is Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican and an evangelical Presbyterian. Latinos have been backed by Sojourners, a Christian antipoverty group, and World Relief, a humanitarian organization, while the Christian Coalition supports the House bill.

Evangelical pastors around the country can't agree with some of the basic tenets of liberal treatment for immigrants. Some evangelicals say their beliefs in law-and-order issues mean they favor returning nonresidents to their own countries and that employers should be fined for hiring them. "To me the issue is, do we support lawlessness?" says Leo Godzich, associate pastor of Phoenix First Assembly of God.

Other evangelical Christians say the Bible instructs them to help strangers. Gilberto Velez, pastor of Christian Church of Mercy in the border town of Laredo, Texas, figures about 20% of his flock of 2,000 are in the country illegally. "They are coming to do jobs Americans won't do," he says. "We believe they have the right not to be illegal anymore."

Immigration is only the latest issue that has split evangelicals -- usually defined as Christians who believe in the literal word of the Bible, see Jesus as their personal savior, and also try to recruit others to their faith. Evangelicals were divided over supporting the Iraq war. More recently, 86 leaders of the movement broke ranks with the more-conservative mainstream groups and took out ads calling on Congress and businesses to lower greenhouse-gas emissions. That effort was notable, partly because it includes Rick Warren, the charismatic pastor and bestselling author of "The Purpose Driven Life."

Samuel Rodriguez Jr., president of the Hispanic Conference group, believes "if the Republican party had received a unified message from their evangelical base," the party would have come together behind immigration reform, says the Sacramento, Calif., pastor.

Evangelicals turned out for President Bush in 2000 and even more so in 2004, when 63% of Latino Protestants supported his re-election, according to the Pew Forum. Pew estimates that 42 million to 52 million white Americans, and roughly six million Latino adults, belong to an evangelical church.

Mr. Rodriguez says a candidate's stance on immigration could sway more Latino voters than traditional conservative causes. White evangelicals and Hispanics agree on a number of issues, including abortion and gay marriage, but "those sorts of coalitions are going to be a lot more difficult to come by," he says.

Immigrants To Be Proud Of (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

Everybody says the Republicans are split on immigration. The law-and-order types want to close the border. The free-market types want plentiful labor. But today I want to talk to the social conservatives, because it's you folks who are really going to swing this debate.

I'd like to get you to believe what Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas believes: that a balanced immigration bill is consistent with conservative values. I'd like to try to persuade the evangelical leaders in the tall grass to stop hiding on this issue.

My first argument is that the exclusionists are wrong when they say the current wave of immigration is tearing our social fabric. The facts show that the recent rise in immigration hasn't been accompanied by social breakdown, but by social repair. As immigration has surged, violent crime has fallen by 57 percent. Teen pregnancies and abortion rates have declined by a third. Teenagers are having fewer sexual partners and losing their virginity later. Teen suicide rates have dropped. The divorce rate for young people is on the way down.

Over the past decade we've seen the beginnings of a moral revival, and some of the most important work has been done by Catholic and evangelical immigrant churches, by faith-based organizations like the Rev. Luis Cortés's Nueva Esperanza, by

Hispanic mothers and fathers monitoring their kids. The anti-immigration crowd says this country is under assault. But if that's so, we're under assault by people who love their children.

My second argument is that the immigrants themselves are like a booster shot of traditional morality injected into the body politic. Immigrants work hard. They build community groups. They have traditional ideas about family structure, and they work heroically to make them a reality.

This is evident in everything from divorce rates (which are low, given immigrants' socioeconomic status) to their fertility rates (which are high) and even the way they shop.

Hispanics and Hispanic immigrants have less money than average Americans, but they spend what they have on their families, usually in wholesome ways. According to Simmons Research, Hispanics are 57 percent more likely than average Americans to have purchased children's furniture in the past year. Mexican-Americans spend 93 percent more on children's music.

According to the government's Consumer Expenditure Survey, Hispanics spend more on gifts, on average, than other Americans. They're more likely to support their parents financially. They're more likely to have big family dinners at home.

This isn't alien behavior. It's admirable behavior, the antidote to the excessive individualism that social conservatives decry.

My third argument is that good values lead to success, and that immigrants' long-term contributions more than compensate for the short-term strains they cause. There's no use denying the strains immigration imposes on schools, hospitals and wage levels in some markets (but economists are sharply divided on this).

So over the long haul, today's immigrants succeed. By the second generation, most immigrant families are middle class and paying taxes that more than make up for the costs of the first generation. By the third generation, 90 percent speak English fluently and 50 percent marry non-Latinos.

My fourth argument is that government should be at least as virtuous as the immigrants themselves. Right now (as under Bill Frist's legislation), government pushes immigrants into a chaotic underground world. The Judiciary Committee's bill, which Senator Brownback supports, would tighten the borders, but it would also reward virtue. Immigrants who worked hard, paid fines, paid their taxes, stayed out of trouble and waited their turn would have a chance to become citizens. This isn't government enabling vice; it's government at its best, encouraging middle-class morality.

Social conservatives, let me ask you to consider one final thing. Women who have recently arrived from Mexico have bigger, healthier babies than more affluent non-Hispanic white natives. That's because strong family and social networks support these pregnant women, reminding them what to eat and do. But the longer they stay, and the more assimilated they become, the more bad habits they acquire and the more problems their subsequent babies have.

Please ask yourself this: As we contemplate America's moral fiber, do the real threats come from immigrants, or are some people merely blaming them for sins that are already here?

Illegal Migrants Persist Despite Fences, Danger (USAT)

By Danna Harman

USA Today, March 30, 2006

ALTAR, Mexico — They gather here, their backpacks stuffed with bottled water, soap, chips and maybe an icon of the Virgin of Guadalupe. They wear double sweaters and pull wool hats over their eyes against the cold nights.

Altar, a dusty town of 14,000 about 60 miles south of the Arizona border, is one of the largest staging points for migrants trying to cross into the USA illegally. They arrive from all over Mexico and from as far as Brazil. They eat road-stand chicken from plastic foam containers and bed down at hostels. Then they head for "El Norte."

Congress is considering dramatic changes in U.S. immigration policy this week. President Bush is discussing the issue with Mexican President Vicente Fox in Cancun. Here, though, migrants on the move to the USA say beefed-up enforcement will deter few. "Walls and lights and sensors and police fill our heads," says Dagoberto Martinez, a 17-year-old from Hidalgo, Mexico, who is headed north. "But they don't make us turn back."

The U.S. Border Patrol caught 1.2 million illegal immigrants in 2005, an arrest rate of roughly one person every 30 seconds. There are no official statistics to indicate how many illegal immigrants made it across, but the Pew Hispanic Center estimates there are as many as 12 million illegal immigrants in the USA — 56% of them Mexicans.

From Altar, migrants guided by "coyotes," — people smugglers — might cross near Naco, Mexico, and into the canyons, walking toward Tucson and Phoenix. Or they trek through the mountains around Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument, moving north to Phoenix or west to Los Angeles. Others take the Sasabe route and follow "ghost roads," footpaths in the sand, toward Tucson. A few go through the Barry M. Goldwater Range, an Air Force live bombing range, heading for Yuma, Ariz.

The first time Jess Ramirez sneaked across was three years ago, when he was 17, he says. He worked construction and bused tables in Las Vegas, earning $350 a week. He sent half his pay home to his parents in the Mexican state of Michoacan, and saved much of the rest to travel back at Christmas and pay a coyote for the return trip north. Back home in Michoacan, he says, he was never able to earn more than $80 a week.

Last week, Ramirez set off again from Michoacan. He agreed to pay a coyote $1,000 upon arrival in Las Vegas. From Altar, Ramirez's group drove to the border near Sasabe and crossed on foot. After three days, they were rounded up by border agents and handed over to Mexican immigration police.

Next week, Ramirez says, he will try a different route. He gives a cellphone number. Call in a week, he says, and he'll be on the other side.

In Yuma, much has changed, says Mike Gramley, a U.S. Border Patrol agent who has been there 12 years. When he started, there were 300 agents in Yuma who tracked people by following footprints in the desert. There was also a new fence that ran for 6 miles around Yuma, where the Border Patrol nabbed about 50 illegal immigrants a day.

Now, there are 650 agents in Yuma; the fence is being elevated to 12 feet and extended to 10 miles. A secondary fence is going up, stadium lights shine through the night, motion sensors are buried in the ground, surveillance planes fly overhead, and infrared cameras beam back to headquarters.

Yuma is the USA's busiest border station. Last year, 138,460 migrants were caught coming through here.

In Arizona, many want a longer fence. They point to San Diego as proof it would work. There, the fence helped send attempted crossings falling in the early 1990s. Last year, 126,910 illegal immigrants were caught near San Diego, down from a peak of 629,650 in 1986, the Border Patrol says. “California and Texas got relief with increased border vigilance — don't we deserve any in Arizona?” Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., said this month.

Opponents of fences and walls say they only push the human traffic elsewhere. The decline in crossings near San Diego coincided with increases in Arizona and Texas, they say. “It's like a balloon. If you squeeze in one sector, the migrants move to the other side,” says Jon Amastae, director of the Center for Inter-American and Border Studies at the University of Texas at El Paso.

Today, close to half of all illegal crossings take place in Arizona, according to Humane Borders, a Tucson-based organization that offers humanitarian assistance to illegal immigrants. Because of increased vigilance near heavily traveled entry points and urban areas, illegal immigrants have begun crossing over more difficult terrain — remote locations where temperatures during the summer often top 100 degrees.

A record 473 migrants died in 2005 while crossing the U.S.-Mexican border, the most since the Border Patrol began tracking such deaths in 1999.

Also, by making the journey more difficult, the coyotes become more necessary and can charge higher prices. That lengthens the stays of migrants who must repay people smugglers, Amastae says.

Mexico's National Population Council says illegal immigrants stayed in the USA an average of about six months during 1993-97. The average stay increased to more than a year by 2001-04.

Back in Altar, Dagoberto Martinez is standing on the side of the road looking south, toward home. It's his first time away from his brothers, his first attempt at crossing the border. He looks scared.

He will go to Los Angeles. There is a job there and a second cousin. At home, there was no work. “That's my whole story,” he says.

Immigration Debate Crux: Jobs Impact (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

NEW YORK - Seal the border. Round up all the illegal immigrants and send them back to their home countries. Start a whole new agency to handle only invited guest workers.

Would that open up more jobs for American citizens?

This is one of the key questions being posed as the US considers the economics of illegal immigration - with no easy solutions to the challenges in sight.

As Congress debates a new immigration bill, some economists believe any restrictions are likely to be disruptive to a variety of industries, from construction to hospitality to agriculture. At the very least, restrictions could add to employers' costs as they scramble to attract new workers with higher wages. But new regulations might also be good for those without much education or marketable skills: Business might be forced to train them. And those in lower wage brackets might see their wages rise as they face less competition for jobs.

"Do undocumented workers take away jobs from Americans?" asks Anthony Chan, chief economist at JPMorgan Private Client Services in Columbus, Ohio. "My best guess is that they take some jobs away. Some Americans are willing to work at those jobs at low salaries, but not all [Americans are]."

Analysts are quick to point out that the economics of undocumented immigration are complex. Few models have been crafted that try to look at how the US economy would perform without tapping into inexpensive labor for some jobs.

"We can't run econometric models. The numbers aren't good enough," says David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's in New York.

One challenge in performing any calculations is agreeing on the number of undocumented workers. Only estimates exist, and they range from 9 million to 20 million. The conventional estimate is 11 million. But no one really knows for sure.

By way of contrast, the Bureau of Labor Statistics calculates how many people out of a workforce of 143 million are unemployed. Last month, 7,193,000, or 4.8 percent, were out pounding the pavement.

The Center for Immigration Studies, which is in favor of some restrictions on immigration, recently issued a report looking at jobs and undocumented workers. One of its conclusions was that between March 2000 and March 2005, only 9 percent of the net increase in jobs for adults went to people born in the US.

"This is striking because natives accounted for 61 percent of the net increase in the overall size of the 18- to 64-year-old population," writes Steve Camarota, director of research.

Howard Hayghe, an economist at the Department of Labor, confirms that this number is correct. But he also points out that by 2005, the economy was doing a better job of producing jobs - and the percentage of native-born residents finding jobs rose to 41 percent. In other words, the stronger economy absorbed more workers of all educational levels. "The more office buildings you build, the more people you need to clean them. The more roads you build, the more workers you need," says Mr. Hayghe.

In addition to the 7 million Americans looking for jobs, another 1.5 million are considered to be "marginally attached" - that is, not actively looking for work. Moreover, some 386,000 are counted as "discouraged" workers. And there are about 19 million, including students and senior citizens, who are not in the workforce.

"If we close the borders and have less undocumented workers, it would put some upward pressure on overall wages," says Mr. Chan. "It's no secret business will have to pay workers more money."

But it's not a given that business will do that. "They may just outsource a larger percentage of the work, or the jobs may just disappear," Chan says.

Economists certainly differ on whether tighter immigration will have any effect on the economy. "It's similar to asking a big part of the labor force to leave," says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com. "In today's economy where the job market is at capacity, asking people to leave means the economy will not grow as fast. In fact, there could be a very difficult adjustment over the first three to four years when this process is in full swing."

On the other side are those who say it will have very little impact on the economy because most undocumented workers are low paid and relatively unskilled. Yes, there might be some adjustments - Americans might have to eat more plum tomatoes that can be harvested by machines. And the US may have to increase its already swollen import bill to make up for what can't be produced here.

"We might have a lower unemployment rate and a somewhat lower gross domestic product, but it wouldn't be a huge impact," says Mr. Wyss.

However, that depends on who is affected. San Diego builder Sherman Harmer Jr., president of Urban Housing Partners Inc., typically delivers about 300 units of housing per year. He relies on workers coming across the US-Mexican border who have some form of documentation. "We have a shortage of construction workers in California," he explains while in New York.

If he didn't have access to these workers from Mexico, he says he would have to slow the amount of construction he does: "There would be a reduction in the inventory of new homes, condos, and apartments, and that would drive prices even higher."

But, as he walks down 125th Street in upper Manhattan, Kevin Brown, a plumber, says restrictions on illegals might be good for him. "Could I have a better job?" asks Mr. Brown, whose parents are from Jamaica. "Possibly," he says, adding that he knows people out of work who could do a job taken by an illegal immigrant. However, he's also quick to add, "I don't blame anyone. Everybody's got to live."

Not far away, Miguel Almanzar, a bicycle messenger, is reading a newspaper. "This country is made of immigrants," says Mr. Almanzar. But he wants them to be legal immigrants. "There is the threat of terrorism," he says. "Now, the country needs to secure its borders."

Surge In Amounts Sent Back By Migrant Workers (FT)

By Richard Lapper

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

Migrant workers from Latin America and the Caribbean sent home $53.6bn to their families last year, an increase of 17 per cent on 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0024197

The rise – documented in a survey to be announced on Thursday by the Inter-American Development Bank – confirms Latin America's position as the biggest market in the world for remittances.

For the third consecutive year, remittances to the region exceeded the combined flows of direct foreign investment and overseas economic aid.

The surge in remittances reflects the fact that rates of economic migration outstrip world population growth by a ratio of four to one. The bank said the trend – in a week when the US Senate is to consider legislation that would allow as many as 400,000 new workers to come to the US legally a year – also underlines the need for reform of migration law.

"The shift in international trade, investment and communications has required the world's political and economic system to adapt new rules and mechanisms to meet modern realities," said Donald Terry, head of the bank's multilateral investment fund. "The same needs to be done for the migrant labourers who have become such an integral part of the world's labour markets."

An estimated 25m-27m Latin Americans are living and working abroad, 22m of them in the developed markets of North America, Eur-ope and Japan. Mr Terry said migrant workers from the region now made up more than 20 per cent of the labour force in Madrid, Spain's capital. In the US, Latin American and Caribbean workers constitute an average of 12 per cent of the labour force. "Family by family, worker by worker, migrants are redrawing the map of global labour markets," Mr Terry said.

Improvements in techniques used to monitor the flows of remittances in part accounted for the sharp rise last year. Many migrants continue to use informal channels, and the total could be more than $59bn.

Countries nearest the US have seen the biggest flows, with Mexico drawing some $20bn of foreign exchange earnings from remittances. The five countries of Central America and the Dominican Republic received $11bn.

Brazil got $6bn, Colombia $4bn and the four other Andean economies a total of $9bn. The bank is continuing its efforts to force down the cost of transmission costs of remittances, typically despatched in amounts of between $100 and $300. Commission costs now amount to about 5 per cent of the total, less than half the levels of five years ago.

But Mr Terry said banks could do much more to help integrate migrants into their local financial systems. "Latin American banks are essentially irrelevant to the daily lives of the vast majority of their population."

Meanwhile, BBVA, the Spanish bank that handles about 40 per cent of remittances from Mexico, on Wednesday signed an agreement with banks in India and the Philippines to process their money transfers for immigrants in the US and Canada. India received more than $23bn in family remittances last year, about $9bn of which came from north America. The Philippines received more than $10.6bn. BBVA's transfer service in India will initially handle remittances from 9m people from India living in north America.

Speak Up, Mr. Bush (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH says he's committed to "comprehensive reform" of the nation's broken immigration system: legislation that would both increase enforcement to stem the flow of illegal immigrants into this country and provide a legal way to, as Mr. Bush puts it, "match willing foreign workers with willing American employers to fill the jobs that Americans are unwilling to do." But the president himself has been unwilling, so far, to match his words about reform with deeds to make certain it gets done. Now, with the Senate debating the explosive issue and protests against a draconian House bill flowering from the streets of Los Angeles to the high schools of Northern Virginia, it is time for Mr. Bush to step up.

In a welcome move this week, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a realistic and humane immigration measure. It not only would create a temporary worker program to help stem the flow of illegal immigration but also would permit those already working here illegally to obtain citizenship eventually. Credit on this goes especially to the minority of committee Republicans -- Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Sens. Sam Brownback (Kan.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) -- who voted with Democrats for this sensible approach, under which illegal workers would have to register, pay fines and back taxes, learn English, and wait their turn for legal status.

The Judiciary Committee's work could well be fleeting. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has a competing, enforcement-only approach that will also be debated on the Senate floor. And the measure approved by the House -- with, it's important to recall, a statement of strong support from the administration -- would, among other things, make it a felony to be in the United States illegally or to help illegal immigrants. "The administration remains committed to comprehensive immigration reform, including a temporary worker program that avoids amnesty, and believes this bill is a positive step toward that goal," the statement said of that draconian measure. With a gulf this wide and an election looming in November, it's easy to imagine immigration reform languishing -- or even worse, the passage of an unbalanced, unfair measure that includes a crackdown on illegals but not a remedy for those already here.

Which is why presidential involvement and clarity are so important. Does Mr. Bush support the Senate Judiciary measure, which mirrors an earlier proposal from Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.)? Mr. McCain and Mr.

Kennedy sounded hopeful after talking with the president, but the White House has not been clear, simply repeating that Mr. Bush would oppose any measure that grants "amnesty" without saying whether it views the Judiciary measure as an amnesty bill. Does the president disagree with Mr. Frist's enforcement-only measure? If that's the case, it would help if he would say so. On reflection, does he really "strongly" support the cruel House approach? If not, this would be the time to speak up.

Frist, Do No Harm (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

ON WEDNESDAY, AFTER MONTHS of work, the Senate brought the immigration reform debate to the floor. Unfortunately, senators took up the wrong bill.

Balancing enforcement measures with a temporary-worker program, the Judiciary Committee approved a sensible, comprehensive measure in time to meet the Monday deadline set by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn). But instead of bringing the committee bill to the floor as promised, Frist opted to bring his own enforcement-heavy bill forward first for a daylong debate.

This is a needless distraction. The Senate should focus on the committee's compromise.

Frist introduced his Securing America's Borders Act about two weeks ago. Unlike the committee's more thorough approach, and contrary to President Bush's wishes, it has no guest-worker program. It resembles the bill the House passed in December when it comes to controversial measures such as criminalizing illegal immigrants and those who aid them.

But the content of Frist's proposal may be secondary to its role in his nascent presidential run. We hope that the majority leader doesn't really believe his alternative is sound, and that this is mere posturing so he can pander to the far right by saying he was extra harsh on immigration until — gasp — other senators insisted on a guest-worker program and "soft" enforcement measures.

The more promising legislation, shepherded by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) out of his Judiciary Committee, relies largely on the May 2005 bill introduced by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). That bill provided the framework for a guest-worker program for immigrants already in the country and for those who would seek to immigrate in the future. Immigrants currently in the country would have to pay back taxes and fines, study English and fulfill other requirements to become eligible for citizenship — a far cry from amnesty.

The Specter compromise added a program for 1.5 million agricultural workers, toughened the requirements for citizenship, provided more visas for nurses, doctors and asylum candidates and bulked up border security.

The Senate should swat aside the majority leader's cynical alternative and unite behind this compromise. Then senators will have to stand firm in negotiations with the House to ensure that any final legislation bears a relationship to the real world.

Myths Vs. Facts (USAT)

By Tom Tancredo

USA Today, March 30, 2006

It has been said that if you tell a lie 1,000 times in politics, it becomes truth. Before we reach that threshold, there are two myths that must be dispelled about the House's bipartisan immigration reform bill:

· The first myth is that the House bill would make criminals out of priests who run homeless shelters and soup kitchens.

The bill would not substantially change decades of law with respect to religious organizations. From 1986 until this year, no organization was allowed to conceal, harbor or shield an alien from law enforcement "in reckless disregard of the fact" that the alien is in this country illegally. During those two decades, no church was shut down for providing basic social services to illegal aliens. Regardless, I think congressional leaders would be open to language that reaffirms current practice and clarifies the bill's intent.

But beyond soup and shelter, why should religious organizations be exempt from a law against actively concealing illegal aliens from law enforcement? It's no secret that there are terrorist front organizations in the USA, and that these front organizations most often claim to be relief charities or religious groups. Just one example is the Holy Land Foundation, whose headquarters was only miles from our nation's capital and which was shut down for supporting Hamas and other terrorist-related organizations.

· A second myth is that House Republicans want to make illegal presence in the USA a felony.

The truth is Democrats voted for the felony provision, and a majority of Republicans (including me) voted against it.

Right now, illegal presence in the USA is not a crime; it is a civil infraction. The House Judiciary Committee voted to make it a felony but then was counseled that millions of new felons could clog our courts.

Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., wrote an amendment to his own bill asking that the penalty be reduced from a felony to a misdemeanor; 191 Democrats and a few Republicans voted to keep the felony penalty in the hope that it would be a poison pill to defeat the measure. After his amendment lost, Sensenbrenner promised, "When this bill gets to (House-Senate) conference, those penalties will be made workable. You can count on that."

The truth? The House bill would construct a security fence along our southern border, require federal and local law enforcement to cooperate on immigration matters, and mandate that employers use an instant check system to verify their employees' legal status. Unlike the Senate bill, our version would offer no amnesty and would not add foreign workers to our already overwhelmed background-check system.

Polls released last week show that nearly two-thirds of Americans oppose amnesty, and that 90% say illegal immigration is a serious problem. The House's approach is supported by most Americans. Now, we wait for the Senate to follow.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., is chairman of the congressional immigration reform caucus.

Latest Immigration 'Crisis' Defies Simplistic Solutions (USAT)

USA Today, March 30, 2006

The USA, truly a nation of immigrants, is having another of its periodic bouts of anxiety about immigration.

Communities even in areas far from any foreign border are dealing with the burdens and social change caused by growing numbers of immigrants, both legal and illegal. Longtime residents and local officials complain of the costs of immigrant children in the schools, strains on health care systems for a population that often lacks insurance, and economic impact of people willing to work for low wages. Recent polls found that nine of every 10 Americans say immigration is a serious problem, and three-fourths want more done to keep illegal immigrants out.

Looking at these numbers, politicians are falling over each other with promises to round up millions for deportation, erect massive walls along the porous U.S.-Mexico border and crack down yet again on employers who hire those here illegally.

The House of Representatives, sensing a potential vote-getting issue, passed a draconian border control and immigration-enforcement bill in December. That simplistic legislation has triggered large demonstrations in support of immigrant rights, including one in Los Angeles on Saturday that drew more than 500,000 people. The Senate took up the issue Wednesday and will, we hope, bring a more balanced and practical approach.

The backlash against immigration is happening in a country where nearly everyone is either an immigrant or descended from immigrants, many of whom arrived without anything resembling what would now be considered proper papers.

Energetic strivers have always been attracted to America, starting in the 1600s with the likes of John Smith in Jamestown and William Bradford in Plymouth. And as far back as the 18th century, Benjamin Franklin was fretting publicly about a surge of German arrivals in Pennsylvania.

According to the Census Bureau, more than 35 million immigrants are in the USA, a record number but a smaller proportion of the population now (12.1%) than at the peak of European immigration early in the 20th century (14.7%).

Roughly two-thirds are here legally, but an estimated 11.5 million to 12 million are undocumented. The legislation passed by the House would declare all of them felons subject to expulsion, as if it were possible to round up a population the size of Ohio and dump them across the nearest border.

Moreover, the illegals are roughly 5% of the labor force, heavily concentrated in construction, low-wage service jobs and agriculture. Their abrupt departure, even if it were possible, would seriously disrupt those sectors of the economy. Their employers are violating the law, but successive administrations have essentially abandoned enforcement of employer sanctions.

Clearly the immigration-control system enacted in 1986 and revised in 1996 is broken. Pressures to revisit the issue run in cycles, usually paralleling anxiety about the economy, jobs and national security. When concern slackens, businesses become reliant on cheap labor, consumers welcome the lower prices for food and services, and enforcement is gradually neglected.

Certainly, part of the answer to the immigration problem has to include improved and serious border controls — on both sides, as President Bush should make clear when he meets his Mexican counterpart, Vicente Fox, in Cancun starting today. Such controls are necessary not just to curb illegal immigration but also to protect the nation in an age of terrorism.

But another round of chest-thumping about sealing borders and deporting illegals is far from a solution. A balanced approach must also include some kind of guest-worker program, like the one Bush has proposed, that would bring immigrant laborers out of the shadows. And common sense suggests providing a route to eventual legalization for those who have been here for years, in many cases paying taxes and contributing to their communities. A Senate Judiciary Committee proposal hammered out Monday is a step in that direction. It would offer not amnesty but a chance to get in line for eventual citizenship to those who are willing to continue working for six years, pay their fines and any back taxes, and learn English.

Despite the frustrations and fears of the moment, and the obvious security reasons for better management of the borders, a nation of immigrants cannot turn its back on the new arrivals in its midst.

This is the first in an occasional series of editorials about immigration-related issues.

American Dreams, Foreign Flags (NYT)

By Linda Chavez

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

Pittsburg, Tex. - HUNDREDS of thousands of flag-waving demonstrators took to the streets in Denver, Los Angeles, Phoenix and dozens of other cities in the last week to protest harsh legislation passed by the House that would make felons of the 12 million illegal aliens living in the United States — along with anyone who provides them with shelter, food or other services. It didn't take long for a bipartisan majority on the Senate Judiciary Committee to get the message and take a softer tack.

On Monday, four Republicans joined all eight committee Democrats to vote down the controversial penalties. Their proposal also calls for admitting more legal immigrants and temporary workers, allowing illegal aliens already in the country to remain here and earn citizenship if they pay a fine, learn English and study American civics.

The Senate bill has a long way to go before becoming law, however. Despite their victory in this round, supporters of comprehensive immigration reform must be careful in their tactics, including what symbols they embrace. Although American flags were widely visible among the crowd of a half-million in downtown Los Angeles (organizers had asked marchers to bring them), reports indicated that they were outnumbered by those of Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador and other countries. And if history is any guide, those foreign banners could spur an anti-immigrant reaction.

That's what happened in 1994, when 70,000 people marched in Los Angeles, many waving Mexican flags, to show their distaste for Proposition 187, a California ballot initiative that denied social services to illegal aliens and their children. Initially favored by more than 70 percent of voters, the measure was losing steam as the election approached, with a poll a week before the election showing it ahead by only 1 point. But that sea of green, white and red Mexican flags flooding the streets just before the election signaled to many Californians that those demanding equal treatment were more attached to their native country than to the United States. The proposition scored a surprisingly strong 59 percent of the vote, although the courts eventually declared it unconstitutional.

Similar dynamics are playing out today. For all the talk of national security and the economic costs of immigration, the underlying issue driving the current anti-immigrant frenzy is a deep suspicion that this latest group of newcomers won't do what others have before them did: learn English and embrace American identity.

Unfortunately, many Latino leaders play right into the hands of those who claim they are different from the Germans, Italians, Poles, Jews, Irish and others who came here in another era. With shouts of "Sí, se puede!" (Yes, we can!) — an old United Farm Workers rallying cry — and signs announcing "We didn't cross the border, the border crossed us," the demonstrators are likely to turn off more Americans than they win over. And the sight of thousands of angry Hispanic students from California to Virginia pouring out of schools to join protest marches will only reinforce stereotypes that Latinos care little about education.

Instead of presenting themselves as an aggrieved, foreign presence, immigration advocates ought to be explaining how similar Latinos are to other Americans in their values, aspirations and achievements. It's an easy case to make.

Mexican-born men, for example, are more likely to be in the labor force than any other racial or ethnic group, according to the Census Bureau. Nearly half of Latino immigrants own their own homes. While most immigrants from Latin America, especially Mexico and Central America, lag in educational attainment, their children are far more likely to stay in school: according to research by the Pew Hispanic Center, 80 percent of second-generation Latinos graduate from high school. Almost half of second-generation Latinos ages 25 to 44 have attended college, and those who graduate earn more on average than non-Hispanic white workers.

Latino immigrants are also starting their own businesses at a rapid pace. The Census Bureau reported that entrepreneurship among Latinos is increasing at a rate three times faster than that of other Americans. Americans of Hispanic descent now own 1.6 million businesses generating $222 billion annually; and while Census data didn't distinguish between immigrants and American-born Hispanics, it suggested that much of this growth occurred in heavily immigrant communities.

Like every generation of immigrants before them, Latinos start out on the bottom rungs of the economic ladder, but they don't stay there. They are learning English as quickly as their predecessors, perhaps more quickly thanks to television (a majority of third-generation Latinos speak only English). They are intermarrying at faster rates than earlier ethnic groups, too, with about one-third of married American-born Latinos having a non-Hispanic spouse.

These facts, if they were more widely known, would go a long way to calming fears about Latino immigration. If Latino advocates hope to influence the outcome of the Senate debate on immigration over the next two weeks, they would do well to spread the word — and trade their ancestral flags for the Stars and Stripes.

Guard The Borders -- And Face Facts, Too (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

America, the only developed nation that shares a long -- 2,000-mile -- border with a Third World nation, could seal that border. East Germany showed how: walls, barbed wire, machine gun-toting border guards in towers, mine fields, large, irritable dogs. And we have modern technologies that East Germany never had: sophisticated sensors, unmanned surveillance drones, etc.

It is a melancholy fact that many of these may have to be employed along the U.S.-Mexican border. The alternatives are dangerous and disagreeable conditions for Americans residing near the border, and vigilantism. It is, however, important that Americans feel melancholy about taking such measures to frustrate immigration that usually is an entrepreneurial act: taking risks to get to America to do work most Americans spurn. As the debate about immigration policy boils, augmented border control must not be the entire agenda, lest other thorny problems be ignored, and lest America turn a scowling face to the south and, to some extent, to many immigrants already here.

But control belongs at the top of the agenda, for four reasons. First, control of borders is an essential attribute of sovereignty. Second, conditions along the border mock the rule of law. Third, large rallies by immigrants, many of them here illegally, protesting more stringent control of immigration reveal that many immigrants have, alas, assimilated: They have acquired the entitlement mentality created by America's welfare state, asserting an entitlement to exemption from the laws of the society they invited themselves into. Fourth, giving Americans a sense that borders are controlled is a prerequisite for calm consideration of what policy that control should serve.

Of the nation's illegal immigrants -- estimated to be at least 11 million, a cohort larger than the combined populations of 12 states -- 60 percent have been here at least five years. Most have roots in their communities. Their children born here are U.S. citizens. We are not going to take the draconian police measures necessary to deport 11 million people. They would fill 200,000 buses in a caravan stretching bumper-to-bumper from San Diego to Alaska -- where, by the way, 26,000 Latinos live. And there are no plausible incentives to get the 11 million to board the buses.

Facts, a conservative (John Adams) said, are stubborn things, and regarding immigration, true conservatives take their bearings from facts such as those in the preceding paragraph. Conservatives should want, as the president proposes, a guest worker program to supply what the U.S. economy demands -- immigrant labor for entry-level jobs. Conservatives should favor a policy of encouraging unlimited immigration by educated people with math, engineering, technology or science skills that America's education system is not sufficiently supplying.

And conservatives should favor reducing illegality by putting illegal immigrants on a path out of society's crevices and into citizenship by paying fines and back taxes and learning English. Faux conservatives absurdly call this price tag on legal status "amnesty." Actually, it would prevent the emergence of a sullen, simmering subculture of the permanently marginalized, akin to the Arab ghettos in France. The House-passed bill, making it a felony to be in the country illegally, would make 11 million people permanently ineligible for legal status. To what end?

Within a decade the New York and Washington metropolitan regions will join the Miami, Houston, Los Angeles and San Francisco regions in having majorities made up of minorities, partly because immigrants have higher birthrates than whites. Since 2000, births, not immigration, have been the largest source of growth of America's Latino population.

Urban immigrant communities, with their support networks, are magnets for immigrants. Good. Investor's Business Daily reports a new study demonstrating that "over the past 30 years rising immigration led to higher wages for U.S.-born workers. Cities that served as migrant magnets did better than others. Why? Hiring one worker creates wealth with which to hire more workers."

The president, who has not hoarded his political capital, spent some trying to get the nation to face facts about the bleak future of an unreformed Social Security system. Concerning which: In 1940 there were 42 workers for every retiree; today there are 3.1. By 2030, when all 77 million baby boomers will have left the work force, there will be only 2.2. And that projection assumes net annual immigration, legal and illegal, of 900,000, more than double the 400,000 foreigners who, under the terms of proposed Senate legislation, could come here to work each year.

Today the president is spending more of his depleted political capital by standing to the left of much of his political base, which favors merely preventative and punitive measures regarding immigration. He is right to take his stand there.

TAX:

Twilight Of Tax Privacy (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0024202

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

For most people, the apparently hard-wired human reluctance to pay taxes is overcome by the knowledge that it's illegal not to. The Internal Revenue Service, in turn, is legally bound to keep tax returns private.

For now, anyway. This month, the I.R.S. hired three private collection firms to help the agency collect overdue taxes. Authorized by Congress two years ago, private collections are scheduled to start this year, with the I.R.S. providing names, contact information and the amounts of the taxes owed.

It seems unlikely that private collectors will meet the I.R.S.'s confidentiality standards. Privacy protection is part of the I.R.S. culture. If an I.R.S. employee improperly discloses taxpayer information, he or she faces serious consequences, including dismissal. It's unclear what the punishment would be for a private collector.

A House subcommittee also raised questions yesterday about whether private tax collection would make financial sense. The fact that the I.R.S. would have more success than private collectors in collecting unpaid taxes is not in dispute. But the budget rules don't allow the I.R.S. to claim credit for the extra taxes it would bring in if it had more collectors, so the agency has not been given the money to hire more people.

Some lawmakers say that private collections are better than nothing, but that's not necessarily so. Many taxpayers who are contacted by private collectors — yet unable to pay — will be bounced back to the I.R.S., forcing the agency to spend its scant resources on small cases.

This is not the only privacy issue confronting the I.R.S. this year.

Next week, the agency will hold a hearing on proposed rules that detail how tax preparers can gain their clients' permission to share information from their returns. The idea is to let preparers steer clients to other financial services, like opening I.R.A.'s. Right now, tax information can be used only by affiliates of the tax preparation firm — and only if the customer approves.

The new regulations would allow tax preparers who had customers' approval to use the information more freely to generate outside business. But consumer advocates contend that many people won't really understand what they're approving. The controversy has also generated a more far-reaching debate among advocates and some lawmakers over whether information from tax returns should be used or disclosed for anything other than paying one's taxes.

That's clearly the fundamental issue. It's unlikely that any loss of confidentiality would accomplish much that's positive. But it would send a dark message to law-abiding taxpayers: Obeying the law could cost you your privacy.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Chief Of Staff Is Expected To Shake Up 2 Key Teams (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — Joshua B. Bolten, the incoming White House chief of staff, is expected to press President Bush to assemble new economic and Congressional relations teams and overhaul the management of the West Wing, Republicans close to the White House said Wednesday.

A prominent Republican in Washington who consults often with the White House said Mr. Bolten, who is to assume his duties next month, wants Mr. Bush to replace the Treasury secretary, John W. Snow, with someone who can more forcefully communicate the administration's message that the economy is strong. This Republican was granted anonymity to discuss private deliberations within the administration.

Speculation about Mr. Snow's departure has flared and receded periodically for more than a year, and it returned after Mr. Bush's announcement on Tuesday that Mr. Bolten, the White House budget director, would succeed Andrew H. Card Jr. as chief of staff.

Names circulating in Republican circles as possible candidates for the Treasury post included Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs; John J. Mack, the chief executive of Morgan Stanley; and Richard D. Parsons, the chairman of Time Warner.

It was unclear if any of the three would consider taking the job. Their names surfaced immediately after Mr. Bolten's appointment because Mr. Bolten, who once worked for Goldman Sachs, is friendly with Mr. Paulson and Mr. Mack. Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, is said to think highly of Mr. Parsons, who has worked with the White House on several issues, including its efforts to overhaul Social Security.

Republicans said that if Mr. Bush turned to Wall Street for a new Treasury secretary, it could help reassure financial markets, which are increasingly worried about record-high budget and trade deficits.

DOJ_NMG_0024203

Mr. Snow's spokesman, Tony Fratto, declined to comment Wednesday night about the speculation, but said Mr. Snow was continuing with plans to be the host of a meeting of finance ministers from the Group of 7 industrialized democracies next month in Washington.

Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor, also declined to comment on the speculation, but said Mr. Bolten had a free hand to make changes.

"The president has given Josh, as he would have any chief of staff, the authority to run the White House as he sees fit," Mr. Bartlett said.

Nonetheless, Mr. Bartlett added: "I don't think Josh is entering this transition period with firm judgments. He's going to take a fresh assessment and do what he thinks is right to accomplish his goals. While Josh and Andy are very close and have worked together, they're different people and have different management styles."

Republicans said Mr. Bolten was likely to change the White House Congressional relations team, which has been criticized on Capitol Hill as ineffective. Candida Wolff, the White House director of Congressional affairs, may well stay, they said, but a more senior person might be put in as a layer above her.

Ms. Wolff is well liked at the White House, but one Republican said she had been undercut by Mr. Rove, Mr. Bartlett and Mr. Card, who were in effect all masters of their own Congressional relations.

People mentioned as possibilities for such a liaison post included Bill Paxon, a former New York congressman who was a lieutenant to Newt Gingrich, the former House majority leader, in the 1990's, and Daniel R. Coats, a former Republican senator from Indiana and guide for Harriet E. Miers and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. through the Supreme Court confirmation process.

The most immediate change, Republicans said, would be a budget director to replace Mr. Bolten. The leading possibilities included Joel Kaplan and Clay Johnson, Mr. Bolten's two deputies, as well as Allan Hubbard, the director of the National Economic Council.

Republicans said Mr. Bush had not ruled out bringing in an experienced Washington hand to help calm Congressional Republicans who have complained with increasing boldness and exasperation that the White House staff is exhausted and adrift. While Mr. Bolten's appointment was generally well received by the party, many Republicans said on Wednesday that the staff changes did not go far enough.

Mr. Bush was described as paying close heed to such advice.

"What I've been hearing for several weeks is that he was listening and he wasn't being impatient about it," said a Republican who speaks regularly to senior White House officials. "You know how he is, somebody presents an idea; he says, 'No, not doing that, next question.' But he was not like that, so that means he was at least digesting some of the advice suggesting change."

Not The Staff Dreams Are Made Of (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, March 30, 2006

Everybody in Washington's Republican political community was well-aware that any changes George W. Bush made in his White House staff would not constitute a shakeup. What nobody expected was that Josh Bolten, in essence a professional bureaucrat, would be promoted to chief of staff. Yet, this selection becomes understandable as a confirmation of Karl Rove's supremacy in the White House.

Rove holds the mundane titles of senior adviser to the president and deputy chief of staff, but scarcely anything happens in the Bush administration without his approval. Now he is more influential than ever. Andrew Card, the departing chief of staff, served (as a Cabinet member) under the senior President Bush (as Rove did not). In contrast, Bolten can thank his rise in the second Bush regime to Rove, his nominal subordinate.

I talked to former White House staffers who served Republican presidents over the last quarter of a century. To a man, they were appalled that President Bush had squandered the opportunity handed him when a burned-out Card told him he must resign. It was the time, they agreed, to emulate what President Ronald Reagan did in 1987 when his national approval rating dropped below 40 percent and he brought a new team to the White House: Howard Baker, Kenneth Duberstein, Frank Carlucci and Colin Powell. By not emulating Reagan's boldness, Bush failed to address the unhappy state of his administration and his party.

Throughout his governmental career in Washington and Sacramento, Reagan never was hesitant to drop overboard aides who had become part of the problem. The belief in Republican circles is that Bush is unable to change the guard at the White House because that would tacitly admit something is wrong with the way he governs.

Into his sixth year as president, Bush has preferred to promote from within -- a tendency that has brought third-level aides to the top of White House sections. Although this has produced staff mediocrity, nobody questions Bolten's intelligence and competency.

While Card forced himself to work 16- or 17-hour days, Bolten is a natural workaholic who as a bachelor seemed on the job continuously as director of the Office of Management and Budget. He is more attuned to issues than Card and gets along better with Congress, especially Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. Bolten stayed overtime at this year's House Republican retreat in Cambridge, Md., to chat with members of Congress.

But Bolten replacing Card also advances Rove's project, which was obvious as early as the mid-'90s, of removing the influence of people close to the elder Bush. Rove named Bolten, then working for Goldman Sachs in London, as the Austin-based policy director of the 2000 Bush-Cheney campaign. There is no question that Bolten is a Rove man.

Bolten's promotion does improve the professional quality of the president's chief of staff, but Republicans fear the worst about his successor at OMB. If Bush follows his usual pattern and promotes from within according to the present pecking order, the new OMB director will be the agency's current deputy, Clay Johnson. A Dallas businessman who was Gov. Bush's aide in Austin and was the administration's personnel director in Washington, Johnson has won few admirers. I found widespread hope but little optimism that he would be overlooked for the OMB post.

A dysfunctional OMB director is the last result Bush needs in a White House filled with problems. The absence of a Cabinet secretary coordinating the departments with the president is an inexplicable and unnecessary shortcoming. Lesser staff positions remain unfilled, which may explain the ruinous hours that senior aides are forced to keep.

Prior to Tuesday's surprise announcement of Bolten-for-Card, a Republican parlor game was trying to guess the 21st century counterparts of Howard Baker & Co. named by Reagan in 1987 to save his presidency. It is not an easy task to come up with good names, but it is highly unlikely that Bush and Rove made such a search. Their implicit message is that no shakeup is needed because they had nothing to do with the parlous condition of the administration and the Republican Party.

Chief Of Staff Can Pick From Plenty Of Cards (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

When Andrew H. Card Jr. walks out of the White House for the last time as chief of staff to President Bush on April 14, it's unlikely that he will be worrying about his next job. But just in case he runs into any obstacles, he has family to fall back on in the Washington lobbying biz.

Card's sister-in-law is Lorine Card , who runs a small lobby shop, Card & Associates . The name fits. Her clients have included Comcast and the National Cable Television Association.

Lorine Card is married to Card's brother, Brad Card , managing principal at Dutko Worldwide . He is registered to lobby for the Greater New York Hospital Association, the Essex County Sheriff's Office and software developer Cognos Corp.

Card's sister Alison "Lisi" Kaufman , who was chief of staff to then-Commerce Secretary Donald L. Evans, might be able to pull a string or two. She's now senior vice president for government and international affairs at United Technologies Corp.

Of course, Andrew Card has his own experience in the lobby world -- he was chief lobbyist for General Motors Corp. and chief executive of the American Automobile Manufacturers Association.

"He hasn't spent 10 seconds thinking about it," said Ron Kaufman , chairman of Dutko's executive committee, who is separated from Alison Kaufman.

Ron Kaufman, who was White House personnel director and political director for President George H.W. Bush, said Card has "a gazillion choices," and "no one is more trusted and loved" here than Card.Duo to Join C&M Capitolink

C&M Capitolink , a lobbying and consulting subsidiary of the law firm Crowell & Moring , has landed Paul D. Behrends from the defunct Alexander Strategy Group and Patrick J. Donnelly from CropLife America.

John Thorne , president of C&M Capitolink, said that while the seven-person shop is known for its agricultural sector work, "Pat and Paul strengthen our bench and offer more diverse experience to our clients," including Behrends's defense and international policy work.

Behrends, a former national security adviser to Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) is one of a number of folks who were left out in the cold when ASG closed in January because of its ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff , who has pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy charges, and to Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who is under scrutiny in the Abramoff case.

"We sought Paul out because he is well-known by clients and colleagues alike for being an effective straight shooter," Thorne said.

Behrends, who could not be reached for comment, has represented the International Peace Operations Association, a trade group for private security contractors, and was part of the ASG team that lobbied for Koch Industries and the American Bankers Association.

CropLife America, the pesticide industry trade group where Donnelly was executive vice president and chief operating officer, has been a longtime client of C&M Capitolink. Other clients include the American Meat Institute, the National Pork Producers Council and Smithfield Foods.HillZoo.com Creator Hired at Mayer, Brown

Andrew Shore , former chief of staff for the House Republican Conference and creator of HillZoo.com, a Web site for Hill staffers, this week joined Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw in the law firm's government and global trade practice. Earlier, he worked for former House Ways and Means chairman Bill Archer (R-Tex.) and former House member Phillip Crane (R-Ill.).

"It was just time. . . . It's every issue every day and I was just getting tired," Shore said.

The government and global trade practice includes Peter Scher ; former U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor ; James Jochum , former Bush administration assistant secretary of commerce and trade counsel to Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa); and Catherine Novelli , a former assistant U.S. trade representative.Here and There

David E. Hebert , formerly chief of staff for Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and more recently a lawyer at Alston & Bird , is joining the American Health Care Association next month as senior vice president of policy and government relations. The trade group represents nursing homes, assisted-living residences and other types of facilities.

Sprint Nextel has signed on two new directors of government affairs: Melinda Lewis , previously a lobbyist for the National Association of Broadcasters and Major League Baseball, and Laura McPherson , who was at CTIA, the wireless industry association.

Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman recently pinched two more lawyers from Patton Boggs for its public policy practice. Hakkyun Kim and Kristina Pisanelli will reunite with six of their former colleagues who joined Pillsbury in February. Kim is a former economist at the Bank of Korea. Pisanelli earlier worked for Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.).

David Mohler , a senior vice president at the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, is joining Foley Hoag in the law firm's life sciences and government strategies practices.

Debra Barrett , a former health care policy aide to Democratic Sens. Charles Schumer (N.Y.) and Christopher Dodd (Conn.) and Leahy, has joined Teva USA as vice president of government affairs. Between the Senate and Teva, she was a lobbyist at the Washington Group .

Bush Pushes Science Standards (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

President Bush wants schools to face consequences for falling short in science, just as they do in reading and math.

A proposal by Mr. Bush would require schools to make yearly progress in science, adding a third high-stakes subject to the No Child Left Behind Act, which has thousands of schools scrambling to meet federal goals.

Congressional leaders say they are willing to consider the president's idea when the law comes up for renewal next year, but that is as far as they will commit.

Science already is part of the law. Starting in the 2007-08 school year, states are required to test students' science knowledge at least once in elementary, middle and high school. But nothing in the law holds schools accountable for science scores.

Mr. Bush wants to change that by applying a system of penalties for schools whose students do not improve their grasp of science. Such a move would affect millions of students nationwide.

"Given our philosophy that what gets measured gets done, this would be a natural way to emphasize the importance of science," Assistant Education Secretary Tom Luce said. "We do think it's important to have consequences."

In reading and math, those consequences have made the yearly test scores a huge priority. Schools that receive federal poverty aid and miss one academic target face penalties that get tougher each year -- from letting students transfer to firing employees.

The same could apply in science.

Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon, California Republican and chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, has an open mind about requiring schools to show gains in science, spokesman Steve Forde said.

Sen. Michael B. Enzi, Wyoming Republican and chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, wants input from people affected by the law, including parents and teachers who say children are tested enough. "I don't think we're close to making a decision," said his spokesman, Craig Orfield.

Democrats who helped Mr. Bush pass No Child Left Behind in 2001 also have offered wait-and-see responses.

DOJ_NMG_0024206

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, is not opposed to adding science to how schools are judged, but a spokeswoman said Mr. Kennedy does not think the change should happen until states have a chance to get high-quality tests in place and more training for their teachers.

One clear supporter is Rep. Rush D. Holt. The New Jersey Democrat has pushed for judging schools on their science scores when testing begins.

"It is as important as reading and math," Mr. Holt said. But he says Congress may balk because lawmakers are getting an earful about problems with the current law.

Among those problems is how progress is measured. Many educators don't like the reliance on tests, or how missing one academic goal labels the whole school as "needing improvement."

"Let's get it right first. Then we can start talking about bringing on science or whatever subject they want to talk about," said Rob Weil, deputy director of educational issues for the American Federation of Teachers.

Higher-Education Bill Aims To Stir Up Academia (WSJ)

By John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Congressional Republicans have lambasted traditional colleges for years as overpriced liberal bastions, without making much headway against the nearly unassailable higher-education establishment.

Now, they are finally gaining ground.

This week, the House of Representatives is expected to pass a higher-education bill that tries to curb skyrocketing college-tuition costs and protect the expression of conservative ideas on campus. The College Access and Opportunity Act would also drop longstanding antifraud safeguards holding back for-profit colleges that are taking market share from traditional schools, which are public or private nonprofit organizations.

Congressional Republicans are "steamrolling the traditional colleges," says Sarah Flanagan, vice president for government relations at the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, which represents private, nonprofit colleges.

The bill reauthorizes the Higher Education Act, which governs billions of dollars of federal funding for colleges and universities of all types. It is expected to pass the House in part because John Boehner, the Ohio Republican recently named majority leader, was one of its architects when he headed the House's education committee.

House Republicans view the legislation as a long-overdue reordering of the educational landscape, promoting fairness and fiscal responsibility. "Costs at both public and private colleges are spiraling upward -- and fast," Rep. Howard McKeon, a California Republican who is chairman of the education committee, told the House yesterday. "Colleges and universities must remain accountable to consumers of higher education."

Higher-education groups say the bill represents an assault on academic independence and standards. Key Democrats, including Rep. George Miller of California, also complain that the bill doesn't restore the $12.7 billion over five years that Congress recently cut from federal student-loan programs. A fierce debate is expected to continue in the Senate.

One provision of the act would require public disclosure of data from colleges that increase their tuitions by more than twice the rate of inflation over a three-year period. The schools would also be required to submit to the Department of Education a plan to hold down costs. Colleges say the requirement is a backdoor way of instituting tuition price controls.

The House bill also includes the "Academic Bill of Rights," in which Congress would tell colleges to reflect diverse viewpoints -- though the provision has no enforcement mechanism. The measure, pushed by conservative activist David Horowitz in response to complaints of professors discriminating against conservative students, has been introduced in many state legislatures. Colleges say such bias doesn't exist.

Other provisions are a boon to fast-growing higher-education corporations, many of which have publicly traded stocks and operate big chains of colleges that Republicans now favor. Big players include Apollo Group Inc., operator of the University of Phoenix; Career Education Corp.; and Corinthian Colleges Inc.

Such companies used to focus on granting certificates in vocational fields such as auto repair but now are increasingly granting bachelor's and professional degrees. The industry faces numerous government investigations and lawsuits alleging shoddy instruction and financial-aid fraud -- claims the companies deny.

Officials associated with for-profit companies and their political action committees made $280,000 in campaign contribution to Reps. McKeon and Boehner in the past four years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonprofit that tracks money in Washington. Spokespeople for the Republican leaders have said contributions haven't affected policy.

Republicans are "opening up a tremendous number of provisions for the for-profits," says Ms. Flanagan. "Those are the ones with a seat at the table. The rest of us have been left out."

Congress recently handed for-profit schools a big win when it eliminated a rule requiring all colleges to offer at least half of their instruction in brick-and-mortar classrooms to be eligible for federal financial aid. The restriction, intended to prevent fraud, had hindered online education programs that are especially popular offerings among education companies.

A provision in the latest bill would weaken another requirement -- that schools receive no more than 90% of their revenue from federal financial aid. The rule was intended to prevent a repeat of widespread fraud in the 1980s and early 1990s, when some trade schools signed up unqualified low-income students in order to collect federal aid. For-profit schools are most likely to bump up against the 90% limit because they lack other funding sources and often cater to low-income students. Schools would now have more time to get back in line with the rule if they fall short.

Yet another measure would put for-profits more on equal academic footing with established schools. Traditional schools have long tended to reject degrees and course credits from students at for-profit schools, which often lack the imprimatur of long-established regional accrediting agencies. Under the bill, they would no longer be able to turn down credits solely based on a school's source of accreditation.

Nick Glakas, president of the Career College Association, which represents for-profits, says Congress "is basically saying there's no difference between" for-profit and nonprofit schools. "It's not about Confederate gray and Union blue anymore."

Dept. Of Education Cites Lagging Schools (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

AP, March 29, 2006

More than a fourth of the nation's schools failed to meet the requirements of the No Child Left Behind Law last year, according to preliminary numbers reported to the Department of Education.

About half the states increased the number of schools making "adequate yearly progress" in improving student test scores in math and reading in the 2004-05 school year. Overall, 27 percent of the schools failed to show adequate improvement, up one percentage point from the year before.

"This is just one piece of data we look at," said Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Department of Education. These numbers alone don't signify a trend in how schools are doing, he said Wednesday. "This isn't a trend indicator in proficiency."

Schools receiving federal poverty aid can be sanctioned for not making "adequate yearly progress" two years in a row, with administrators and teachers eventually being replaced.

To meet goals, schools must show overall improvement, plus gains by minority students, poor students, students with limited English skills and students with disabilities.

States are required to get increasing percentages of students proficient in math and reading, with all students being proficient by 2013-14.

However, states are given flexibility in designing tests, and many have made it easier to meet federal requirements.

The result is an uneven measurement from state to state, said Joel Packer, a lobbyist for the National Education Association, the country's largest teachers union.

"Each state has its own standards, each state has its own tests, each state has its own definition of what it means to be proficient," Packer said.

Oklahoma led the country in 2004-05 with 97 percent of its schools making adequate progress. It was followed closely by Rhode Island, Iowa, Montana and New Hampshire.

Florida was at the bottom, with only 28 percent of its school meeting the requirements. Hawaii, Nevada, New Mexico and South Carolina rounded out the bottom five states.

Ross Wiener, policy director at the Education Trust, a Washington research and advocacy group, said states can do better if they address funding and teacher inequities. Wiener said too many poor school districts get less money and less qualified teachers than wealthier districts.

"We have not taken a lot of steps that could dramatically improve student achievement," Wiener said.

House Panel Drops Cuts In Medicare (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Bowing to election-year realities, a key House panel dropped President Bush's proposed budget cuts for hospitals and other Medicare providers yesterday but preserved his plan to trim spending by most Cabinet agencies.

The $2.8 trillion plan approved by the Budget Committee last night on a party-line 22 to 17 vote omits Bush's proposed cuts in Medicare, Medicaid, crop subsidies and other politically sensitive programs.

DOJ_NMG_0024208

The GOP plan -- written by committee Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa) for fiscal 2007, which will begin on Oct. 1 -- adopts Bush's $873 billion cap on agency budgets that are renewed by Congress each year. But it also assumes just $50 billion for the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, less than half of the expected spending for military operations in those countries this year.

The plan endorses Bush's call for a 7 percent increase in next year's core defense budget, which does not cover the costs of the war in Iraq. That increase would come at the expense of domestic programs such as education, health research and grants to local governments and relief agencies.

Democrats denounced the Republican blueprint, which would produce a deficit of $348 billion in 2007 and deficits totaling more than $1 trillion through 2011.

Republicans blocked attempts by Democrats to increase funding for port security, education, health programs, food stamps and homeland security.

Budget Wrangle In House Exposes Republican Rift (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Republican leaders began crafting a $2.7 trillion federal budget package under pressure from competing camps within their party.

Their budget largely tracks President Bush's request for $873 billion of discretionary spending, but would protect some funding he would cut for domestic programs such as Medicare.

Republican leaders in the Senate and House of Representatives face opposition from both conservative and moderate members of their party, and most Democrats are opposed to the current spending blueprints -- meaning that ultimately approving a budget bill could be difficult.

Mr. Bush's budget called for $65 billion of mandatory-spending cuts over five years, with about half of that coming from Medicare.

But the House Republican proposal would cut just $6.8 billion -- and completely spare the massive health-insurance program for the elderly and disabled -- in response to complaints from colleagues running for re-election in November.

Still, a group of moderate Republicans say they will vote against the budget measure on the House floor next week if party leaders don't increase funds for a range of domestic programs. Earlier this month, moderate Republicans in the Senate teamed up with Democrats to add $16 billion of such funding to the budget.

Likewise, moderate Republicans in the House hope to add at least $7 billion to their chamber's version. They are most concerned about funding cuts for labor and health programs, from which Mr. Bush's budget would trim $4.2 billion.

"We have put the leadership on notice that the number for nonmilitary, nonhomeland-security part of the budget is just insufficient," said Rep. Mike Castle. "I think there is an awareness about that."

The Delaware Republican is joined by about two dozen other moderate Republicans who shared their concerns in a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois.

If the moderates vote against the budget bill, it will likely fail because most Democrats also oppose it.

Meanwhile, a group of conservative Republicans in the House say the $6.8 billion of mandatory-spending cuts in the proposed budget isn't enough.

Led by Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, the conservatives once told Republican leaders that they would agree to support a small cut in mandatory spending in exchange for legislation that would revamp the congressional process for creating an annual budget.

But with the overhaul measure on hold, Mr. Pence demanded a meeting with Mr. Hastert yesterday. With Republicans holding a slim 232-202 margin in the House, the Republican budget could sink if there are enough defections from either conservatives or moderates.

Meanwhile, House Republicans decided not to include a special provision in the budget bill that would have made it easier to approve further tax cuts this year.

Without the so-called budget-reconciliation provision, Republicans would need 60 votes to clear any major new tax-cut bill in the Senate. With midterm elections just over five months away, it is unlikely Republicans will be able to clear that hurdle.

The budget bill, which was expected to clear the House Budget Committee last night, also included a $4.3 billion "rainy-day fund" to cover the unexpected costs of cleaning up after natural disasters.

Boehner's Budget Ultimatum (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024209

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) delivered an ultimatum to his Republican colleagues yesterday that they must approve the upcoming budget resolution.

Boehner told members during their weekly closed-door conference meeting that they must "put their minds around the fact that they have to vote for the budget" measure, said one member in attendance.

That message included a mild admonishment of those conservative Republicans who raised objections to the emergency supplemental spending bill that passed the House before the March recess, other members said afterward.

Members gave the majority leader a standing ovation after he completed his remarks.

In his brief tenure as majority leader, Boehner has made a distinct imprint on the job, involving himself and his staff in the party's broad message strategy as well as initiating a number of smaller procedural changes to make the process more open and efficient for members.

The upcoming budget fight is his first clear test as leader, and his remarks yesterday signal an intent to take a hard line in negotiations with the conference at a time when conservatives and centrists are laying markers to signal their intent against the budget bill.

During his campaign, Boehner promised members that he and a small group of his Republican colleagues would draft a vision statement for the party. The majority leader has conducted a similar exercise for his staff every winter to help focus their energies for the year.

Members of that group, which includes a broad cross-section of the conference, are expected to release that statement in the next few weeks after the entire conference has a chance to vote on it.

Boehner has also made a number of small changes during his early tenure as majority leader. He and his staff have implemented two-minute votes to limit the time members spend on the floor; he released a three-month floor schedule earlier this month so members could prepare legislation adhering to his broad themes; and his office has already scheduled two televised briefings — with the possibility of more in the future — to give reporters and producers further chances to ask questions about the agenda.

Rank-and-file members have welcomed many of these procedural changes, which adhere to Boehner's campaign promise to make the leadership more inclusive. The real test comes in corralling members on tough votes, a skill for which his predecessor, Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), was renowned.

Boehner butted heads with a handful of Republican Study Committee (RSC) members earlier this month after they asked for a vote on their amendment to separate the funds for hurricane reconstruction from a broader emergency-spending bill to fund the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Negotiations between Boehner and those RSC members broke down, prompting 29 Republicans to vote against the rule on that bill — 22 Democrats offset those protest votes, allowing the rule to pass.

RSC members took leadership to the brink last year with their demands to make changes to the annual budget process before cutting a deal.

Lawmakers from the RSC, including Chairman Mike Pence (R-Ind.), met yesterday with House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to urge him to support their suggested procedural changes to the budget

GOP centrists, meanwhile, have already asked leaders to boost spending that was cut in the White House's proposed budget.

Boehner's speech yesterday earned mixed reviews from a few members in attendance.

"It was a call to be a team player," one GOP member said afterward. "The problem I personally had with the remarks was the admonishment for our activities on the supplemental," adding, "I would have preferred Mr. Boehner not address that."

The majority leader has otherwise earned positive reviews during the early stages of his return to leadership.

Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), whose own unsuccessful candidacy gave Boehner a boost during the majority leader's race, gave his opponent generally high marks but wanted to see the leaders make more progress to trim federal spending and reform the earmark process.

"I would like to see him be more aggressive in looking for budget savings…and to curb the abuses that led to the [Jack] Abramoff and [former Rep. Randy "Duke"] Cunningham scandals," Shadegg said.

"On the overall, I would give them good marks," Shadegg said about the leadership as a whole. In singling out Boehner, he said, "To a certain extent he jumped into a stream that was already moving."

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who has waged a personal crusade against earmarks, believes Boehner is committed to that cause. "He's trying," Flake said.

Boehner pledged to remain the same person he always has been in his campaign for the leadership post, and the conservative, avid golf player has largely stayed true to form.

DOJ_NMG_0024210

Since becoming majority leader, Boehner has cosponsored two bills: Rep. Chris Smith's (R-N.J.) measure, which would require doctors to inform all pregnant women seeking an abortion after the 20th week of their pregnancy that the baby will feel pain and to require anesthesia be administered to the babies. The other bill seeks to award a congressional gold medal to golfing legend Byron Nelson.

The dapper and affable Ohioan still conducts business from his old perch in the smoker's corner of the Speaker's Lobby, where he fields questions from members and reporters while smoking his signature Barclay's. Earlier this month, Boehner, DeLay and a few other members enjoyed a smoke together during a long series of afternoon votes, with DeLay smoking a large cigar.

But the overwhelming pressure of leadership can take its toll on even the most carefree lawmakers.

Asked about his change of emotion since leaving the leadership after 10 years cutting the deals, DeLay recently said, "I feel free."

GOP Leadership Preaches Unity On Budget (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

As Republican and Democratic members of the House Budget Committee quarreled over the chamber's $2.77 trillion fiscal 2007 budget resolution Wednesday, the GOP leadership sought to pre-empt internal disputes on the budget and urged a united front.

The measure presented by Budget Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa) closely tracks the Bush administration's proposal, arresting growth in discretionary spending, while increasing both defense and homeland security expenditures 7 percent and 3.8 percent, respectively.

"Our budget will assume a freeze in non-security spending," Nussle said, adding that "high priority programs can and should receive funding increases," while under-performing programs will likely see reductions.

Even before the committee had voted on final passage of the resolution — it had yet to do so at Roll Call press time Wednesday — GOP leaders urged unity on the budget during Wednesday's House Republican Conference meeting.

After a discussion of Medicare and a handful of other items, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) ordered all staff out of the room, a rare step usually taken by leaders when they want to prevent leaks to the media or focus Members' attention on a particularly serious topic.

Once the staff was clear, Boehner discussed the 527 reform legislation that will be on the floor next week and the importance of Republicans working together to pass the budget. He reminded them that the budget will attract no Democratic votes and would need near-unanimous Republican support to pass.

One lawmaker who was present said the message was: "We've got to go on offense."

In particular, Boehner stressed the need for all GOP lawmakers to come together and support the budget once it is completed, even if they didn't get all the provisions they wanted.

Another Member said Boehner emphasized to lawmakers that, "Once your negotiations are done, move on."

Boehner has tried to make the assemblage of support for the budget easier this year than in past years by including more Members early on in the process. Both he and House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) held scores of meetings with lawmakers to hear their concerns before Wednesday's budget markup, rather than waiting until after the measure was written to try to sell it to Members.

Nonetheless, moderate GOP lawmakers greeted the budget proposal with skepticism Wednesday. Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.) who called the resolution's $873 billion domestic discretionary spending level "insufficient."

"The basic discussion was that almost all the moderates feel there is insufficient funding for discretionary programs that are non-defense, non-security, and adjustments have to be made," Castle said, referring to a Tuesday meeting with the Republican Main Street Partnership.

Nearly two-dozen moderate GOP lawmakers, led by Reps. Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Fred Upton (Mich.), issued a letter earlier this month to Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), seeking a 2 percent increase in discretionary spending.

"There is more focus and knowledge about what this particular budget does or doesn't do than when we typically vote on the budget," Castle said in an interview Wednesday.

The Delaware lawmaker has vowed to seek an additional $7 billion in the budget resolution for education and health programs — matching a measure approved in the Senate version of the resolution — when the measure reaches the House floor.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) offered a similar amendment at Wednesday's mark up of the resolution, but that proposal failed on a 22-14 party-line vote.

DOJ_NMG_0024211

Numerous Democratic-sponsored amendments met a similar fate Wednesday afternoon.

"Given recent history, we doubt that these amendments will carry, and that's a shame," said Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.), the panel's ranking member, noted at the hearing's outset.

While the conservative Republican Study Committee and GOP moderates are not in harmony on budget figures, Castle asserted that the two factions do agree on numerous process issues — such as a line-item veto proposal and the inclusion of an emergency fund for natural disasters in the fiscal 2007 budget — potentially giving those lawmakers greater influence on the budget.

"When it comes to budget process we're pretty much in agreement with one another," he said. RSC Chairman Mike Pence (Ind.) could not be reached by press time.

"Now you're dealing with both factions of the party who are willing to cast 'no' votes and aren't always going to be cooperative," Castle said. "When you do that it just doubles your strength."

Cheney Hits His Mark At Correspondents' Salute To Congress (WP)

By Peter Carlson

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

"I feel very comfortable up here," Dick Cheney said as he stood at the podium at the 62nd annual Radio & Television Correspondents' Association dinner last night at the Hilton Washington.

"The lighting could be better, but I can still see the whites of your eyes," the sometime quail hunter joked.

The vice president was the featured speaker at the event, and he brought along a comic slideshow. He was pretty funny, and he seemed to be having a good time. Several times he even smiled, sort of.

"I know how to have fun," he said. "I'm a real party animal."

That got a laugh.

"This picture shows me at my birthday bash, when I felt myself almost losing control," he said. And, presto, on the screen popped up a picture of a room crowded with revelers and, at the center, Cheney, sitting and poring over a stack of documents.

And so it went. There were pictures of Cheney with a rifle, Cheney on a Segway, Cheney with his dogs.

The theme of the dinner was "A Salute to Congress," which is kind of refreshing, don't you think?

After Tom DeLay's indictment and Duke Cunningham's guilty plea and Jack Abramoff's sentencing, most of the salutes Congress sees these days are the kind that feature an extended middle finger.

Does Congress deserve a salute?

"Half of it does," said Howard Dean, the Democratic Party chairman.

That would be the Democratic half, which, to be purely technical about it, would be a little less than half.

But Dean swears that's going to get bigger soon. "We have a message that works and we're getting it out," he said. Then he touted a speech earlier in the day by Democratic congressional leaders Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi. "The president cleverly changed his speech time to step on it," Dean complained. "The president changed his speech from 12 to 1, when they were speaking."

About 2,000 people showed up for the "Salute," about half of them men, which meant the ballroom was filled with about 1,000 guys in tuxedos and black ties. Only one was wearing shorts with white socks and white tennis shoes. That was Eddie Favre.

"You're wearing shorts!" said Kristi King, a WTOP reporter who was wearing a green dress. "Are you a sports guy? Or are you an eccentric?"

"I'm a lunatic," said Favre. Then he smiled. "I'm a mayor."

He's the mayor of Bay St. Louis, Miss., which was pretty much obliterated by Hurricane Katrina last summer. When Favre's house was destroyed, he escaped with only the clothes he was wearing -- shorts, a shirt and a pair of flip-flops. He vowed then that he wouldn't wear long pants again until his city was rebuilt.

"Now it's become a symbol of need," he said. "We've still got a job to do, and when the job is done, we'll put on long pants."

Favre, 51, is a CPA and a distant cousin of Green Bay Packers quarterback Bret Favre. He says he has met twice with President Bush while wearing his shorts.

"It got talked about on the Letterman show," he said. "He mentioned this yoyo with short pants who met the president."

At the dinner, Favre was a guest of CNN reporter Kathleen Koch, who had done a story on him back in February.

"It was pretty brisk in Mississippi in February," she said. "But Eddie has plenty of personal insulation, so he managed to stay warm."

She was referring to Favre's impressive potbelly, but Favre said it's not his fat that keeps him warm.

"It's the tequila."

Chaplains Group Opposes Prayer Order (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

An association that represents more than 70 percent of the chaplains in the U.S. military, including many evangelical Christians, is opposing a demand by conservatives in Congress for a presidential order guaranteeing the right of chaplains to pray in the name of Jesus.

The rising calls for an executive order are based on "confusion and misinformation," because Christian chaplains routinely pray in the name of Jesus, in public, thousands of times a week in military chapels around the world, said the Rev. Herman Keizer Jr., chairman of the National Conference on Ministry to the Armed Forces.

"This has been portrayed as though chaplains are not allowed to pray in Jesus's name, without any distinction between what they do all the time in worship services and what they do occasionally, in ceremonial settings where attendance is mandatory," Keizer said.

Known by the initials NCMAF, Keizer's group is a private, 40-year-old association of more than 60 Christian, Jewish and Muslim denominations. It says it represents 5,430 of the 7,620 chaplains in the armed forces.

The calls for an executive order to protect the right to pray in Jesus's name have originated in large part from a rival association, the International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers. Formed two years ago, it says it represents about 800 chaplains, exclusively from evangelical Christian churches.

The Rev. Billy Baugham, executive director of ICECE, said he was surprised by NCMAF's stand.

"It will just lead more evangelicals to leave them and join us," he said.

Prodded by complaints from ICECE, 74 members of Congress signed a letter to President Bush last fall saying that "it has come to our attention that in all branches of the military it is becoming increasingly difficult for Christian chaplains to use the name of Jesus when praying."

In December, Rep. Walter B. Jones (R-N.C.) and three other congressmen unveiled a supporting petition that has since swelled to more than 200,000 signatures. Calls for congressional hearings and an executive order have become a staple on religious radio and television broadcasts, generating protests of White House inaction by conservative Christians, who are usually strong supporters of Bush.

In a letter this month to the Senate Armed Services Committee, Keizer said NCMAF believes that an executive order is unnecessary because the military is "now effectively addressing the current religious concerns."

Keizer, a minister in the Christian Reformed Church of North America, a conservative Protestant denomination, retired in 2002 after 34 years as an Army chaplain. He said the armed services are gradually rolling out guidelines that set a path between "those who don't want any religion practiced in the military, and those who want religion practiced without any limits in the military." An executive order "would just precipitate more litigation," he said.

In a Feb. 21 instruction to commanders, the secretary of the Navy distinguished between prayers given by chaplains at "divine worship services" -- on which there are no restrictions -- and those delivered at "command functions" that people of many faiths are encouraged or required to attend.

"Absent extraordinary circumstances," any religious elements in a command ceremony "should be nonsectarian," it said. Air Force guidelines issued a few weeks earlier made essentially the same distinction, calling for "non-denominational, inclusive prayer" or a moment of silence at military ceremonies.

Keizer said NCMAF sees nothing wrong with a commander asking a chaplain to offer nonsectarian prayers at such events, as long as the chaplain can decline to participate, with no repercussions.

But Baugham said evangelical chaplains must represent the church that endorses them for military duty, and "they are not authorized to give nonsectarian prayers." He also said he does not believe that chaplains are truly free to pray as they wish in worship services.

"There are chaplains who get their knuckles rapped pretty hard, and we have documentation of this, for praying in Jesus's name in chapels," he said.

Pension-Overhaul Talks Stall, Raising Concern Over Firms' Cost (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Negotiations to reconcile differences in federal pension-overhaul legislation have stalled, raising questions about whether delays will increase the financial burden of companies with pension-plan contributions due soon.

DOJ_NMG_0024213

Sen. Mike Enzi, chairman of the conference committee that is working on a compromise version of measures passed by the House and Senate, had set April 7 as a target for completing a combined bill.

To give the talks some urgency, the Wyoming Republican has said the final bill should be completed before many companies must make contributions to their traditional defined-benefit pension plans on April 15. The date was described as significant because it's been argued that some companies with underfunded plans could face higher-than-expected contributions because the measure for calculating payments is reverting back to the 30-year Treasury bond yield.

For the past two years, companies had been able to use a more favorable blend of corporate bonds to calculate pension-plan contributions. That temporary provision expired Dec. 31, and the 30-year Treasury bond yield will have to be used unless a new funding rate proposed in the pension legislation is approved.

But a spokesman for the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal insurer of traditional company pension plans, says the Treasury bond rate won't apply to most plans until April 15, 2007. A few plans with unusual fiscal years could be affected this fall, he said.

Major airlines are pushing hard for quick approval of legislation, which currently includes a special provision that allows airlines 20 years to pay up their deeply underfunded pension plans. But aides to conference committee members now believe a final bill won't be completed until at least late May.

Senate Approves Lobbying Limits By Wide Margin (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — The Senate on Wednesday overwhelmingly passed the first major restrictions on lobbying in more than a decade, banning lobbyists from giving gifts and meals to lawmakers and tightening rules for pet projects known as earmarks.

But critics called the bipartisan measure weak, and some lawmakers who led the effort for tighter restrictions voted against it.

The bill would require lobbyists to file more public reports about their activities in a searchable Internet database, would demand that lawmakers receive advance approval for trips paid with private money and would bar former lawmakers and senior aides from lobbying Congress for two years.

The vote, 90 to 8, was taken hours after Jack Abramoff, whose lobbying activities prompted a federal criminal investigation into corruption here and calls for a crackdown on influence peddling, was sentenced in Miami to nearly six years in prison for his role in the fraudulent purchase of a cruise line.

Mr. Abramoff, who said in a brief court appearance Wednesday that he was "profoundly remorseful," is cooperating in a broader investigation that is scrutinizing members of Congress, among others, and has provided Democrats an opening to attack Republicans on ethics grounds.

Mr. Abramoff's wining and dining, featuring tales of lavish meals at his restaurant here and laundered money that paid for golf trips to Scotland, have helped sour the public on Congress, driving lawmakers' approval ratings to historic lows in this election year.

When Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to charges of corruption in January and agreed to tell what he knows to federal prosecutors, Republicans and Democrats called for broad changes in the way the thousands of registered lobbyists do business.

"There's a sign that's now up in front of the Capitol," Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, a chief Democratic author of the measure, said after the vote. "It says 'Not for Sale.' "

But Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican who has long pressed for tougher laws on lobbying, called the bill "very, very weak."

The measure would not ban private travel, as some members have urged. Nor would it rein in lawmakers' ability to fly on corporate jets at heavily discounted rates, a practice that gives precious access to lobbyists, who often go along for the trip.

The measure would not do away with earmarks, though it would make it more difficult for lawmakers to insert the pet projects quietly into bills at lobbyists' behest. And the Senate overwhelmingly rejected, 30 to 67, a move to create an independent ethics office to investigate accusations of abuse.

The lobbying debate now moves to the House, where Republican leaders are backing a proposal that would temporarily ban privately financed trips. Their approach would also require lobbyists to disclose meals and gifts to lawmakers, and it would require members of Congress to disclose when they earmark money for the specific projects that critics deride as pork-barrel spending.

House Republicans are split over the plan, and it is not clear whether the House and Senate will be able to agree on a measure this year.

DOJ_NMG_0024214

Leaders of both parties, as well as the architects of the Senate bill, hailed its bipartisan passage at a time Republicans and Democrats rarely work together.

"Congress stepped up in a big way," the Republicans' point man on lobbying changes, Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, said. "This is a much tougher bill than anyone would have anticipated when we started this process."

Some of the most highly visible advocates of overhauling laws on lobbying disagreed. Senators McCain and Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, who joined forces in the lobbying debate and then had a public dispute over it, were among those voting against the bill, as was Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin.

Mr. McCain predicted that there would be more indictments in the Abramoff case, and added, "I think we will be revisiting this issue."

Another senator who voted against the bill, Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, said his colleagues would suffer at the polls for failing to cut back on lobbyists' influence by eliminating the earmarks.

"You can wash the outside of the cup all you want," Mr. Coburn said. "If the inside is still unclean, you're going to have the same problems."

The other senators who voted against the bill were John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts; and three Republicans, James Inhofe of Oklahoma and Jim DeMint and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. Senators Robert C. Byrd and John D. Rockefeller IV, both Democrats of West Virginia, did not vote.

The bill does little to break the link between lobbyists and lawmakers' money-raising machines, because senators decided that those issues related to campaign finance, not lobbying. As a result, the bill steers clear of regulating the fund-raising activities of lobbyists, some of whom help run political action committees of the same lawmakers they hope to influence.

In that respect, Mr. Dodd said, the bill does not address "true meaningful campaign finance reform that breaks the link between the legislative favor seekers and the free flow of special interest private money."

Government watchdog groups agreed.

"This bill is not going to cut it and it's not going to fool the public," Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, an advocacy group, said. "The Senate was looking inward today."

With the midterm elections looming, Republican leaders in both chambers have been eager to pass a lobbying bill well before November to demonstrate that they are serious about cleaning up business in the Capitol.

Some lawmakers in tough re-election fights, like Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, wondered whether the measure would help.

"I don't know," Mr. DeWine said. "People are not really talking to me directly about lobbying. I think they're concerned about some of the quote scandal, but I don't have anybody come up to me and say there's a lobbying problem. It doesn't get that specific."

The Senate considered an independent Office of Public Integrity to investigate accusations of ethics abuses. But the measure, proposed by Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, drew support from just 30 senators on Tuesday.

Ms. Collins said Wednesday that she was disappointed.

"The public," she said, "does not trust a system where we set our own rules, we're our own advisers, we're our own investigators, we're our own prosecutors, we're our own judges, and we're our own jurors."

Senate Passes Lobby Reforms (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

The Senate on Wednesday overwhelmingly approved the first overhaul of lobbying laws in a decade, sending to the House an issue that has been looming over Congress since the beginning of the year.

Despite the bill's 90-8 passage, several Senators, including the measure's sponsors, acknowledged that the bill could have gone further. In fact, the final package was assailed by the Senate's most vocal reform advocates, who called it too weak.

Voting against the bill were Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), James Inhofe (R-Okla.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.).

McCain, who late last year introduced what became the framework for the bill, called it "very weak" in its final form. The Wednesday sentencing of former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, whose misdeeds inspired the reform efforts, offered a stark counterpoint for some of the bill's nay-sayers.

"Given that Mr. Abramoff just got five years in the pokey, the notion that this is the best we can do doesn't make any sense," said Obama, the Democratic point man on the lobbying issue.

DOJ_NMG_0024215

Outside watchdog groups likewise heaped criticism on the measure. A coalition of reform groups — including Common Cause, Public Citizen and Democracy 21 — issued the Senate a report card on the performance, giving it three Fs and two Cs. The chamber's best grade, a B, came for the bill's new disclosure requirements for lobbyists.

"It is not a report card that any child would like to take home to their parents," the groups said in a statement.

Bill sponsors acknowledged that it was far from perfect, but they pointed to what they called its far-reaching provisions as evidence that it would restore public confidence in the integrity of the legislative process.

"There is now a sign up in front of the Capitol that says, 'Not for sale,'" Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) said.

Action now moves to the House, where five committees with jurisdiction over parts of the bill are expected to start marking up the measure next week.

House Republicans on Wednesday signaled their intention to deal separately with a proposal to rein in donations to 527 groups. That decision heads off what could have been a major conference committee showdown. Democrats, who have more to lose from a 527 crackdown, have argued that the inclusion of such reforms would be little more than an attempt by the GOP to gain partisan advantage.

The changes will become official only upon passage by the House and the signature of the president. Provisions affecting just the House or the Senate could, in theory, be amended during a conference committee, but that is considered unlikely.

Despite the criticism of the Senate bill, Senators did act on Wednesday to adopt a number of amendments aimed at strengthening the bill. Among them was a provision to add transparency to the multimillion-dollar business of representing foreign governments in Washington, D.C. The package now calls for the Department of Justice to create a free, online database that compiles disclosure forms by lobbyists representing foreign governments.

The bill already had included several provisions to restrict and regulate interaction between Congress and K Street, and to require greater transparency from both camps.

The package bans all gifts and meals from lobbyists. It requires lawmakers to receive preapproval from the Ethics Committee before taking privately funded trips and to disclose details of the trips afterwards. It tightens revolving-door restrictions for former lawmakers and staffers-turned-lobbyists, while ending floor privileges for former Senators working on K Street.

The bill bans efforts by lawmakers, such as the Republicans' controversial K Street Project, to influence the hiring decisions of private sector groups. And it includes new disclosure requirements for grass-roots lobbying campaigns.

In addition, the package would add transparency to the earmarking process. It would make it out of order for the Senate to take up any piece of legislation unless lawmakers were provided with a list of every earmark contained in the measure, its sponsor and an explanation of its purposes a full day before consideration.

Nevertheless, several Senators hoping for tougher reforms bemoaned that the bill would not create an independent office to oversee enforcement with lobbying rules, or require lawmakers to pay charter rates when flying on corporate jets, or give them more options to challenge earmarks in bills.

Proposals to add those items to the bill were either rejected outright this week, or shunted aside when Senators voted to limit debate on the measure.

Before the bill's passage, McCain said he remained optimistic that the next installments of the unfolding ethics scandals could renew interest in further reforms.

"The good news is I think there will be more indictments," he said. "We will revisit the issue."

Just before approving the package on Wednesday, Senators sidelined an amendment by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) that would have required sponsors of earmarks to federal entities be identified.

Earlier, Senators voted down a proposal by Feingold to close what he called a major loophole in the measure's gift ban.

That provision forbids registered lobbyists from offering meals, sports tickets, and other freebies to lawmakers and staffers. But Feingold argued that its wording is narrow enough to allow lobbyists to continue wining and dining Capitol Hill allies, as long as another company employee who's not formally lobbying, such as a secretary, comes along to pick up the tab.

Feingold's measure would have banned gifts from anyone working for a company that employed registered lobbyists. Feingold's opponents on the issue said his proposal went too far, roping in millions of people who could be subject to a $100,000 fine if they unknowingly broke the rule.

Among proposals dropped on Wednesday for being nongermane was one from Obama to strengthen revolving-door protections. The plan would have added a ban on any behind-the-scenes work to the current prohibition on direct lobbying by those who have recently left the Hill.

Another dropped amendment, offered by Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), appeared tailored to recent revelations about how associates of Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) set up a charity that provided personal and political gain. Ed Buckham, a former chief of staff to DeLay, and his wife raked in more than $1 million for their work with the U. S. Family Network, a nonprofit nominally established to further a pro-family agenda but used more often for political ends, according to a recent Washington Post report.

Baucus' proposal would have banned lawmakers and their relatives from being on a charity payroll; prohibit anyone working for a Member's campaign or political action committee from also receiving money from a charity; and forbid charities from covering travel expenses for lawmakers, if those trips also involve campaign fundraising.

Limited Ethics Bill Approved As Lobbyist Gets Prison Time (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted Wednesday to force greater disclosure of how lobbyists sway lawmakers, but stopped short of banning some major tools of the influence trade.

The action came as Jack Abramoff, the ex-lobbyist who has come to symbolize excessive influence, was sentenced to prison in Miami on conspiracy and fraud charges. His activities helped spark the Senate bill, which watchdog groups criticized as too weak. (Related: Abramoff facing prison | Video | Plea agreement)

"It's mostly window dressing," said Chellie Pingree, president of Common Cause. "I don't think this will pass the straight-face test."

Supporters said the bill, while not perfect, would help restore public confidence. "There's a sign now up in front of the Capitol that says, 'Not for sale,' " said Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn.

While the Senate debated lobbying, U.S. District Judge Paul Huck sentenced Abramoff to a term of five years and 10 months. That is the minimum under sentencing guidelines for the charges, which stem from a deal to buy a fleet of casino ships. Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January, said he was "much chastened and profoundly remorseful."

Abramoff also faces sentencing as early as June on his Washington lobbying activities, which included plying members of Congress and other government officials with meals, trips and campaign contributions to influence policy. He is cooperating in the federal probe of influence peddling.

The scandal has prompted a scramble on Capitol Hill to tighten the rules governing the way lobbyists and lawmakers interact. The Senate bill passed on a vote of 90-8.

Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., Barack Obama, D-Ill., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis. — all leading voices for greater change — voted against it.

The measure would ban gifts, including meals, for lawmakers and their staffs from registered lobbyists. Feingold said that leaves a "huge loophole" that would allow lawmakers to dine with a lobbyist and have the lobbyist's employer pick up the tab. His effort to tighten the rule failed, 68-30.

The bill focuses more on disclosure than on banning behavior. Lobbyists would be required to file reports quarterly instead of semiannually. For the first time, lobbyists would have to include details about their campaign contributions and fundraising. They would have to disclose trips they provide for government officials, and contributions to charities linked to lawmakers.

Members of Congress also would have to get approval from the ethics committee for fact-finding trips funded by private sources and would have to disclose trips they take aboard corporate or other private planes. The measure does not change how much lawmakers would reimburse aircraft owners: They pay the equivalent of first-class airfare, which is a fraction of the market value for such flights.

Greater disclosure also would be required of lawmakers' pet spending provisions, known as "earmarks," which are often inserted into legislation at the last minute with little scrutiny. Abramoff referred to the congressional spending committees, which produce many earmarks, as "the favor factory."

The measure also would double, to two years, the "cooling-off period" in which members of Congress and top aides who leave for lobbying jobs would be barred from trying to influence their former colleagues.

Legislation to restrict lobbyist-lawmaker relations also is pending in the House, where five committees are reviewing a draft bill.

Senate Passes Election-Year Ethics Package (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, March 29, 2006

The Senate passed an election-year ethics package Wednesday that was heavy on disclosing lawmaker contacts with lobbyists but light on outright prohibitions — and with no independent office to police it all.

The legislation would bar lawmakers from accepting gifts or meals from lobbyists or moving quickly to lobbying jobs after retiring. But members of Congress could still use corporate jets for the price of a first-class ticket and accept free lodging, travel and meals from non-lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0024217

"Trust is the foundation of our democratic government," Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said moments before the Senate voted 90-8 for the first lobbying overhaul bill in a decade. "With the public opinion of Congress at an all-time low, we have to do a better job of retaining that trust and that confidence."

The vote came just hours after a U.S. District judge in Miami sentenced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, whose influence-peddling activities spawned the Senate action, to five years and 10 months in prison on conspiracy and wire fraud charges.

The legislation also seeks to restrain earmarks, those thousands of special projects that make their way into legislation. Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., went to prison this year after using the earmark process to help defense contractors who had given him bribes.

The House is now working on its version of the bill, which also is expected to emphasize greater disclosure of lobbying activities. House leaders are also pushing for a provision to restrict political groups that are permitted to accept donations of unlimited size. Such groups have tended to favor Democrats, and Senate Democrats vowed to keep that out of the final bill.

Republicans and Democrats, in a rare show of bipartisanship, defended the Senate bill against critics who said it didn't go far enough. It's a "measured response to this scandal," said Sen. Christopher Dodd (news, bio, voting record), D-Conn., "ensuring that special interests cannot operate under a cloak of darkness."

The bill bans lobbyists from giving gifts or meals to lawmakers, and requires lobbyists to file quarterly electronic reports of their activities, up from the current two times a year.

Lobbyists must also disclose their contributions to officeholders and political fundraisers and their "grass-roots" lobbying activities — helping clients to encourage the general public, through mass mailings or ads, to contact federal officials.

Senators must get pre-clearance from the ethics committee before embarking on privately funded trips and, when accepting rides on corporate jets, must reveal who was on board.

Lawmakers and other senior executive branch officials must wait two years, up from the current one, before accepting jobs as lobbyists trying to influence the institution where they formerly served.

But lawmakers and clean government groups who saw the scandals as a golden opportunity to enact far-reaching reform expressed disappointment in the final product. The sponsors turned back efforts to ban privately funded trips or force lawmakers traveling by corporate jets to pay more expensive charter rates, rather than the first-class ticket prices they now pay.

And the Senate on Tuesday rejected an amendment that would have created an Office of Public Integrity to carry out investigations of charges of ethics violations in the Senate.

"I believe this bill was crippled without it," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen. "It's not a law without an enforcement system." Supporters of an independent office argued that the congressional ethics committees, particularly in the highly partisan House, have proved incapable of investigating their own members.

The legislation also takes several steps to make Senate procedures more open. Senators would have to identify the source and purpose of earmarks, the thousands of special projects that find their way into larger bills. And a procedure is set up where lawmakers could strip out earmarks that are not in original bills but are later attached to House-Senate conference reports.

Several senators, led by John Ensign, R-Nev., and John McCain, R-Ariz., said the procedure for eliminating earmarks was too vague, and tried unsuccessfully to extend the definition to include federal as well as nonfederal projects.

Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense said 40 percent of the estimated 15,000 earmarks that were inserted in legislation last year were federal in nature.

The Senate also decided to end the practice of secret "holds," where a single senator can block action on a bill or nomination without revealing that he is the source of the delay.

The eight senators voting against the measure were Democrats Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Barack Obama of Illinois and Republicans Tom Coburn and James Inhofe of Oklahoma, Jim DeMint and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona. Not voting were West Virginia Democrats Robert Byrd and John D. Rockefeller.

The Senate lobbying reform bill is S. 2349.

Senate Adopts Changes In Lobbying And Ethics Rules (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate, prodded by influence-peddling scandals that have given Congress a black eye, voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to deny senators gifts and meals from lobbyists and to tighten lobbyist reporting requirements.

DOJ_NMG_0024218

In a 90-8 vote, senators also restricted, but didn't eliminate, their ability to insert the special-interest provisions, or "earmarks," that find their way into massive spending bills.

Sponsors of the bipartisan legislation praised it for making Senate business more transparent and less susceptible to backroom deals and high-priced wining and dining.

But it has no enforcement mechanism, and its limits on special-interest "earmarks" have a loophole that would exclude millions in targeted spending from its restrictions.

The House of Representatives has yet to act. The Senate could impose several of the provisions, including the ban on gifts and meals, on itself later if the House fails to enact the legislation.

The changes came after two major corruption cases involving lobbyists, contractors and members of Congress. One former lawmaker, Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was sentenced this month to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors in exchange for favors inserted into Pentagon spending bills.

The Senate vote occurred the same day that disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced to nearly six years in prison for his role in the fraudulent purchase of a fleet of casino cruise ships. He awaits sentencing on his guilty plea to corruption charges for influencing legislation on Indian gaming and other matters. He's also cooperating with federal prosecutors investigating official corruption.

"In the past year, Americans have been shocked and some certainly disgusted by revelations of corruption to our system," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "It has shaken public confidence in the Congress and our entire federal government."

Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., said the legislation was "a much tougher bill than I think anyone could have anticipated when we started this process."

Critics said the bill fell short by keeping enforcement in the hands of the Senate Ethics Committee, a panel that operates largely in secret. The Senate on Tuesday overwhelmingly defeated a proposal to create an independent office of public integrity to investigate ethics complaints against lawmakers.

"This is nothing to write home about," said Fred Wertheimer, the president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group. "The argument they seemed to make was `trust us.'"

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said the legislation should eliminate earmarks, which he said were at the root of the scandals. Critics said the bill still would've allowed Cunningham to funnel money to Pentagon contractors unnoticed.

"The good news is there'll be more indictments and we'll be revisiting this issue, if not this year, then next year," McCain said.

The measure's main provisions:

-All gifts and meals from lobbyists for lawmakers or their staffs would be prohibited. Under existing rules, senators can accept gifts or meals valued up to $50, a threshold that created an eruption of $49.99 luncheon specials at some top Washington restaurants.

-Lawmakers would be prohibited from lobbying Congress for two years after leaving office. The current limit is one year. Senior congressional staffers would be prohibited from such lobbying for one year.

-Lobbyists would have to file quarterly reports identifying their lobbying activity. Current law requires semi-annual reports. They also would have to disclose more information about themselves, including any previous positions in the legislative or executive branches of government.

-No lawmaker's staff could have "official contact" with any lobbyist who's a member of the lawmaker's immediate family. A number of leading lawmakers have had spouses or children working as lobbyists in Washington, including assistant House Republican leader Roy Blunt, R-Mo., and Reid.

-Lawmakers no longer could negotiate their private employment while still in office. They also couldn't influence the hiring practices of lobbying shops by threatening to punish lobbyists legislatively. The provision is designed to banish the "K Street Project," named after lobbying row in Washington, whereby Republicans attempted to inject more Republicans into lobbying firms.

-Some earmarks would have to be made public at least 24 hours before a bill is considered on the Senate floor. Provisions added during House-Senate negotiations that hadn't been voted on earlier by either chamber would be removed if challenged unless 60 senators vote for them.

Still, those restrictions would apply only to spending on "nonfederal" projects, ones for local or state government or other nonfederal administrators, such as a museum or Indian tribe. Critics argued that the Senate should ban earmarks altogether.

"You can wash the outside of the cup all you want," said Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla. "If the inside is still unclean you're going to have the same problems. Earmarks are the gateway drug for overspending and fiscal mismanagement."

Senate Toughens Lobbying Rules (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

The Senate yesterday overwhelmingly passed tough restrictions on lobbyists, hoping to send a message that the public can trust legislators in Washington despite recent scandals suggesting otherwise.

Senators voted 90-8 to pass the bipartisan Legislative Transparency and Accountability Act.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd said the downfall of lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's guilty plea and prison sentence on bribery charges "rocked the House" and created a climate of "disillusionment and distrust." The corruption scandals were also the impetus to make a change, the Connecticut Democrat said.

"There is a sign that now is up in front of the Capitol here that says 'not for sale,' " he said.

The vote took place as members got the news that Abramoff was sentenced yesterday to nearly six years in prison.

The Senate now must compromise with the House, which starts work today on its own lobbying-reform plan. If the Senate version becomes law, gone would be the typical practice of lobbyists treating lawmakers to meals at swanky restaurants. Members and their staffers would be required to take an ethics training course.

"With the public's opinion of Congress at an all-time low, we have to do a better job at regaining that trust and that confidence," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. He also said he was pleased the measure creates a process to scrutinize pork-barrel spending proposals.

The Abramoff scandal has undercut the trust that is essential to democracy, said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat.

It created the impression that "in Washington, results go too often to the highest bidder, not to the greatest public good," he said. "That is not the truth, but this legislation upends that perception."

The bill creates a series of restrictions and tightens some rules already imposed on members and lobbyists.

Among the highlights is a requirement that members need preapproval for their travel through the ethics committee, and the banning of former legislators from the chamber floor. It extends the "cooling-off" period for members who retire to become lobbyists, making them wait two years before they can lobby former colleagues.

Under the measure, lobbyists would be required to file public quarterly reports on the Internet disclosing their activities and expenditures. The reports will be subject to audit. Violating the new lobbying rules could result in a maximum fine of $100,000, double what it is now.

"I think disclosure is going to make a big difference," said Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican, noting that she worries the public no longer trusts Congress to make decisions untainted by special interests.

Several senators said the measure was not perfect, and were irritated that most of the 88 suggested amendments to the bill were killed without debate.

Sen. Russell D. Feingold sought to define a lobbyist as anyone employed by a company that has a registered lobbyist on the payroll, but the Wisconsin Democrat's amendment was soundly rejected yesterday.

He argued the amendment would close a loophole allowing lobbyists to skirt the meals ban, but critics said the amendment was too broad.

Mr. Feingold balked at opponents and said if they had a problem with it, they could pay for their own meals. He ultimately voted against the final passage of the bill yesterday.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, also opposed the bill, saying it "does little" to change the culture that allowed Abramoff to abuse the system.

"The Senate has missed a once-in-a-decade opportunity to clean up the way we do business in Washington," he said.

Other senators opposing the bill were John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, and Republicans Tom Coburn and James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, Jim DeMint and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John McCain of Arizona.

Senate Approves Lobbying-Disclosure Legislation (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate approved legislation that mandates far greater disclosure of lobbying activities but preserves two favorite business-financed travel perks for lawmakers.

The action came as Speaker Dennis Hastert signaled that the House next week will take up a related measure to limit the flow of money to so-called 527 political groups, which sprang up in the last presidential election. Factions in both parties employed 527s to get around campaign-finance rules and spend as much as $420 million, largely for advertising and grassroots get-out-the-vote efforts in 2004.

The Senate lobbying bill, adopted 90-8, was greeted by Bronx cheers from public-interest groups after the recent scandals that have tarnished Congress. But the new disclosure requirements are significant and could have a greater impact than critics expect because of the abundance of data that would have to be filed into a central repository available on the Internet.

For the first time, disclosure is required of paid grass-roots lobbying campaigns that use mass mailings and phone banks to influence lawmakers. Senators would be prohibited from accepting meals or gifts, such as sporting-event tickets, from lobbyists. And members who leave the Senate to become lobbyists themselves would have to wait two years -- twice the current "cooling off" period -- before returning to lobby their former colleagues.

"This legislation upends the status quo," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D., Conn.).

But a coalition of liberal reform groups, such as Public Citizen and Democracy 21, said the bill failed to correct the abusive use of corporate jets and privately financed travel by lobbyists and lawmakers. And the conservative Taxpayers for Common Sense said senators "blew up" their chance to curb the earmarking of funds for special interests.

Eager to shut down debate, the Senate leadership had won a procedural motion late Tuesday that protected senators from having to vote on whether they should be required to pay more for flights on corporate aircraft. And in a final skirmish yesterday, the Senate voted 57-41 to kill an effort to broaden the definition of what constitutes an earmark under the bill.

As adopted, the bill defines an earmark as a provision that identifies a "nonfederal" entity to receive assistance, but critics argued that this effectively exempts attempts to steer money to military services to benefit favored defense contractors, for example.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) said this constituted "nitpicking" and imposed too great a burden on his panel to have to identify every change within the administration's budget.

But Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) argued that military contracts have been one of the areas of greatest abuse -- as seen in the bribery case of former California Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a previous member of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee who was sentenced to prison this month after reaching a plea deal with prosecutors.

"Ripping off the taxpayers of tens, if not hundreds of millions of dollars," Mr. McCain said. "That's why this amendment is not nitpicking."

Senate Passes Lobbying Reform Bill, 90-8 (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 30, 2006

The Senate passed a lobbying-reform measure yesterday, clearing the first hurdle to enacting legislation aimed at responding to a spate of influence-peddling scandals.

The bill, which passed 90-8, would prohibit lawmakers from accepting gifts – including meals – from lobbyists, require greater disclosure of lobbying activities and allow senators to strike new earmarks from conference reports. The latter proposal would give rank-and-file lawmakers a powerful new weapon to combat the late insertion of new proposals and strengthen the Senate in its negotiations with the House.

“Today’s passage of lobbying reform is an important step forward in bringing more transparency and accountability to our government while strengthening America’s trust and confidence in our public officials,” Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said.

Senate Approves Limits On High-Profile Lobbying (LAT)

By Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted Wednesday to impose new rules to rein in the clout wielded by lobbyists on Capitol Hill, but critics charged the measure would fall short of significantly curbing the influence peddling.

The bill, which passed 90 to 8, aims to eliminate some of the more high-profile connections between lobbyists and lawmakers. It would end the common practice of lobbyists buying meals for senators or providing gifts — such as tickets to sporting events — that many lawmakers said fed the public perception that Congress was swayed by these favors.

"What we're saying here is that there's a sign that now is up in front of the Capitol," said Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), one of the bill's co-authors. "It says: 'Not for Sale.' "

The measure also would for the first time enable senators to challenge funding of some special projects often tucked into bills at the behest of lobbyists. Still, many of these so-called earmarks that are attached each year to spending bills would remain exempt from challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0024221

Other changes would require lobbyists to more frequently report their dealings with lawmakers and their contributions to their campaigns, filing the information to a database searchable online by the public.

Also, former members of Congress and senior aides would have to wait two years instead of one before lobbying their onetime colleagues. And senators could no longer put a secret "hold" on legislation or nominations, a behind-the-scenes move that blocks action on such matters.

Senators who pushed for more sweeping changes said the measure would leave much of lobbyists' power intact. For instance, the bill contains no limits on lobbyists' ability to rely on their contacts and clients to generate large campaign contributions.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who voted against the bill, said that although some lawmakers viewed the bill's passage as "a major feat," he considered its provisions "very, very weak."

McCain spoke after votes were blocked on amendments he offered, including one that would have required senators to pay charter rates when they traveled on corporate jets. The lawmakers usually pay much less.

Others complained that the bill would not ban lawmakers' travel paid for by private groups and would not create an independent office of public integrity to investigate senators or staffers accused of unethical conduct.

"What ethics bill?" Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) said of the measure, which he opposed.

McCain and Coburn attacked the bill for not giving senators broader power to question earmarks. For instance, challenges could only be lodged against projects added during House-Senate negotiations over a final spending measure. Many earmarks are put into bills in each chamber before those negotiations.

Still, supporters said the Senate's revised rules would put some distance between lobbyists and lawmakers and make it easier for the public to track their links.

"This is not popular stuff [in the bill], but it's the right thing to do," said Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.). "This legislation upends the status quo with regard to oversight of the … relationship between lobbyists and members of Congress."

California's senators, Democrats Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, were among those voting for the bill.

The Senate's measure also lays down a marker for the House, which is studying changes to its guidelines for dealing with lobbyists.

The two chambers do not have to adopt the same rules, but their changes must be included in a single bill that would require President Bush's signature to become law.

Backers of the Senate bill praised its passage as a step toward restoring Congress' battered reputation among many voters before the November elections.

Public opinion of the House and Senate has dropped in nationwide polls since scandals involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe) and lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Late last year, Cunningham pleaded guilty to accepting bribes from defense contractors in return for steering their way federal projects worth millions of dollars. He resigned from office and this month was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Abramoff, who lavished food, drink and luxury trips on some lawmakers and their staff and steered hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign donations to House members and senators, pleaded guilty in January to several corruption charges. He is awaiting sentencing in that case. In a separate case, he was sentenced Wednesday in Florida to about six years in prison on charges of wire fraud and conspiracy.

The coincidence did not go unnoticed as the Senate debated its lobbying measure.

"I think it is significant that this bill passed on the day that [Abramoff] received his first prison sentence," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). "It was the scandals involving Mr. Abramoff and former Rep. Cunningham that prompted us to take a harder look at practices that, while legal, eroded public confidence" in Congress.

Collins said she believed the Senate's action would begin to restore "the bonds of trust" between lawmakers and the public.

Several government watchdog groups, however, were among the bill's critics.

"I really think that if members of the Senate think they can pass a bill that is largely window dressing and not deal with the really tough issues and then go back to the voters and convince them they have done something, they have another think coming," said Chellie Pingree, president of the citizens' lobbying group Common Cause. "This bill lacks the critical things that would really change the atmosphere of corruption in Washington."

Pingree said that although the bill would improve disclosure requirements for lobbyists, "there's very little that breaks down this nexus between lobbyists as fundraisers and sources of campaign funds, which is much of the root of what goes on that creates the scandals."

DOJ_NMG_0024222

She said her group and other watchdog organizations feared the measures approved by the Senate might be further watered down in negotiations with the House.

"The tragedy is that we were counting on the Senate to be the leaders," Pingree said.

Senate Passes Lobbying Bill (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

The Senate voted yesterday to require lobbyists to provide far more information about their dealings with lawmakers, responding to the Jack Abramoff political corruption scandal with a plan for more disclosure rather than tougher enforcement of ethics laws.

By a vote of 90 to 8, the Senate approved a bill that would also force the disclosure for the first time of indirect lobbying, such as grass-roots activities, and prevent registered lobbyists from paying for lawmakers' meals or giving them gifts such as sports tickets. Congressional leaders had promised far-ranging revisions of lobbying activities after Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials. But the legislation that emerged yesterday is less sweeping than GOP leaders envisioned.

"This legislation contains very serious reform," said Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), one of the architects of the Senate bill. Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who also wrote large portions of the measure, said the bill goes a long way toward restoring "the bonds of trust with our constituents [that have been] frayed."

However, spokesmen for government watchdog groups and several lawmakers who were active in pushing ethics rule changes expressed disappointment in the Senate's effort. "It's extremely weak," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whose lobbying and ethics plan had been hailed by Senate Republican leaders in January as the model for future legislation. He voted against the bill yesterday.

On Tuesday, the Senate rejected a bipartisan plan to create an independent investigative office designed to help the Senate's ethics committee enforce lobbying and ethics laws. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), one of the authors of the Democrats' lobbying proposals, voted against the Senate bill in part because it did not contain the office of public integrity.

Senate and House leaders will have to reconcile differences before Congress can send a final bill to the president. The House's leading ethics proposal, offered by its Republican leaders, would also broaden disclosure requirements, though not for such grass-roots activities as instigating e-mails, letters and phone calls from voters back home. The House plan would bar neither meals nor gifts.

Abramoff, the former lobbyist who bribed public officials with expensive trips, skybox fundraisers, meals and campaign donations, was sentenced yesterday to nearly six years in prison on separate fraud charges. He is cooperating with federal prosecutors, who are widely expected to pursue indictments against lawmakers, staffers and lobbyists with the help of Abramoff's testimony.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) led the charge for ethics law revisions by recommending a ban on privately funded travel and steep limitations on meals and gifts. Other top lawmakers, including Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.), pressed to curtail lawmakers' use of corporate jets among other lobbyist-provided perks.

But the momentum to pass lobbying legislation slowed as opposition to the most restrictive types of proposals grew among rank-and-file lawmakers. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) also argued in favor of increased disclosure requirements over adding new restrictions on lobbyists' interaction with lawmakers. Senior Republican aides said the House bill will probably not be ready for consideration by the full body until late April at the earliest.

Asked if the measure meets the sweeping pledges of change voiced by senior members of the House and Senate early in the year, McCain laughed. "The good news is there will be more indictments, and we will be revisiting this issue," he said.

The Senate largely avoided curtailing the behavior of lawmakers. It decided to prohibit lawmakers from accepting meals and gifts from registered lobbyists, but shelved a plan offered by Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) yesterday that would have applied that ban to companies and organizations that employ those lobbyists. The House measure would not bar meals or gifts from lobbyists or from anyone else.

Extra disclosures of many sorts are at the core of the Senate-passed bill. The measure would require lobbyists to file quarterly reports, rather than the current biannual ones, on their activities, as well as a new, annual disclosure that would detail their donations to federal candidates, officeholders and political parties. In addition, lobbyists would have to disclose all travel they arrange for lawmakers.

Lobbying reports would have to be filed electronically, including those filed by lobbyists for foreign entities, and would need to be accessible via the Internet, something that is not always possible today. In addition, the bill would mandate that senators get approval in advance from the Senate Select Committee on Ethics for any privately financed travel that they accept, but would not limit such travel otherwise. The trips and their major details would have to be disclosed rapidly, including the names of other passengers on private aircraft.

The Senate's bill would slow what has been called the revolving door between government and the K Street lobbying industry. The legislation would double to two years the time during which former lawmakers and former top executive branch officials would be prohibited from lobbying their ex-colleagues. It would also ban -- for a year after leaving their Capitol Hill jobs -- former senior congressional staffers from lobbying anyone in the chamber in which they had worked. Currently, staff members are prohibited from lobbying only their former offices during their one-year "cooling-off period."

The Senate legislation, like its companion in the House, would make it harder for lawmakers to slip into law narrowly targeted appropriations called earmarks.

Besides Obama and McCain, the other six senators voting against the measure were Democrats Russell Feingold (Wis.) and John F. Kerry (Mass.), and Republicans Tom Coburn and James M. Inhofe of Oklahoma, Jim DeMint and Lindsey O. Graham of South Carolina. Not voting were West Virginia Democrats Robert C. Byrd and John D. Rockefeller IV.

Miller Helped Free Land For A Business Partner (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, March 30, 2006

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Calif.) pushed for a provision in last year's transportation bill that allowed the city of Rialto, Calif., to shut down its airport.

By doing so, he paved the way for his business partner, Lewis Operating Corp., one of his top campaign contributors, to buy the land from the city and make plans to build Renaissance, a community consisting of 2,500 homes, parks and 80 acres of retail space on the former airport property and adjacent land.

Normally, the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) has sole authority to close airports.

"This is the first time … an airport has been closed through the legislative process," said FAA spokesman Hank Price. "We follow Congress's direction."

Miller's relationship with Lewis Operating and its president of Southern California operations, Richard Lewis, dates back more than three decades, to Miller's years as a developer of planned communities. He founded G. Miller Development Co. in his early 20s, and he and Lewis were competitors, Miller said.

Miller, 57, went on to be elected to the Diamond Bar City Council, the mayor's office, the California Assembly and Congress, beating scandal-scarred Republican Rep. Jay Kim in 1998. Just months earlier, Kim and his wife had pleaded guilty to accepting and concealing $230,000 in illegal campaign contributions.

Miller said he prides himself on his efforts to disclose his campaign contributions fully. He said he sees nothing wrong with his work to close Rialto's airport, even though it freed land that his business partner wanted to develop.

"I've known Richard Lewis for 30 years," he said. "Richard's son and my daughter went to high school together. If knowing somebody is bad, I guess that's bad."

Miller denied that his actions created a conflict of interest.

"There was no quid pro quo," he said.

But Theis Finlev, a policy advocate for Common Cause, argues that members of Congress must go out of their way to avoid using their offices to benefit private business partners directly, especially if they also are major campaign contributors.

"Even if it's legal, it's horribly unseemly," Finlev said about Miller's work to shut down the airport. "It's not something that inspires confidence in the political process, and should not happen."

This election cycle, employees of Lewis Operating including Richard Lewis and several Lewis family members have donated a combined $8,100 to Miller's campaign, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, making the company his top contributor.

Employees of Lewis Operating and members of the Lewis family have donated $19,300 to Miller's campaign committee since 1998.

Lewis Operating is also a member of the National Association of Home Builders, Miller's No. 1 contributor since he was elected. The group has donated $44,000 to Miller's campaign committee since 1998.

ACROSS DISTRICT LINES

Rialto tried for years to close the airport, arguing that it was underused and losing money.

In August 2004, the City Council passed an amendment giving the city the exclusive right to negotiate with Lewis and its partner, Hillwood Development Corp., to purchase and develop the airport land if it should become available. The council approved the prospective sale eight months later.

DOJ_NMG_0024224

But finalizing that transaction would have to wait until the city could find a way to close the airport, and the transportation bill provided it last year.

The price tag for the 450 acres of airport land will likely be tens of millions of dollars, but the purchase is still in the appraisal stage, according to Rob Steel, Rialto's redevelopment director.

"We have entered into contracts of sale with Lewis-Hillwood Rialto," Steel confirmed.

When it is sold, it will be at fair market value, which the appraiser will determine, a requirement that Miller included in his version of the provision and was in the final bill.

Lewis and Hillwood, founded and chaired by Ross Perot Jr., formed Lewis-Hillwood Rialto LLC when they became interested in the project. There is no way to know how much money the two companies would make on the deal. Lewis Operating and Hillwood officials declined to comment for the story.

Rialto is not in Miller's district but in that of nearby Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.). Miller said Baca backed his efforts to shut down the airport. Baca did not respond to requests for comment.

Other development companies besides Lewis-Hillwood tried to offer bids for the development but were told by a Rialto City Council member that Hillwood's strong ties to Washington could help the city find a way to shut down the airport. The company was already working with the FAA on developing San Bernardino airport 8.5 miles to the east, and the city thought that relationship could help influence the FAA's decision.

According to minutes from Aug. 9, 2004, City Councilman Joseph Sampson reminded other members that "based upon knowledge of Hillwood Corp. they do have extremely close ties in Washington, which provides them with inroads on what a final outcome may be in regards to how they might treat the airport."

FAA OBJECTIONS

But the FAA did not support closing Rialto airport. Since 1984, the city has taken out $15 million in federal government loans to improve the airport. Traditionally, the FAA opposes closing an airport when it has invested in it until it earns a return on the investment.

The provision in the transportation bill requires Rialto to pay back the federal government 90 percent of any unpaid portion of the federal loans it had taken out.

In an interview, Miller said he is not responsible for the final airport language in the bill because Senate conferees struck his provision from the measure. Working with Rep. Jim Oberstar (Minn.), the ranking Democrat on the transportation panel, Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) managed to insert his own language closing the airport into the final bill.

Rep. Lewis's provision relocates airport business and equipment to San Bernardino Airport, in his district.

John Scofield, a spokesman for Rep. Lewis, said there are many good reasons for closing Rialto airport, noting that both the city and the county want it closed.

"There are a lot of airports in the area, such as the San Bernardino National Airport and the Redlands airport, which are both better facilities," he said. "Because of the Santa Ana winds, the [Rialto airport] is only open half of the time anyway."

Rep. Lewis is not related to anyone at Lewis Operating Corp.

Miller, the only California Republican on the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee and a senior member of the Highways, Transit and Pipelines Subcommittee, said he helped push for the inclusion of Rep. Lewis's provision in the final version of the measure.

Employees of Lewis Operating and other members of the Lewis family also have donated $19,900 to Baca this election cycle, making the company his top contributor as well. Rep. Lewis has received $3,000 since 2000.

Before Lewis Operating joined with Hillwood on the Rialto project, Miller had not received any campaign contributions from Hillwood employees. But after Miller started working on language in the transportation bill, John Magness, senior vice president of Hillwood Investments, cut him a check for $500 dated May 12, 2005, according to Federal Election Commission records.

"I guess they were saying thank you. … I guess that's what that was," Miller said.

He said that the city of Rialto chose Lewis Operating, one of the largest real-estate developers in Southern California, for the airport job on its own.

He could not recall, however, when he discovered that Lewis Operating was seeking the airport property. Rialto contacted him about shutting down the airport because he had done business with the city years earlier before becoming a congressman, he said.

He was asked to help because Rialto's efforts to convince the FAA to shut down the airport had failed.

"The FAA doesn't want anything closed," Miller said. "I don't think the FAA has ever closed an airport. It's like pulling teeth to get them to close an airport."

He also said he does not see how he benefited from any of his business dealings with Lewis Operating Corp.

A CONTROVERSIAL PAST

Watchdog groups have criticized a number of land deals between Lewis Operating and Miller, as well as his role in helping secure other provisions in last year's $286.5 billion transportation transportation bill.

As first reported by the Los Angeles Newspaper Group, Miller helped secure $1.28 million in the bill for street improvements in front of a planned housing and retail center that he co-owned with Lewis Operating in his district.

Lewis-Diamond Bar LLC, a company formed to buy the land, is the developer. Miller owns $1 million-$5 million of the company. The other partner is Lewis Operating Corp.

The same year, Miller took out a promissory note from a subsidiary of Lewis Operating Corp., Lewis Investments, for $1 million to $5 million, according to his 2004 financial disclosure records.

The Los Angeles Newspaper Group also ran a critical story about a real-estate deal involving Miller, Lewis Operating and the Southern California city of Fontana.

In July 2005, Fontana's redevelopment agency spent $5 million to buy land from Miller without notifying the public, an apparent violation of state open-meeting laws.

Miller said that he was outraged about it and that he has since demanded that the city insert a written pledge in the sales contract to make public the sale of the last parcel he owns to the city .

Some six months earlier, Miller had bought the same land from Lewis Operating. He said he did so to avoid tax penalties on profit from a land sale to Monrovia, another Southern California city, two years before.

That profit is estimated at $10 million, according to Miller's 2003 financial disclosure record and knowledgeable sources.

He said he only made $50,000 on the sale to Fontana, barely enough to cover taxes and real-estate transaction fees.

"I needed to find property, and that property was available," he said.

NASA Denies Chief Made Formal DeLay Endorsement (HCHRON)

By SAMANTHA LEVINE

Houston Chronicle, March 30, 2006

Space agency's Griffin urged a Houston audience last week to keep lawmaker in office

WASHINGTON - Five days after NASA administrator Michael Griffin urged a Houston audience to keep U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay in office, a spokesman denied Wednesday that Griffin had made a formal campaign endorsement.

"The space program has had no better friend in its entire existence than Tom DeLay," Griffin said Friday of DeLay's legislative support of the agency. "He's still with us and we need to keep him there."

With DeLay present, Griffin spoke at the annual Space Center Rotary Club of Houston's nonprofit National Award for Space Achievement Foundation gala.

Griffin had no intention of soliciting votes for the 11-term lawmaker, NASA spokesman Dean Acosta said.

"He did not make an endorsement and will not get involved in any political campaigns," Acosta said. "If his words of thanks to Tom DeLay were misconstrued as an endorsement, then he regrets that."

'Terrific' relationshipAcosta pointed out that DeLay made a complimentary introduction speech before Griffin spoke.

"NASA is a scientific and technological agency and we work very closely with our congressional partners," Acosta said.

"Administrator Griffin and Congressman DeLay have a terrific working relationship," DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said. "They are fighting for the same goals, and that's what his comments expressed."

Flaherty said DeLay did not interpret Griffin's statements as an endorsement.

DeLay, a Republican from Sugar Land, is seeking re-election against Democrat and former congressman Nick Lampson and Libertarian Bob Smither; former Republican congressman Steve Stockman has been seeking a place on the ballot as an independent.

Lampson represented the Johnson Space Center in the U.S. House but never had the clout DeLay had when the Republican was House majority leader. The space center now is in DeLay's district.

Under the Hatch Act, executive branch employees such as Griffin are permitted to express an opinion, campaign and make speeches for or against candidates in partisan elections — when they are off-duty.

Office will investigateThe black-tie awards dinner at which Griffin made his remarks was held after regular working hours, but Griffin was representing the space agency and giving an award to a NASA employee, astronaut Eileen Collins.

Griffin's travel to Houston from Washington, D.C., for the dinner was paid by NASA rather than the Rotary Club, said event organizer Floyd Bennett of the United Space Alliance.

The independent Office of Special Counsel, which administers the Hatch Act, will investigate the matter, spokesman Loren Smith said.

DOJ_NMG_0024226

Employees who violate the Hatch Act can be removed from office, according to the Office of Special Counsel, or suspended without pay.

Determining whether Griffin was acting in an official or after-hours capacity "really is a close call," said Corey Ditslear, a political scientist at the University of North Texas.

'A little egg on his vest'But any misstep by Griffin was relatively minor, said Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at George Washington University.

"Even in this context, I am not going to get too uptight about it," Hess said. "When (officials such as Griffin) make statements that can be interpreted as political statements, the government should not be underwriting it. You just caught the fellow with a little egg on his vest, looking untidy."

DeLay has sat on the NASA spending panel since February, after formally giving up his position as majority leader. He relinquished the post last fall after he was indicted in Travis County on money-laundering charges relating to the 2002 Texas House races.

Griffin began duties as the 11th administrator of NASA on April 14, 2005, with strong support from DeLay. The lawmaker accompanied Griffin on his first official visit to the space center in May.

Democratic Plan To Beef Up U.S. Security Lacks Specifics (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sharpening their election-year message, leading Democrats on Wednesday released a plan that promised to strengthen America's security but offered few details about how they would achieve their sweeping goals.

On Iraq, the plan — echoing language recently approved by Congress — said Democrats would "ensure 2006 is a year of significant transition … with Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for securing and governing their country."

But it established no timetables, or targets, for reducing the U.S. military commitment there.

The Democrats also pledged to rebuild the military, "eliminate" terrorist leader Osama bin Laden, improve domestic security, free America from reliance on foreign oil by 2020 and pressure Iraq's feuding political factions to reach consensus on a national unity government.

The agenda "will take America in a new direction, one that is tough and smart," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said.

The plan, dubbed Real Security, is part of a Democratic effort to clarify the party's message for voters before the November midterm elections by releasing a series of policy statements. Democrats previously issued a lobbying reform plan.

By focusing on national security policies before detailing their ideas on traditional party priorities such as healthcare or education, the Democrats signaled their desire to neutralize an issue that had been President Bush's core political strength since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

But the Democratic plan provoked a coordinated flurry of counterattacks from leading Republicans.

In statements and interviews, GOP officials charged that Democrats had belied their tough talk by challenging Bush on some national security issues, including his approval of a domestic surveillance program that operates without obtaining court warrants.

"Their behavior has been totally inconsistent with what they're now promising they're going to do," Vice President Dick Cheney said in a radio interview.

The Democratic plan was released at a rally attended by dozens of the party's most prominent figures. Amplifying an increasing Democratic campaign theme, a series of speakers accused Bush of mismanaging the nation's defense and foreign policies.

"I have never seen such rank incompetence as we are seeing from the Bush administration," said Madeleine Albright, secretary of state under President Clinton.

The Democratic blueprint was released as Bush continued a heightened effort to shore up public support for his Iraqi policy.

Speaking at a Washington gathering sponsored by the Freedom House, a nonpartisan group that promotes democracy, Bush said the sectarian violence in Iraq was not the result of the U.S. invasion, but "is the legacy of Saddam Hussein."

The former Iraqi dictator, Bush argued, "exacerbated sectarian divisions to keep himself in power" and created the animosities fueling the bloodshed between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Though Democrats were spirited in their denunciations of Bush's record on national security, they offered limited insights into the actual policies they would pursue if returned to power.

DOJ_NMG_0024227

The party document said Democrats would double the size of the military's special forces, pass legislation improving veterans' medical care and press to screen all cargo bound for the United States "in ships or airplanes at the point of origin."

On many other fronts, though, the Democratic plan emphasized aspiration over direction.

For instance, party leaders said they would make "the needed investments in equipment and manpower so that we can project power to protect America wherever and whenever necessary." But aides said the proposal did not commit Democrats to any specific increase in defense spending.

Along with its vow to eliminate Bin Laden, the plan said Democrats would "destroy terrorist networks like Al Qaeda, finish the job in Afghanistan and end the threat posed by the Taliban." But other than adding more special forces and improving America's intelligence capacity, the document offered no hints of what strategies the party might employ toward those ends.

Pelosi, Reid Push Security Agenda (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Democrats yesterday stood with representatives of firefighter, police and veterans groups in a rally in which party leaders outlined their national security agenda.

Congressional Democrats said their plan would help rebuild the military and National Guard, help fight terrorism, promote increased use of alternative fuels, and fully fund veterans benefits as well as training and equipment for first responders.

"After five years of Republican incompetence, Americans have had enough," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

Americans deserve "real security," said Mr. Reid, charging that Republicans have been dangerously incompetent on many security issues, such as the Iraq war, hurricane response, port security, and diplomacy with Iran and North Korea.

At the Capitol Hill rally, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said: "Democrats stand together to ensure unparalleled military strength, to defeat terrorism and stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction, to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and we intend to do it on the first day that we take over the Congress of the United States."

Republicans, who had been tipped off about the event more than a week ago, countered throughout the day that the Democrats' proposals amounted to nothing more than plagiarism and empty rhetoric.

The Washington Times reported in its March 18 editions that Democratic leaders planned to attack President Bush's national security policies at a series of press events -- appearing with active-duty military personnel, veterans and emergency responders -- during the St. Patrick's Day recess, culminating in a major policy rollout when Congress returned.

Democrats, however, accused Republicans yesterday of politicizing events.

"For years, Karl Rove's playbook of distortion and distraction have been well-known, but I thought it was interesting today that the president decided to change the time of his [Iraq policy] speech to coincide with our event, and I think that shows their real fear of our agenda," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid.

Madeleine K. Albright, who served as secretary of state in the Clinton administration, was among the speakers at the Democratic rally.

"I have never seen such rank incompetence as I have seen now from the Bush administration," she said.

Mrs. Albright referred to a recent White House gathering of former secretaries of state at which she said she told Mr. Bush, "Things were not going well in the Middle East, we were worried about Russian regression, there are four times the number of nuclear weapons with North Korea, and Iran knocking at the door, and no one is looking at or talking about Africa and Latin America."

Democrats are said by top aides to be united in both houses of Congress around their election-year security agenda, planning to push it daily and offering agenda items as amendments to budget and homeland security bills.

One of the first tests will be an amendment to increase funding for the National Guard, adding back $244 million to recoup the estimated 17,000 troop slots cut in the current budget and return the total number to 350,000.

Democrats also said their plan would reduce the nation's 60 percent dependence on foreign oil by 2020, by shifting federal funding toward alternative fuels such as bio-diesel, "clean coal" and other technologies.

If Democrats win back the majority, they said, they would expand health care for active-duty troops, military retirees and veterans.

Republicans yesterday were dismissive of Democrats' rhetoric.

"I'm surprised that after months of searching for an agenda, Democrats have finally rallied around the Republican plan for success in the war on terror," said first-term Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican.

A Clash Of Security Events (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And John Stanton

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

Democrats latest national security critique of the Bush administration was met with an unusually aggressive Republican response Wednesday, including a last-minute decision by President Bush to reschedule an Iraq policy speech so that it would begin just minutes before the planned Democratic rollout of their security agenda.

Democrats have been attempting to wrest the high ground on national security from Bush for most of the last year, making several unsuccessful gambits to focus the national debate on White House missteps in Iraq and on homeland security. But with the president's poll numbers sagging and public concern with homeland security heightened thanks to Hurricane Katrina and the scrapped Dubai Ports World deal, Democrats see a new window of political opportunity, Senate aides said. The difference from their previous failed efforts, Democrats believe, is that they have put together a policy of homeland security and military spending reforms that they can unify the party around.

"I don't know that we've had this kind of coordinated approach before," a Senate Democratic aide said, noting that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) used three recent Caucus lunches to discuss Democrats' position on the issue and that he and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) have worked closely in developing their strategy.

The aide also said Democratic House Members and Senators are simply weary of being painted as weak and unpatriotic by Republicans, which has helped fuel efforts to strike a unifying theme. "I think they're tired of being accused of being weak and not having [strong] policies to protect the country," the aide said.

Congressional Democrats, along with national party officials and security experts, have been plotting the unveiling of the so called "Real Security" plan for months. It is the second plank in the party's rolling election-year agenda, designed to put on paper what Democrats would do if given the majority this November.

Although Bush had originally been scheduled to give his Iraq speech at 1:30 p.m. at a Capitol Hill hotel, it was announced Wednesday morning that the speech would start at 12:50 p.m. The timing change meant the speech would coincide with the 1 p.m. start time of the Democratic event at Union Station — just blocks from the hotel where Bush spoke.

Democrats interpreted the timing of Bush's speech as the clearest signal yet that they are putting the GOP on the defensive on an issue that has served as an electoral firewall for Republicans, and they argued it mirrored a favored 2004 campaign tactic of Bush adviser Karl Rove in which Bush would upstage Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) by holding an event in the same town either the same day as or just prior to a visit from Kerry.

At the event, Reid opened his speech with an acknowledgement of Bush's competing address on Iraq, saying "the president can give all the speeches he wants, but nothing will change the fact that his Iraq policy is wrong."

"Karl Rove's playbook of distortion and distraction is well known," a Senate Democratic leadership aide said Wednesday, arguing the move "demonstrates a concern they have about Democrats' united position on national security, and it shows they have real concern about where this debate is going."

Republicans rejected any conspiracy theory about the time change as a Democratic fantasy and insisted there is no concern within their party about their posture on national security. One GOP Senate aide said it was humorous that Democrats would actually think that Bush would rearrange his schedule to try to trump their event. "They are giving themselves way too much credit in the president's eyes," said a GOP Senate aide.

But at least one GOP aide, while dismissing out of hand any gains by Democrats on national security, acknowledged the time shift appeared to be a political move aimed at undercutting any shots Democrats would take on Bush.

Additionally, Republicans in the House and Senate wasted no time in launching an all-out assault on the plan. Individual Members, the GOP's campaign committees and the leadership teams in both chambers issued dozens of press releases and statements deriding the policy rollout. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) in a statement called the Union Station event a "media stunt" that would not "eclipse [Democrats'] record of obfuscation and neglect on national and border security," while the National Republican Senatorial Committee dismissed it as a "Keystone Dems" event.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) said Republicans "are overreacting to the fact that Democrats are striking a responsive chord with voters in showing that we are more aggressively, intellectually and successfully working to secure America."

Menendez said to back that up, the public doesn't need to look any further than the heat Democrats have put on the White House over its handling of Dubai Ports deal and the war in Iraq.

"The American people understand that — that's why [the Republicans] are overreacting," Menendez said.

But Republicans said Democrats shouldn't pat themselves on the back too quickly, noting that it is members of the minority who are seeking to censure President Bush for trying to keep the country safe while at the same time advocating a "cut and run" policy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0024229

"What you are seeing from the Democrats and what they are saying now is inconsistent," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas). "They have a credibility gap."

Democrats Offer National Security Agenda (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congressional Democrats unveiled a national security plan Wednesday that they hope will erase their most significant political vulnerability in a pivotal wartime election year - the belief that they're too weak to defend the country.

Their most dramatic promise: If they win control of Congress this fall, they'd vote on their first day in power to implement all the recommendations of the independent 9-11 commission. That would boost security at ports, airports, chemical and nuclear power plants, on mass transit systems and at the border, they said.

Their vaguest point: They lambasted Republicans for the Iraq war but offered no alternative beyond a promise of "responsible redeployment" of U.S. troops and a "significant" transition to full Iraqi sovereignty.

In a hint of the investigations they might launch if in power, the Democrats also promised to hold the Bush administration "accountable for its manipulated prewar intelligence, poor planning and contracting abuses" in Iraq.

One of their leading voices for pulling troops out of Iraq, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., attended the event, according to an aide, but wasn't visible on the platform, which was crowded with dozens of lawmakers, and didn't speak. Their most vocal critic of the war, Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., wasn't in view either, and his office didn't respond to queries about whether he went.

The Democrats made their pitch as polls find they're closing the historic gap on the question of which party would better safeguard the country.

In a recent Gallup poll, 45 percent of adults said they trusted Republicans to defend them against terrorism, while 41 percent said they trusted Democrats. Four years ago, the margin for Republicans was 51 percent to 19 percent.

Much of the Democrats' gain could be attributed more to Republican problems - anger at the Iraq war and a proposal to turn over operations at some U.S. ports to a company controlled by the United Arab Emirates - than to Democratic stands.

But Democrats hoped to add to their side of the ledger with Wednesday's event. It was a campaign-style rally under a banner proclaiming, "Real Security," with congressional Democrats flanked by well-known Democratic voices on national security, including retired Army Gen. Wesley Clark and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Clark boasted that a U.S.-led war under Democratic President Bill Clinton saved more than a million Albanians from ethnic cleansing without the loss of a single American life. By contrast, he called the Iraq war "a strategic blunder." Albright accused the Bush administration of "rank incompetence."

Among the Democratic promises, many culled from earlier proposals:

-Screen 100 percent of the containers and cargo bound for the United States at their points of origin.

-Prevent outsourcing of critical work at ports, airports or mass transit to "foreign interests that put America at risk."

-Give more resources to police, firefighters and emergency medical technicians, who'd be the first to respond to terrorist attacks.

-Enact a new GI Bill of Rights to guarantee better pay, health care and other benefits for the military.

-"Eliminate" al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, destroy al-Qaida and "end the threat" of the Taliban in Afghanistan.

-Boost the National Guard and double the size of the military's Special Forces.

-Secure all the world's loose nuclear materials by 2010.

-Provide more armor and other protection to troops.

"We are uniting behind a national security agenda that is tough and smart, an agenda that will provide the real security President Bush has promised, but failed to deliver," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

In response, Vice President Dick Cheney told Fox News that the Democrats had no real plan to catch bin Laden and that their proposal for Iraq would amount to a retreat. He also said that their promise of a strong defense was contradicted by their past opposition to extending the Patriot Act.

"Their behavior has been totally inconsistent with what they're now promising they're going to do," Cheney said.

Democrats Detail Security Policy (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024230

Emboldened by President Bush's declining approval ratings, Democrats unveiled a national security platform yesterday for the midterm elections that stresses renewed focus on capturing Osama bin Laden, reducing the U.S. presence in Iraq and stepped up protection at home.

The new strategy, which comes after months of deliberations and several false starts, aims to neutralize the advantage Republicans have held on national security and terrorism issues, that Democrats acknowledge were critical in the GOP's midterm gains in 2002 and in Bush's reelection victory over Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004.

Flanked by former secretary of state Madeleine K. Albright and retired Army Gen. Wesley K. Clark, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi vowed that Democrats could do a better job of defending the country than the administration has done since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Declaring that the administration's "dangerous incompetence has made America less safe," Reid said, "We are uniting behind a national security agenda that is tough and smart, an agenda that will provide the real security President Bush has promised, but failed to deliver."

Republicans immediately attacked the Democratic plan, with Vice President Cheney arguing that Democrats' "behavior has been totally inconsistent with what they're now promising they're going to do."

Many of the items in the Democratic statement echo themes Kerry advanced in the 2004 presidential campaign, but party strategists believe that they are now in position to capitalize on public disenchantment with the war in Iraq and with declining confidence in Bush as a wartime leader.

Among the proposals in the "Real Security" plan: eliminate bin Laden and his al-Qaeda terrorist network, implement in full the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, and work to make 2006 a year of "significant transition" in Iraq.

On terrorism, the Democrats call for doubling the size of U.S. Special Forces and eliminating terrorist breeding grounds by "combating the economic, social and political conditions that allow extremism to thrive."

Democrats have been badly divided over Iraq. The new strategy urges Iraqis to assume responsibility for their own security, recommends "responsible redeployment" of U.S. forces without specifying a timetable and blames the administration for poor planning and manipulating prewar intelligence.

The statement contains language -- voiced by Pelosi, Reid and others yesterday -- that the Democrats' security agenda will be both "tough and smart" in contrast to the "dangerous incompetence" the Bush administration has shown -- language that has been tested by the Democrats in anticipation of the fall campaign.

Albright decried the Bush administration's "rank incompetence" on such issues as the Iraq war and the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Albright called for a security plan based on "facts not fantasy."

A series of national polls released in recent days have shown Democrats making up ground on Republicans when voters are asked which party they trust to better deal with issues of terrorism and homeland security.

A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll showed Republicans with just a four percentage-point edge over Democrats on which party would deal better with terrorism, a serious slip from just last fall when Republicans held an 11-point bulge in the same survey.

Democrats have polled extensively on national security, testing various possible messages for the fall, and found that the more emphasis put on securing the homeland, the more voters respond. According to one poll taken for the Democratic National Committee, nearly three-quarters of those surveyed responded positively to such a message, rather than a message that emphasized taking the fight to the terrorists and staying the course in Iraq.

Democrats Offer National Security Strategy (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Associated Press, March 29, 2006

Democrats on Wednesday proposed a wide-ranging strategy for protecting Americans at home and abroad, an election-year effort aimed at changing public perception that Republicans are stronger on national security. Republicans, for their part, criticized the national security policy statement as a stunt.

"We are uniting behind a national security agenda that is tough and smart, an agenda that will provide the real security President Bush has promised, but failed to deliver," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said.

His counterpart in the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., said Democrats were providing a fresh strategy — "one that is strong and smart, which understands the challenges America faces in a post 9/11 world, and one that demonstrates that Democrats are the party of real national security."

They spoke at a news conference at Union Station, near the Capitol, in front of banners reading "Real Security." They were flanked by some of the Democratic Party's top authorities on national security, including retired Gen. Wesley Clark and former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

DOJ_NMG_0024231

In the strategy, Democrats vowed to provide U.S. agents with the resources to "eliminate" Osama bin Laden and ensure a "responsible redeployment of U.S. forces" from Iraq in 2006. They promised to rebuild the military, eliminate the United States' dependence on foreign oil by 2020 and implement the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. Those are many of the same proposals Democrats have offered before.

Republicans refused to let Democrats portray themselves as stronger than them on the GOP's signature issue.

"Their behavior has been totally inconsistent with what they're now promising to do," said Vice President Dick Cheney. Interviewed on Fox News' "Tony Snow Show," Cheney said he did not believe Democrats had a credible plan for tracking down bin Laden and that their plan to move U.S. forces out of Iraq this year "would be a strategic retreat."

"It makes no sense at all to turn Iraq over to the terrorists," Cheney said. "We can succeed in Iraq, we can complete the mission."

Indeed, the Democratic statement lacks specific details of a plan to capture bin Laden, the al-Qaida chief who has evaded U.S. forces in the more than four years since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But Democrats suggest they will double the number of special forces and add more spies to increase the chances of finding al-Qaida's elusive leader.

Democrats also do not set a deadline for when all of the 132,000 American troops now in Iraq should be withdrawn.

They say: "We will ensure 2006 is a year of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty, with the Iraqis assuming primary responsibility for security and governing their country and with the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces."

The latest in a series of party policy statements for 2006, the Democrats' national security platform comes seven months before voters decide who will control the House and Senate.

Bush's job approval ratings are in the mid- to high-30s, and Democrats consistently have about a 10 percentage point lead over Republicans when people are asked who they want to see in control of Congress.

With the public skeptical of the Iraq war and Republicans and Democrats alike questioning Bush's war policies, Democrats aim to force Republicans to distance themselves from the president on Iraq and national security or rubber-stamp what Democrats contend is a failed policy.

Democratic strategists say their polling shows Democrats leading in all other areas — such as the economy, health care, education and retirement security — and having closed a gap in polls with Republicans on national security.

For months, House and Senate Democrats have tried to craft a comprehensive position on national security, but they have splintered, primarily over Iraq.

Republicans have sought to use that division to their own political advantage, claiming that Democrats simply attack the president and his fellow Republicans without presenting proposals of their own.

House GOP Leaders To Hear Suburban Agenda (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

As House Republicans continue work on crafting a broad party-wide vision statement to guide them through the rest of this year and beyond, a smaller group of GOP lawmakers from across the political spectrum will meet with the leadership today to present their “suburban agenda.”

A coalition of close to 40 Republican Members have come together since the beginning of this year to form an informal suburban caucus, and roughly 20 of those lawmakers will sit down with Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) to present a list of legislative priorities in their suburban districts, many of which are among the most competitive in the country.

Illinois Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) and his fellow suburban lawmakers have been working on this project for several months, but they only now have whittled their proposals down to a specific set of legislative items that they believe will help align the House GOP with the desires of crucial suburban voters.

“At this point, we’re in a legislative policy mode,” Kirk said Wednesday. “We’re working on the subject areas the American people care about.”

In addition to Kirk, GOP Reps. Jon Porter (Nev.), Pete Sessions (Texas), Tom Price (Ga.) and Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.) have all played prominent roles in the effort. Other contributors include Republican Reps. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), Dave Reichert (Wash.), Mike Castle (Del.) and Jim Gerlach (Pa.).

Gerlach and Fitzpatrick are major Democratic targets this election cycle, and Reichert could become one.

Kirk said the response to their work so far from the leadership has been good. “We’ve done a lot of work with leadership staff. Now we’re working on specific Members and specific bills and beginning to talk about how to move them through the committee process,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0024232

The list of proposals they will present to Hastert and Boehner today include a bill by Porter to strengthen background checks for teachers and a savings plan authored by Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) dubbed "401Kids" that would allow parents to save money for their children tax-free from birth. Other ideas include tort reform for the Superfund and expanding health care portability.

While those lawmakers craft their suburban agenda, Boehner is still busy cobbling together a broader "vision statement" for the House GOP.

Boehner already has released a floor calendar through the end of June and a set of four general themes — prosperity, security, health care and fiscal discipline — the party will use as guideposts for its agenda. But he said Tuesday that the leadership was still working on "the actual vision statement itself."

To that end, Boehner has been meeting with an informal "vision task force" of eight to 10 Republican lawmakers in hopes of reaching a common plan. The group is not toiling under a set time frame, and Boehner has not said when he expects the work to be completed.

For Sale, Foreshadowing? (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

His office says not to read anything into it, but Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who is under federal investigation, has put his house on Capitol Hill up for sale.

His three-bedroom home in the 1300 block of F Street Northeast, has a price tag of $799,000. A source knowledgeable about the property told HOH he was under the impression the Congressman was leaving the area.

Asked whether the "for sale" sign meant Jefferson was planning to leave town, the source said, "Yes, I think that's the deal."

Jefferson aides insist he's going nowhere, despite an ongoing criminal probe that has ensnared one of his former aides, Brett Pfeffer, who has pleaded guilty to two felony charges, including aiding and abetting the solicitation of bribes.

Jefferson's attorney, Ronald Machen, didn't return phone and e-mail messages, but Melanie Roussell, the Congressman's spokeswoman, said Jefferson's decision to sell his Washington, D.C., home has nothing to do with his legal standing and that he's not leaving Washington.

"I do not comment on the investigation. This has nothing to do with anything relating to that," she said, adding, "He is running for re-election."

Roussell explained that the housing market "has gone flat and is expected to decline" and that the Congressman's house has "seen a large appreciation," so now is the time to sell.

Jefferson is looking to buy "less expensive property," she said, reiterating that he fully intends to run for another term.

He isn't sure yet where he'll buy. "If anyone knows of any affordable properties, let us know," Roussell joked.

Mother Knows Best. Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) sure wishes he had listened to Mom's sage "chew your food!" advice. He nearly choked to death last week when he swallowed a too-big piece of steak at a fundraiser and wound up in the hospital, where doctors removed a 4-inch piece of meat from his throat.

Simmons was just about to address a luncheon gathering at the Mohegan Sun casino and resort in his district when he realized he was choking. He took a sip of water to force the meat down, but it didn't work. "The water filled up and covered my lungs ... I was suffocating," Simmons told HOH.

His training as a former Army intelligence officer and CIA ops agent paid off: he remained cool and — though he was choking — excused himself from the table, covered his mouth with a napkin and nonchalantly strolled to the kitchen.

He said he stood in the kitchen for about 10 minutes trying to dislodge the errant meat, then he heard the host telling the crowd that the Congressman had to leave. Of all things at that moment, Simmons felt guilty.

"I washed my face, tidied up, went back in ... gave a 10-minute speech to the group, posed for photos, then left," he said. He got through the speech by expectorating into a Kleenex "because I couldn't swallow," he said.

Being a man — an admittedly stubborn one — the Connecticut lawmaker insisted on driving himself (of course, just as anyone choking and unable to breathe would) to the hospital. The closest option was a convenience care facility, where he was put on an IV and medication to try to relax his esophagus. It didn't work.

After an hour, officials at the convenience care facility wanted to rush him to Lawrence & Memorial Hospital by ambulance. But Simmons refused. His wife, Heidi, who had met him at the convenience care center, drove him instead.

Once there, Simmons said he was rushed into the operating room and anesthetized for what would be an hour-long operation during which doctors "pulled out an approximately 4-inch-long piece of meat."

DOJ_NMG_0024233

Other than being a little shaken, Simmons is doing fine. He's taking medication to repair his esophagus, which was damaged from the coughing and gagging in his struggle with the beef.

"These days," Simmons says, "I'm cutting my meat very small."

Burns, Bush and the Bard. President Bush and Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) seem to have some unusual terms of endearment for each other. On Monday, Bush hosted a campaign fundraiser at the Madison Hotel in downtown D.C. for the Senator. In addition to allowing anyone who raised more than $10,000 for the event to pose with him for a picture, the president also had a few quips about Burns.

"I kind of like being on the same platform as Sen. Burns because he makes me sound like Shakespeare," Bush said.

This comment comes only a month after Burns called the president stubborn and said Bush has a skull of "solid granite" at the Hill County Republican Party's annual Lincoln Day dinner.

But Burns' communications specialist explained that he was showing Bush a little love with the comment.

"He says the same thing about his son," Burns' spokesman Matt Mackowiak said. "It's a little joke he likes to use."

Place Your Bets! Forget the bookies in Las Vegas. The important wagers on the NCAA Men's Basketball Tournament are being placed on Capitol Hill.

Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) has so much faith that the underdog George Mason University Patriots will win their semifinal matchup against the University of Florida on Saturday that he's putting up a basket full of Northern Virginia-produced M&Ms, Snickers bars and Twix candies. Apparently not one to shy away from a bet, Rep. Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.) is confident enough that his home district's Florida Gators will dominate that he's putting up a case of Gatorade (which was, of course, developed at UF).

And both Members managed to trash talk a little bit during a press event Wednesday.

"The Gators are a young team, and I think they have a great future next year," Davis said, sporting a snazzy George Mason baseball cap.

Davis called the Patriots the modern-day version of "Hoosiers," the small-town Indiana high school team who made it to the state finals in 1954 and was immortalized on film. It's no coincidence, Davis said, that this year's final four will be played in Indianapolis.

Stearns did not appear intimidated, pointing out that the Gators have a spectacular lineup this season and a record of winning as underdogs as well, including their recent victory against No. 1 seed Villanova.

Plus, Stearns said, while the Patriots will be filling up on their home state's unhealthy candy, the Gators will be powering up with a drink that has "integrity."

"What we are going to see here on Saturday is another win," Stearns said of the Gators.

Ga. Congresswoman In Scuffle With Police (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, March 29, 2006

Rep. Cynthia McKinney and a police officer scuffled Wednesday after the Georgia Democrat entered a House office building unrecognized and refused to stop when asked, according to U.S. Capitol Police.

McKinney, a sixth-term congresswoman who represents suburban Atlanta, struck the officer according to one account, a police official said, adding there were conflicting accounts. The officer, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the incident, spoke only on condition of anonymity.

No charges were filed, police said.

Officials in McKinney's office refused two requests for comment.

Capitol Police spokeswoman Sgt. Kimberly Schneider said only that senior officials have been made aware of the incident and are investigating.

Members of Congress do not have to walk through metal detectors as they enter buildings on the Capitol complex. They wear lapel pins identifying them as members.

McKinney routinely doesn't wear her pin and is recognized by many officers, the police official said, adding that she wasn't wearing it when she entered a House office building early Wednesday.

By one police account, she walked around a metal detector and an officer asked her several times to stop. When she did not, the officer tried to stop her, and she then struck the officer, according to that account.

McKinney was defeated in 2002 after she implied on a talk radio program that the Bush administration might have had advance notice of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. She won back the seat two years later with 64 percent of the vote.

Republicans circulated an e-mail noting that McKinney's party the same day announced an election-year "affirmation" of their commitment to shoring up the nation's security.

"On a day when the Democrats unveil their national security agenda, it's probably not a good idea to allegedly strike a police officer," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

McKinney In Fracas With Officer (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn And Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, March 30, 2006

A U.S. Capitol Police officer is considering filing assault charges against Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) following an altercation yesterday in which she allegedly hit him after he asked to see identification, according to a source familiar with the incident.

The incident occurred at approximately 8:50 yesterday morning at the New Jersey Avenue and C Street entrance to the Longworth Building. As McKinney was entering the building, the officer stopped her and asked for identification. McKinney allegedly hit him before identifying herself as a member of Congress and walking away, the source said.

McKinney's office would not comment on the incident yesterday afternoon.

Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, spokeswoman for the Capitol Police, was unable to confirm the details of the account, saying, "The matter has been brought to our attention and is currently under investigation."

Members of the House do not typically display their congressional ID cards around the Capitol complex, as staff do, but many wear the official lapel pin for the 109th Congress. It was not known whether McKinney was displaying the pin yesterday.

With or without the pin, many Congress members pass through security with merely a nod or hello to security officers. They are not required to pass through metal detectors.

Capitol Hill publication Hotline reported a witness's account on its blog. According to the blog, the witness recounted that the officer pursued McKinney after she failed to pass through the metal detector. As the officer took McKinney by the arm, she swung around and punched him in the chest while still holding on to her cell phone.

The incident is likely to have been caught on videotape, since all Capitol Hill entrances are monitored by cameras.

Republicans wasted no time pouncing on the events. National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Carl Forti tied the altercation to Democrats' unveiling of their security agenda yesterday.

"Today's ironic one-two punch from national Democrats trying to look tough on security finds Cynthia McKinney attacking a member of the law-enforcement community," he said. "When we said Democrats were all talk and no action on security, we did not mean to provoke them to take matters into their own cell-phone-clutching hands."

The incident yesterday was uncannily reminiscent of a scene in a recent documentary about McKinney, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus. Filmmaker Ian Inaba followed her around Capitol Hill for "American Blackout," about African-American voting rights and McKinney's 2002 reelection bid.

In one scene, McKinney is walking into the House side of the Capitol with Inaba when a white Capitol Police officer stops her. McKinney informs him that she is a congresswoman, prompting an immediate apology.

She then told the filmmaker that she is often challenged when entering the Capitol.

The documentary debuted at the Sundance Film Festival in January.

First elected in 1992, McKinney, 51, has a history of lashing out at government security guards:

· In 1993, after she complained about being stopped by security guards, Capitol Police posted a photo of her on an office wall so that officers could remember who she was.

· In 1995, McKinney reportedly contacted the sergeant at arms after a white Capitol Police officer asked her to consent to a security check.

· In 1996 and 1998, she complained that White House security officials failed to recognize her and did not give her the same treatment as other members of Congress, at one time mistaking her 23-year-old white aide for the congresswoman.

"I am absolutely sick and tired of having to have my appearance at the White House validated by white people," she said at the time.

Those comments and others have earned McKinney a reputation as one of the most outspoken and controversial members of Congress.

Shortly after Sept. 11, McKinney apologized to a member of the Saudi royal family after New York's then-mayor, Rudy Giuliani, rejected the family's $10 million contribution to recovery efforts on the grounds that the Saudis had said the attacks had been provoked by U.S. support of Israel.

Later, McKinney argued that President Bush may have ignored warnings of the impending attacks to buoy defense stocks.

McKinney drew a challenger in her 2002 primary, African-American Judge Denise Majette. The race focused on Middle East issues, juxtaposing McKinney's sympathies with Arab causes with Majette's support from Jewish groups.

Majette won with a 16 percent margin, a rare and embarrassing defeat for an incumbent.

Majette later ran unsuccessfully for the Senate, and McKinney won back her old seat. When she returned to the House, Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) broke with tradition and denied her the seniority her previous service would have allowed her in committee rankings.

McKinney Said To Strike Officer (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

A senior Capitol Police official said charges were not likely to be filed against Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) after she allegedly struck a Capitol Police officer in the chest with her mobile phone Wednesday.

The altercation between the officer and McKinney took place when the officer asked her to go through the magnetometer at a security checkpoint.

Members are not required to pass through magnetometers, but, according to the police source, the officer did not recognize McKinney, who apparently was sporting a different hairstyle than she usually does.

Details of the event were still unclear at press time, but according to the source, the unidentified officer asked McKinney to go through the magnetometer at one of the House Office Buildings "a couple times," but she refused.

The officer then grabbed McKinney's arm and restrained her, which prompted her to yell: "Don't touch me." McKinney then hit the officer in the chest with her phone, the source said.

It was unclear if McKinney had on her Congressional lapel pin, which is one method that officers use to identify Members.

"She certainly can be charged over this, but I don't know it warrants that action," the source said.

Sources on both sides of the aisle confirmed that the officer involved had met with outgoing Capitol Police Chief Terrance Gainer and House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood afterwards to discuss the incident.

McKinney, who has been a lightning rod for controversy in her tenure on Capitol Hill, had no comment as Roll Call went to press Wednesday.

The Capitol Police remained officially mum about the incident.

"The matter has been brought to our attention and is currently under investigation," said Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, the agency's public information officer. "I don't have any specific information."

Rumors about the incident rapidly spread via e-mail across Capitol Hill Wednesday, as staffers on both the House and Senate side traded gossip about the incident.

Republicans had a field day.

The National Republican Congressional Committee pointed out that the incident occurred on a day when Democrats unveiled their agenda on national security.

"Today's ironic one-two punch from National Democrats trying to look tough on security finds Cynthia McKinney attacking a member of the law enforcement community," NRCC Director Carl Forti said in a statement. "When we said Democrats were all talk and no action on security, we did not mean to provoke them to take matters into their own cell phone-clutching hands."

Sean Spicer, communications director for the House Republican Conference, echoed Forti's sentiments.

"It is just ironic that on a day that they were trying to gather for a media stunt on the issue of security, one of their Members struck a Capitol police officer, who puts his life on the line every day to secure this building, Members and staff," Spicer said. "I don't care what day of the week it is, you don't ever treat a law enforcement officer with that type of treatment."

The senior police source said that while Wednesday's event was unfortunate, the issue had basically been settled.

"This is an incident that shouldn't have happened," the source said. "She shouldn't have behaved that way, and the officer was absolutely correct in his actions. But I don't think we need to spend much more time on it — I think she recognizes what she did was wrong."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Not being recognized is apparently something of an issue for Rep. Cynthia McKinney , as a Capitol Police officer discovered yesterday.

In 1998, the outspoken Georgia Democrat wrote a scathing letter to President Bill Clinton accusing White House guards of racism after they failed to recognize her when she arrived for an event. For years, the Hill newspaper reported in 2002, Capitol Police kept a photo of her posted in a basement office to warn security officers against committing any other such embarrassment.

DOJ_NMG_0024236

Maybe it's time to change the photo. The police department is investigating a bizarre scuffle yesterday morning between McKinney and an officer who tried to stop her at a congressional office building checkpoint after apparently failing to realize she was a member of Congress.

McKinney allegedly "stabbed" the officer with her cellphone when he grabbed her, said a police source who requested anonymity because the investigation had just begun; the officer, whom the source did not identify, is considering whether to file criminal charges. The source said the officer was not seriously injured.

In a statement issued last night, McKinney said she regretted the "unfortunate confrontation."

"I know that Capitol Hill Police are securing our safety, that of thousands of others, and I appreciate the work that they do. I deeply regret that the incident occurred," McKinney said.

How on earth did this all come to pass? Could it be the officer didn't recognize her after her recent makeover? The 51-year-old recently ditched her trademark braids for a softer, full-bodied do that started turning heads around her suburban Georgia district in January.

"I was urgently trying to get to an important meeting on time to fulfill my obligations to my constituents," McKinney said in the statement. "Unfortunately, the Police Officer did not recognize me as a Member of Congress and a confrontation ensued. I did not have on my Congressional pin but showed the Police Officer my Congressional ID."

The office of House Sergeant at Arms Bill Livingood , which oversees security, referred questions to the Capitol Police. Police spokeswoman Sgt. Kimberly Schneider would say only that "the matter has been brought to our attention, and it's currently under investigation."

Some Republicans, though, were more than happy to comment. Sean Spicer , a spokesman for the House GOP leadership, sent out a mass e-mail chortling over the irony of the incident happening on the same day the Democrats unveiled their national security agenda. "Not exactly a show of support for law enforcement," he wrote.My Team Can Kick Your Team's . . .

Once, political sports bets involved good stuff: bushels of lobsters, thick steaks, maybe a fine wine or two. Now, we're down to Gatorade and vending-machine candy.

With their teams in the NCAA Final Four, Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), who represents George Mason University's district, and Rep. Cliff Stearns, a Republican from University of Florida territory, wanted in on some action. Davis put up a basket of Mars candies -- Milky Way Minis, Snicker Minis Mix, Twix Minis, Peanut M&Ms, etc. -- because the Mars family is based in Northern Virginia. Stearns put up a case of the power drink because it was developed at the college.

Davis (born in North Dakota, grew up in Fairfax County) is headed to Indianapolis for Saturday's game; Stearns (born in Washington, graduated from Woodrow Wilson High School and George Washington University) will miss the semifinals but has tickets for Monday's championship game. Senate GOP Fears Frist's Ambitions Split Party (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

By pushing his way to the front of the volatile debate over immigration, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has reignited complaints that his presidential ambitions conflict with his leadership duties at times and put him at odds with his GOP caucus.

Frist (R-Tenn.) pointedly told the Judiciary Committee on March 16 that unless it produced a comprehensive bill by Monday, he would send his own proposal to the Senate floor. The committee worked overtime to comply, but Frist still arranged for his bill -- which places more emphasis on border security -- to draw several hours of debate before yielding to the committee measure as the vehicle for amendments and votes, which will start today.

Frist's tactics rankled some GOP colleagues who wanted more time to talk through the divisive questions of illegal immigrants, border fences, guest-worker options and other matters.

"We should have had a much more ambitious process of trying to build consensus and bringing people and different views together before we engaged in debate on the Senate floor," Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) said in an interview. "As majority leader you can't be single-minded. You've got to deal with a confluence of challenges and priorities, on behalf of the president, on behalf of the overall party and on behalf of the institution."

Frist's supporters say he balances his dual roles fairly and does not put his presidential ambitions ahead of his 55-member caucus's best interests. But some close observers in the Senate and elsewhere see a pattern in which he repeatedly veers right on contentious issues, which could boost his chances in a GOP presidential primary likely to include more centrist Republicans such as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

The immigration issue "is one in which his mark is designed to appeal to the party base," said congressional scholar Ross Baker of Rutgers University. "His caucus is elsewhere. There are a number of Republicans who favor some kind of guest-worker program," which Frist's bill lacks.

Frist did not unduly rush the Judiciary Committee, said his spokesman Bob Stevenson, and the senator's emphasis on tightening borders is in line with many colleagues' wishes. Frist wants to "initiate the debate from a platform of consensus . . . and move from there," Stevenson said.

Others say immigration is far from the only area in which Frist, a heart-lung surgeon, has either stumbled or angered colleagues in his three years as majority leader. A year ago he told the Senate that brain-damaged Floridian Terri Schiavo was not in a "persistent vegetative state," a declaration that pleased right-to-life activists but did not comport with autopsy results. When a Dubai company's proposed control of U.S. port operations prompted controversy, Frist initially called for a 45-day study but soon broke with President Bush's support for the deal.

"So much of what he has done, including Schiavo, the ports deal and now this [immigration], are clearly aimed at the Republican primary," Baker said.

Frist's GOP colleagues agree that his presidential hopes make his leadership job much more complicated, but some say he does not always act in his own best interest.

"I think that he's learning -- as he goes about trying to pursue a White House bid and continue to manage the day-to-day operations of the Senate -- that it's a great challenge," Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) said. "As the leader of the agenda, he probably has to take positions and advocate things that are very much contrary to what he would do if he were just purely a candidate for the White House. . . . It's a very delicate and difficult tightrope to walk."

Asked if the Schiavo episode -- in which Frist announced his conclusions after viewing a home video of the severely handicapped woman -- was an example of a high-wire slip, Thune said: "Well, sure. You look at that, and there's a full range of issues where trying to get 51 votes in the Senate -- or in some cases 60 votes in the Senate -- probably puts you at some odds with the national constituency of some sort. And I think this immigration reform issue is a good case in point. It is extremely challenging to try to craft a position that would be helpful in a Republican primary and then to deal with getting 51 votes for that position here."

Another Republican senator, who would speak only on background to avoid a clash with the leader, was more pointed. "The immigration issue is poorly handled. He's obviously playing primary politics."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who backs the immigration bill that emerged from the Judiciary Committee, said he would have preferred that the Senate launch the immigration debate discussing the committee's bill rather than Frist's more conservative plan. "I think his legislative fix is wrong," Graham said, because it does not address guest-worker issues.

But Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), a likely rival for the GOP presidential nomination, said Frist's maneuvering on immigration "doesn't bother me at all. I want to see action."

Frist Says Job Bad Spot To Seek Presidency (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP2, March 29, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says his high-profile job is a "terrible, terrible, terrible, terrible" post for seeking the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Making it clear that a White House bid is all but certain, Frist said in an interview with The Associated Press that remaining in the Senate would make a presidential run impossible. Frist plans to step down when his second term ends this year.

"I know the perch not to even consider," he said. "That would be, for me, the United States Senate or being majority leader." Asked if trying to run a campaign from such a position would be difficult, he replied: "Terrible, terrible, terrible, terrible."

One of possibly a dozen Republicans interested in the GOP nomination, Frist said in the interview late Tuesday that once out of the Senate, "you'll see, as you do now, the real Bill Frist but unencumbered by having responsibilities of leading this body, which results in negotiated positions."

The last senator to succeed in his presidential bid was John F. Kennedy in 1960. Another Massachusetts senator, John Kerry, lost to President Bush in 2004, hampered in part by an extensive Senate voting record that opponents used against him.

In 1996, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole of Kansas realized that trying to pursue the White House as the Republican nominee from the Senate's top job would be an obstacle. He resigned in June and lost to President Clinton five months later.

Frist, a heart and lung surgeon, was the White House's choice for majority leader after the undoing of Sen. Trent Lott (news, bio, voting record), R-Miss., whose favorable comments about Strom Thurmond's segregationist past cost him the leadership post in 2002.

Frist has made the customary trips of a presidential candidate, traveling to New Hampshire and Iowa. He further demonstrated his determination to be a contender earlier this month when he bused dozens of supporters to the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis and emerged as the winner of a straw poll of possible GOP candidates.

Frist still faces political and possibly legal obstacles.

He is under investigation for possible insider trading by federal authorities following his sale last year of stock in the hospital chain HCA Inc., which his family founded. Frist has said he did nothing wrong.

He acknowledged that he needs to improve his speaking skills, particularly in a campaign.

"I will have to really work hard on it," Frist said. "As a surgeon, I did my best work when people were sound asleep, cutting out their hearts, putting new hearts in. And now what I need to do, everybody says, is do your best work and not put people to sleep. That's what I'll work on."

Nasdaq Ready To Rumble Ahead (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, March 30, 2006

A major missing piece of the 2006 stock rally has finally fallen into place.

The Nasdaq composite has been strangely absent from the rally the past few weeks as the Dow Jones industrials and Standard & Poor's 500 set multiple 2006 highs.

But that changed Wednesday, when the tech-packed Nasdaq powered up 33.32 points, or 1.4%, to 2337.78 for its highest close in more than five years. Not only did the percentage gain Wednesday trounce the Dow's 0.5% gain and the Standard & Poor's 500's 0.7% rise, but it put the Nasdaq up 6% this year with two days left in the first quarter. In comparison, the S&P is only up 4.4% in 2006, and the Dow 4.6%.

Followers of tech are relieved the Nasdaq is finally reviving. “It's about time,” says Kevin Landis, portfolio manager at Firsthand Funds.

Tech stocks finally joining in the 2006 breakout show that investors have confidence about the economy and Corporate America's willingness to spend on upgrades and tech projects, says Christopher McHugh, portfolio manager at Turner Investment Partners. This recent tech rally, though, is selective and mostly involves:

DOJ_NMG_0024239

·Smaller companies. Look at the 20.6% decline of Intel, 1.6% gain of Dell and 3.3% gain in 2006 of Microsoft, and it's clear the big gains aren't coming from big companies. It's even more clear if you consider that the Nasdaq 100 index, which includes the 100 largest non-financial Nasdaq companies, is up just 3.7% this year, well below the Nasdaq's overall gain.

The reason? Small-cap outperformance, says Michelle Clayman, managing partner of New Amsterdam Partners. She points out the Russell 2000 index, which measures small-cap stocks, is up 13.5% this year, and Wednesday set a record. There was a big exception Wednesday, however, when Google's $17.78 gain to $394.98 helped push the Nasdaq above its 2006 high.

·Telecom. One of the notable recoveries has been among companies involved in telecommunications, especially those making semiconductors used in telecom gear, says Chuck Stutenroth, portfolio manager at ZAR Fund Group. PMC-Sierra, a maker of telecom chips, is up 61% this year, for instance.

Some of these victories might seem small consolation for investors who have been aboard for the ride since the Nasdaq peaked at 5048.62 on March 10, 2000.

"The jury is still out with people who have gotten hurt," McHugh says.

Clawing back to that peak is a tall order and would require the Nasdaq to gain 8% a year for 10 years. But Charlie Crane, strategist at Scotsman Capital, says the tech rally is on solid ground and can do it. Crane says he's willing to predict the Nasdaq will get back to its peak, "but give me a decade."

Investors Transcend Fed (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

What Fed?

Stocks shrugged off Tuesday's interest-rate increase like yesterday's bad news, led by a powerful rally in the technology sector that lifted the Nasdaq Composite Index to a five year high.

Shares of Maytag surged 28% in the final minutes of trading Wednesday after the Justice Department approved Whirlpool's $1.79 billion acquisition of the home-appliance maker. Whirlpool's shares gained 1%.

Traders were scratching their heads over what sparked the rally, other than a bounce from yesterday's Federal Reserve-induced plunge. "Sometimes a rubber band gets stretched too far in one direction, and then it snaps back," said Barry Ritholtz, chief market strategist at Ritholtz Capital Partners.

"The market just feels like it has a bid under it," said Kevin Kruszenski, head of listed trading at KeyBanc Capital Markets. Larry Peruzzi, senior equity trader at Boston Company Asset Management, said he expects stocks to become increasingly volatile as the Fed nears the end of its rate-lifting campaign, and that wide two-day swings could become the norm. "Who knows, tomorrow this thing could reverse again," he said.

Skeptics said investors piling into stocks ignore bad news at their peril. Bond yields hitting multiyear highs and oil prices creeping near $70 a barrel will drag on stocks sooner or later, they said. "There's obviously a consequence of what the Fed is doing, and that's what people are missing," said Peter Boockvar, equity strategist at Miller Tabak. "The end result of [the rate increases] is a slower economy."

The Nasdaq, laden with tech stocks, added 33.32, or 1.45%, to 2337.78. A 4.7% jump by Google helped trigger the rally by tech, said Marc Pado, U.S. market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald.

Semiconductor stocks led the charge. The Philadelphia Semiconductor Index gained 2.5%, helped by a near 6% increase by Xilinx. Small-cap stocks also surged. The Russell 2000, a gauge of small companies, rose 1.72%. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained a more tame 9.66 to 1302.89.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average added 61.16 points to 11215.70, shaving away nearly two-thirds of the near-100-point swoon from Tuesday. A 2.6% slide by General Motors, which said late Tuesday that it would restate6 financial results for financing arm GM Acceptance Corp., weighed on the average. Caterpillar fell 1.6% after UBS downgraded the company to "neutral" from "buy." 3M gained 1.1% after Merrill Lynch boosted its rating on the stock to "buy" from "neutral" due to its exposure to growing overseas markets.

Analysts debated whether the rate increases will weigh on stocks down the road. Dick Green, president of Briefing.com, wrote in a morning note that the Fed intends to slow the economy, which means "slower earnings growth in the second half of the year than Wall Street currently expects."

Gail Dudack of Dudack Research Group, however, says investors shouldn't be overly fearful of tighter monetary policy. Higher rates "are not a problem for equities" she wrote in a Tuesday report. While earnings are likely to slow, she says, the valuations of stocks are "the best in 10 years" according to trailing and forward price-to-earnings ratios.

Light, sweet crude oil rose 38 cents to $66.45 a barrel after the release of the Energy Information Agency's weekly petroleum inventory report. While crude stocks jumped by 2.03 million barrels, higher than the 950,000 barrel build expected, gasoline and distillate inventories fell more than expected.

Treasury bonds declined, sending the yield on the 10-year note above 4.8% to its highest level since June 2004. The dollar slipped against the euro and yen.

In major market action:

Stocks rose7. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.6 billion shares traded, 2,480 stocks rose and 880 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.4 billion shares traded, 2,226 rose and 850 declined.

Bonds fell8. The benchmark 10-year Treasury shed 5/32 point, or $1.56 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.808%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32 to yield 4.840%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar declined.9 It traded at 117.83 yen, down slightly from 117.98 yen late Tuesday, while the euro rose to $1.2024 from $1.2009.

Lawsuit Is Filed Against Kodak (WSJ)

By David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

A former Eastman Kodak Co. manager says that the company altered millions of photographs stored by customers on the popular EasyShare Gallery Web site and that she was fired after threatening to bring her concerns about the plan to top management.

In a lawsuit filed in California superior court in Oakland, Maya Raber, the former director of engineering for EasyShare Gallery, said that Kodak planned to secretly compress the digital-photograph images stored by customers of the Web site, a process she says can irreversibly damage the images. The suit alleges that she and other employees warned of the potential damage the compression could cause, but higher-ups pushed the plan along.

Kodak, in a statement, said it would not comment on why Ms. Raber left the company in August because it was a personnel matter. Kodak said Ms. Raber's allegations about its photo service "are completely false."

"We have not compressed images that are stored in the Gallery without our customers' knowledge," the statement said. "We feel that Kodak has acted in a manner that is consistent with our corporate policies and ethics, and we will vigorously defend ourselves against all claims to the contrary."

Ms. Raber claims some of the photographic images that are uploaded on the EasyShare Web site are still being compressed and potentially damaged. She says customers are not told of the possible damage.

"I thought it was deceiving and illegal," Ms. Raber said in an interview. She said the idea to compress photo images was part of a cost-cutting plan that would allow the company to save money on photo-imaging storage costs. Ms. Raber claims Kodak used misleading advertising pitches to lure customers to the site.

She says compressed images can permanently lose sharpness and appear grainy when reproduced. An internal panel found the results to be unsatisfactory, Ms. Raber claims. Kodak declined to comment on any effects of compression on the photos.

The lawsuit says that employees who complained about the compression plans were told "this is not a democracy" and "objection to the project will be noticed."

Ms. Raber says after she threatened to submit a report of her concerns to top executives, she was terminated and told it was part of a "restructuring." Her lawsuit alleges she was wrongfully terminated and seeks unspecified monetary damages.

Minnesota May Be Tip Of Political Iceberg (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

ROCHESTER, Minn. -- From the governor's mansion to Congress, everything's up for grabs in Minnesota this year, and if a political tidal wave is coming in November it will surely be felt here.

With the lakes still frozen white from winter, Republican and Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party candidates already have begun the spring ritual of nominating conventions in school auditoriums across the state. In three races in Republican House districts that Mr. Bush carried in 2004, Democrats hope for upsets given the president's faltering ratings.

To understand the currents ahead, forget about staid Scandinavians; remember this is the state that elected Jesse Ventura governor.

The Republican nightmare here in the First District is a burly, high-school teacher and coach who is running as a Democrat but evokes House Speaker Dennis Hastert as a younger man. The Democratic candidate in the Second District is a former

DOJ_NMG_0024241

Federal Bureau of Investigation agent with the maiden name of Cheney who is waging an antiwar campaign. Her Republican opponent, a Marine veteran, opined on radical Islam and attacks on the Easter Bunny while on the campaign trail recently at a Lutheran school whose sports teams are the "Crusaders."

As Minnesota suggests, the 2006 campaign is a power struggle but also a moment for Congress to renew itself after wearing thin its welcome with voters. For Democrats, who need to gain 15 seats to win the House, spring is the season for testing campaign pitches. For Republicans, who hold power, it is a time to take stock after dominating Congress for the past 12 years.

K.J. McDonald, a former Republican state legislator who now is mayor of Watertown in Carver County, recites a litany of party woes from "the ineptness of the Bush administration" to the national debt and the Iraq war. "We are due for a fall," he worries. "We're a disgrace."

Iraq hangs over the landscape: 2,600 Minnesota National Guard troops began deploying to the Mideast and the war last week; Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty, up for re-election, made headlines with a trip to the region. Progress for America, a conservative political organization, in February chose Minnesota to test more than $1 million in television ads and mailings in support of the war. And in picking its candidates in May, the DFL must decide if it wants to press for troop withdrawals by a fixed date.

For the Senate seat being vacated by retiring Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton, the DFL leans heavily toward Amy Klobuchar, Hennepin County prosecutor and daughter of legendary Minneapolis newspaper columnist Jim Klobuchar who is out of retirement to stump for his daughter -- but sometimes has to be reminded to mention her name when he gets wound up.

"She's got moxie," says Barry Bowden, a farm insurance agent and Republican. Enough so that the Republican candidate, Rep. Mark Kennedy, is no longer the favorite in the Senate race.

But most revealing are the House races. In the First and Second districts, incumbent Republicans are challenged. In the Sixth, the seat is held by Mr. Kennedy, but the race has sparked party infighting as conservatives jockey to try to succeed him as he runs for the Senate.

In all three cases, Democrats will need a lot of luck and more money. "If you can't pay the band, you can't do the boogaloo," said Patty Wetterling, a child-rights advocate and Democratic candidate running in the Sixth.

Equally important is how the party will try to win back independent voters in largely suburban and rural areas.

At the spring caucuses, party activists pick delegates to nominating conventions in May. Primaries are held in September but both Republicans and the DFL make it difficult for any loser to challenge the candidate the party endorses.

Within the DFL, divisions over the war have surfaced. Ms. Wetterling, for example, proposed last fall that the troops be brought home by Thanksgiving 2006. But another Democrat seeking the Sixth District seat, Elwyn Tinklenberg, a Methodist minister and former member of Mr. Ventura's cabinet, warns that Democrats will fail if they move too far left. "If we provide them with only two options, far right, far left, they will still pick far right," he says. "For us to be able to win, we have to provide an alternative to the extremes."

In the Second District, Coleen Rowley, a former FBI agent who criticized the agency's performance before the 9/11 attacks, is outspoken in her opposition to the war. "I think most of the problems we are in right now are because people are playing politics instead of doing the right thing," she says.

But as Ms. Rowley's campaign has faltered, another Democrat, State Sen. Sharon Marko, jumped in recently to offer a more moderate approach -- and to put greater emphasis on traditional economic issues.

Here in the First District, Tim Walz, the high-school teacher and coach and ringer for Speaker Hastert, has the Democratic field to himself. A retired master sergeant in the Army National Guard, he served overseas during the early war in Afghanistan. When his old artillery battalion deployed to Iraq last week, Mr. Walz's emotions showed after traveling down to Mississippi to say goodbye.

"There were soldiers down there that I taught in school. They were my students in my classroom, I coached them," he said. "This is not something that is a political game or a political loss."

Mr. Walz's opponent, Rep. Gil Gutknecht, a former auctioneer, served 12 years in the Minnesota legislature before joining Congress in 1995. He emails progress reports on Iraq to constituents but prefers to talk up immigration, where he is taking a tougher line in response the influx of illegal immigrants working in agriculture-processing facilities in the district. "It's a hotter issue and it's more clear-cut," he says. Unlike Iraq, "people know which side they're on."

In the Second District, Republican Rep. John Kline is a former Marine helicopter pilot in Vietnam whose son now serves in Iraq. "We never thought the Viet Cong would leave the Ho Chi Minh trail and come here," he says. "This time we're engaged in a war where I believe absolutely they will come here."

Yet, after compiling a near-perfect party unity rating in recent years, he now describes himself as a "conservative but independent" Republican and faults the White House for resisting pension-relief provisions important to bankrupt Northwest Airlines in his district. "They're wrong," he says of the administration.

Both Republican incumbents worry about voter concerns, even with Minnesota's low unemployment. "You think, 'What if I lost my job when I'm 55 or 56 or 57?'" Mr. Kline says.

Mr. Gutknecht asks: "Why is there still economic angst in the United States? The answer is the average working American hasn't had a real pay raise."

Buckeye GOP Circles The Drain (WSJ)

By John Kasich

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

COLUMBUS, OHIO – "There are no words to express the deep remorse that I feel over the embarrassment I have caused for my administration and the people of the state of Ohio." Thus, Gov. Bob Taft complied with a court order to apologize to the people of Ohio.

Were that the only instance of poor judgment by an Ohio Republican in recent memory, the state GOP would probably remain in relatively good shape leading up to the elections this November, despite growing indicators against the party nationally. Unfortunately, the governor's ethical lapses -- he pled guilty last August to four misdemeanors related to undisclosed gifts from lobbyists -- represent only a small fraction of an ever widening scandal that is drowning the Ohio Republican Party.

Over the past year and a half, the list of political operatives and government officials (both elected and appointed) implicated in corruption scandals has grown exponentially, and yet the message hasn't registered. In Buckeye politics, it's business as usual.

The biggest scam in town -- but by no means the only -- is the "pay for play" practices of office-holders at every level. Of course, not all public servants are guilty -- most are not. However, Ohio Republicans have held every statewide office since 1994, and the governorship and secretary of state since 1990. They currently have longstanding, lopsided majorities in both houses of the general assembly. The endemic culture of money-for-influence is a testament to the corrupting consequences that inevitably follow when one party holds power for too long.

Exhibit A in this mire is Toledo coin dealer and Republican fundraiser Tom Noe. His "coingate" scandal, as it has been inelegantly termed, demonstrated a total breakdown in ethics and was a direct result of one-party domination of the political process. Mr. Noe obtained several contracts totaling some $50 million to pursue investment opportunities for the Ohio Bureau of Workers Compensation, in this case rare coin speculation. With limited oversight of his operation, Mr. Noe allegedly began laundering campaign contributions to state and federal candidates (including President Bush). In February Mr. Noe was indicted on 53 felony counts and faces a mandatory 10-year prison term if convicted of corruption. At this point $10 million to $12 million remains unaccounted for.

Unfortunately, coingate isn't the only prominent Republican scandal. According to reports in Ohio newspapers, former Speaker of the House Larry Householder and his political fundraisers and consultants are currently under criminal investigation for various charges involving possible campaign and fundraising irregularities. An anonymous memo charging Mr. Householder and his top political aids with bribery, kickbacks and tax and mail fraud was sent to the U.S. Attorney's Office by Secretary of State Ken Blackwell. While Mr. Householder emphatically denies any wrongdoing, no one seems to know for sure when and if any actual charges will be filed.

Add to these scandals regnant political infighting and widespread distrust between the different ideological wings of the GOP. This year's election, in addition to a contentious re-election campaign for Sen. Mike DeWine, features a gubernatorial primary race in the wake of Mr. Taft. Mr. Blackwell is strongly supported by social conservatives and their allies within the fundamentalist Christian movement. He is pitted against Attorney General Jim Petro, supported by more moderate elements.

This widening division has spilled over into a nasty dispute between conservative, moderate and liberal clergy. In an attempt to counter the political activities of the religious right, 31 moderate and liberal religious leaders recently sent a strongly worded letter to the IRS accusing the Rev. Rod Parsley and the Rev. Russell Johnson of using their churches and other nonprofit ministries to advance partisan causes, including the candidacy of Ken Blackwell. Rev. Parsley, Rev. Johnson and their conservative supporters deny the charges. Mr. Blackwell for his part called the 31 ministers "bullies," saying "political and social and cultural forces are trying to run God out of the public square."

Yet the debate between the moderate and conservative wings of Ohio's Republican Party goes beyond Messrs. Petro and Blackwell. Some conservatives are angry at Sen. DeWine, and are threatening to withhold support, largely because he joined forces with the "gang of 14" to end the judicial filibuster spat last spring. Ironically, two of Mr. Bush's most conservative nominees to the federal bench, Priscilla Owens and Janice Rogers Brown, would not have been confirmed without this agreement, and arguably Justices John Roberts and Samuel Alito would have faced filibusters from Senate liberals opposed to their nominations. Nonetheless, his relationship with some conservatives has worsened.

With Gov. Taft's ratings running as low as 16% approval in one poll, and with charges of corruption and cronyism rampant throughout the party, Ohio Republicans face some pretty tough obstacles in this year's elections. Add to this broken campaign promises that resulted in the highest tax increase in Ohio history, an exodus of the state's young people to pursue opportunity elsewhere, the general trend against Republicans nationally, and the complete ineptness of Republican leaders to enunciate any kind of bold political initiatives -- and you have the makings of a Democrat sweep this November.

The biggest advantage going for Republicans, in purely electoral terms, is the ineptness of the Democrats. They have a long tradition of turning sure things into might-have-beens. This, however, is simply not enough. Democratic incompetence has led to Republican domination, which, with no effective opposition, has untethered the GOP from its first principles. In the absence of these, corruption has reigned. The political lens might be clouded and growing darker; but Ohio Republicans need to decide whether or not they want to stand for something.

Mr. Kasich is a former Ohio congressman and author of "Stand for Something: The Battle for America's Soul," forthcoming from Warner Books.

Baghdad On The Bosporus (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Howard Kaloogian, vying for the Republican nomination in the race to succeed felonious former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), just returned from a trip to Baghdad and posted on his Web site a photo showing a busy urban street scene, which he said proved that Baghdad is "much more calm and stable" than people think.

But something didn't look right to readers of the liberal Web site Daily Kos, who noted that women in the photo were wearing Western clothing, a couple was holding hands, and signs are in the Roman alphabet.

Soon after this discovery yesterday, the photo disappeared from the Kaloogian Web site and was replaced by a notice: "We originally posted a photograph not of Baghdad, Iraq but from Istanbul, Turkey, where our delegation traveled on the way home to the United States. We apologize for this mistake."

The photo was replaced by a long-distance shot of a Baghdad street empty of pedestrians. Late yesterday the whole display disappeared.

McCain Pursues Southern Primary Strategy For 2008 (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 30, 2006

Despite his iconic status as a maverick and sometimes centrist, some Southern lawmakers say Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) could compete for Dixie states in the 2008 Republican primary.

McCain, who is scheduled to headline a Lincoln Day dinner in Polk County, Fla., on April 8, has visited several Southern states in recent weeks and has been cultivating Southern political leaders.

This spring, McCain will give the commencement address at Liberty University, a school founded by evangelical Christian leader Jerry Falwell. He angered some religious conservatives by calling Falwell an “agent of intolerance” when he ran against George W. Bush for the 2000 Republican presidential nomination.

Falwell, who did not offer an endorsement, told the Lynchburg, Va., News & Advance that he and McCain have put their differences behind him but that McCain still has fences to mend.

“I think to any presidential candidate, the South is important,” said McCain, who despite pointing out that he has visited other regions of the country noted the prominence of the South Carolina and Alabama primaries.

“He’s fully aware that he has to carry some of the South to win the nomination,” said one Southern lawmaker who is considering backing McCain.

Most lawmakers and aides interviewed said it is too early to tell how McCain’s second presidential bid will play with Southern conservatives, but several said they could envision him appealing to their constituents because of his military background, his support for the president on the Iraq war or his crusade against earmarks.

“He has some credibility with every crowd because he’s all over the place,” said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who, like most Republican officials, has yet to choose sides in the 2008 primary. “It depends on who he’s squaring off against.”

Some lawmakers questioned whether McCain could overcome his reputation as an agitator and outsider to claim support from Republican primary voters.

DOJ_NMG_0024244

"I think they feel like he's too unpredictable," said border-state Rep. Anne Northup (R-Ky.). "I don't think it's that they don't like the individualism; it's that he seems to relish that."

McCain's efforts with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and others to establish a guest-worker program as part of Senate immigration legislation could alienate Southern voters who view the proposal as amnesty for those who have broken the law.

"I don't think Southerners are going to appreciate his immigration bill," said Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), the former House majority leader. DeLay declined to handicap McCain's chances in the South, saying he would need more time to analyze the race.

McCain already has at least a few ties to the South, where fellow Sens. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and influential Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) have said supportive things about him.

Such backing from political leaders could give McCain credibility in the South, where he must try to emphasize his ties to the Republican establishment to win, according to the Southern lawmaker

"Independence, in the South, is not a high virtue," the lawmaker said.

Southern conservatives could be more inclined to back McCain based on his chances in a general election if Democrats appear likely to nominate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), some lawmakers said.

It remains to be seen whether McCain can execute a new Southern strategy, but Southerners have noted his presence.

"He's been down there working hard. He's got a lot of support," said Republican Jim DeMint, South Carolina's junior senator.

The two senators have collaborated on a campaign to cut federal spending, an issue that DeMint predicts will be front and center in the Republican primary. "I hear that more than anything else," DeMint said.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) likened the primary fray to a three-phase relationship: a getting-to-know-you period, a courtship period and, finally, a marriage. He said that McCain can appeal to Republican primary voters in the South but that he is still in the first phase: introducing himself.

Like a prospective dater, McCain was coy yesterday, saying, "I haven't decided whether I'm going to run or not."

He had just wrapped up a one-on-one conversation with former White House chief of staff and Republican superlobbyist Ken Duberstein on a Capitol veranda.

Things Continue To Fall In Place For John McCain (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, March 30, 2006

It's still a long time until the Iowa caucuses formally kick off the 2008 race for the White House. But it's hard not to conclude that events are lining up perfectly for Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), should he decide to make another run.

A weakened President Bush and a damaged Republican Party are more likely than not to convince GOP activists around the country — including some conservatives and party regulars who ordinarily would not warm to McCain — that the Arizona Republican is the only man who can carry the party's banner in 2008.

The threat of a Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) presidency has always been McCain's ace in the hole. Even conservatives who worry about McCain's independent streak — including the Arizona Republican's support for campaign finance reform and his co-sponsorship (with Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, no less) of a guest worker program — might well find McCain preferable to a Clinton victory.

Even if Democrats bypass the New York Senator and turn to an allegedly "more electable" moderate such as former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, many Republicans may come to believe that only McCain can keep the White House in GOP hands.

What nobody has yet commented on, however, is how the 2006 midterm elections now seem all but destined to boost McCain's presidential prospects.

Democrats are headed for significant gains in both chambers of Congress in November. Even if they fail to win control in at least one chamber, they are likely to be seen as the clear winners and Bush and his party as the clear losers on Election Day.

That result, no doubt, would produce a wave of stories about the GOP's troubles, with columnists, politicians (Democratic and Republican) and TV talking heads yammering on about the Republican Party's demise. There would be plenty of talk about infighting within the party, and there would be even more punditry about how the Republicans are in a sorry state just two years before the next presidential election.

The election results, in other words, are likely to increase panic among some Republicans, who will fear that the Democrats' success in running on a message of change during the midterm elections is an omen of things to come in '08.

This kind of reaction from Republicans and the media is likely to enhance McCain's attractiveness as a presidential candidate. The more gloom and doom surrounding his party, the better McCain looks. The more the GOP needs to counterpunch with its own message of change, reform and leadership, the more attractive McCain appears to Republicans, independents and even some Democrats.

Even Republican critics of the Arizona Senator agree that McCain has broad general election appeal, and his primary foes would have a harder time rallying their fellow Republicans against him if the only thing standing between Democratic control of the entire federal government is McCain.

Remember, the ranks of Senators up for re-election in 2008 include 21 Republicans and only 12 Democrats, giving Democrats an engraved invitation to win a majority in the Senate if they can put together sizable gains this November. You can bet that virtually all of those Republicans would like to have McCain running with them at the top of the Republican ticket.

McCain will be in much demand this year, as Republican incumbents look to inoculate themselves on issues such as ethics, government spending and even the war.

Ethics, government transparency and political corruption could well grow as issues over the next couple of years, especially if Democrats take the House in November and begin to use their powers to scrutinize the Bush administration and other Republicans. Again, McCain, known as an advocate of campaign finance reform, looks like the best antidote for the GOP.

Timing is everything in politics, and while McCain has been making himself more acceptable to Bush loyalists by standing with the president's general approach to Iraq and the war on terrorism, the administration's problems and the president's weakness also have been combining to enhance the Arizona Republican's appeal within his own party.

How far has McCain come to be accepted by religious conservatives in his party? He will be the graduation speaker at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University in May.

These are very good times for McCain, whose military background and reputation as a reformer and a straight shooter seem a perfect fit for the issues of the day and the Republican Party's current problems. And that's why he has emerged as the frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination, overtaking my initial favorite, Virginia Sen. George Allen.

Md. Approves Fund To Support Medical Stem Cell Research (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Maryland will become one of four states that have agreed to fund stem cell research, following final passage yesterday of legislation in the House of Delegates and a pledge from Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) to sign it, despite misgivings by most lawmakers in his party.

With Ehrlich's signature, the state will offer as much as $15 million in grants in the coming year to university and private-sector researchers seeking treatments for debilitating conditions through work on stem cells, including those derived from human embryos.

In the wake of a 2001 executive order by President Bush limiting federal support for embryonic research, debate over funding the controversial science has been pushed down to statehouses across the country.

"We're going to sign it," Ehrlich said of the bill that passed the House 90 to 48 and had already won approval in the Senate. "It furthers our reputation nationally and internationally. . . . It helps us retain our best and brightest here."

Much of the money, to be awarded by a state commission, is expected to flow to researchers at Johns Hopkins University and University of Maryland campuses, as well as to a few companies in Maryland's biotech sector conducting research on adult stem cells. The adult cells, while not considered as promising for research, are less controversial because collecting them does not require the destruction of an embryo.

Julie Coons, president of the Tech Council of Maryland, said she also sees potential for the legislation to foster start-up companies, as long as future governors and lawmakers continue to provide financial support.

"We have made a major step forward in helping the industry but also in sending a message . . . that we are a player in this field," Coons said.

In the wake of Bush's order, New Jersey was the first state to appropriate money for embryonic stem cell research. Californians then voted to spend $3 billion on the research over 10 years, though that money has been held up by lawsuits. And grant money will soon be available in Connecticut, where lawmakers created a research fund last year.

The issue has been one of the most emotional and most divisive taken up by the Maryland General Assembly this year, with opponents arguing that work on embryonic cells is tantamount to abortion. Supporters have spoken of the promise the research holds for such conditions as Parkinson's disease and juvenile diabetes.

Several advocates for the bill, some of them with those conditions, unfurled a banner in the House gallery that read, "Thank you for hope!" after the vote.

A tearful celebration ensued on the State House steps, where advocates were joined by sponsors of the legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0024246

"We've done the right thing for our state, not just for people here today but for others who are suffering," said Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), author of a more expansive bill passed by the House earlier that mandated $25 million a year for embryonic stem cell research.

The bill that passed yesterday, which originated in the Senate, incorporated several compromises, including leaving the level of funding to future governors.

Opponents in the House offered less impassioned arguments yesterday than in previous debate, recognizing they had no realistic chance of stopping the bill.

House Minority Whip Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert) stressed that he and other opponents support adult stem cell research, which is closer to yielding therapies. It is work on embryonic cells that they oppose.

"Please don't misinterpret these votes," O'Donnell said. "They're a matter of conscience."

Only four of the chamber's 43 Republicans voted for the bill. In the Senate, only one of the 13 GOP members supported it.

Ehrlich, in an interview, said he was comfortable signing the bill despite the lack of support from his caucus, given his track record supporting stem cell research reaching back to his days in Congress.

"I have my views, and those views are part of my record, part of my belief system," he said.

Similar legislation died on the final day of the legislative session last year under the threat of a filibuster on the Senate floor. Ehrlich remained largely silent on the issue then.

At the outset of this session, the governor sought to craft a middle ground. He included $20 million in his budget proposal for stem cell research but insisted grants be available for work on adult stem cells, if scientists found it promising.

Lawmakers sponsoring the bill initially balked, arguing that federal funding is plentiful for work on adult stem cells. But the bill was heavily amended to make it palatable to the more socially conservative Senate.

"It's evolved into . . . what we envisioned," Ehrlich said.

His posture on the bill remained unclear until yesterday because he had said repeatedly that he did not believe legislation was necessary to fund the science. Ehrlich suggested that his budget proposal was sufficient, but lawmakers insisted on establishing guidelines in the law for awarding the grants.

Mental Health Coverage Affordable, Study Finds (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

A new study involving federal employees has found that providing better mental health coverage does not lead to an explosion in insurance costs, a potentially important development in an old national debate over what insurance plans should cover.

The study, published today in the New England Journal of Medicine, examined seven federal health plans in the years after 1999, when President Bill Clinton ordered companies in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program to provide coverage for mental health and substance abuse that is comparable to that for other health conditions.

Researchers found that, contrary to the predictions of some policymakers and analysts, the use and cost of such services did not increase, compared with the experience of private health plans with less generous mental health benefits -- provided that new benefits were offered under managed-care plans. The changes did, however, mean lower out-of-pocket expenses for people who used the services under the federal plans.

"These results are important, because it means that it is affordable for all of us who have health insurance to have better protection in the event that we might need to use mental health or substance abuse services," said Howard H. Goldman, the lead researcher and professor of psychiatry at the University of Maryland School of Medicine.

The findings provide ammunition for advocates of mental health "parity" in the long-running battle in Congress and state legislatures over whether health insurance companies should be required to offer mental health coverage that is equivalent to the coverage they offer for physical diseases such as cancer or diabetes.

Such expanded coverage is ardently supported by mental health professionals and patients' groups, who say it would eliminate long-standing discrimination against people who are mentally ill. Just as passionately, leading business groups almost unanimously oppose such a requirement, saying it would increase insurance premiums and force some employers to scale back coverage for physical diseases or drop health benefits altogether.

In general, mental health and substance abuse coverage has come with higher out-of-pocket costs to patients and greater restrictions on office visits and days in the hospital.

Ralph Ibson, a vice president with the nonprofit National Mental Health Association, said the study shows that requiring mental health parity in employer-provided insurance plans is a good idea that will not break the bank.

DOJ_NMG_0024247

"This study, which is certainly enormous and robust, very decisively puts to rest some of the major myths that opponents have brought to this debate, the principal myth being that to enact and implement parity is to increase health-care costs," Ibson said.

Edwina Rogers, vice president for health policy at the ERISA Industry Committee, an association of major employers, said a single study does not settle the argument and that costs are still a concern.

"The data can be massaged on either side of this particular debate," Rogers said. "There is a big push in the mental health community to kind of force the government to say they have this right to sort of a steady stream of benefits, to mandate it. What they are asking for is just not appropriate."

Rogers said many large employers already offer generous mental health coverage.

Goldman and other researchers, working under contract to the federal government, looked at seven FEHB plans from 1999 to 2002, comparing them to similar plans in the private sector that did not offer enhanced mental health and substance abuse coverage. More than 300,000 people were continuously enrolled in each set of plans.

The research team found that the rates of spending on, and use of, mental health and substance abuse services rose in both groups over the study period, but no more so in the federal group than in the other one. At the same time, enrollees in five of the seven federal plans saw average reductions in out-of-pocket spending ranging from $14 to $87 a year. The plans were managed-care plans.

"Managed care has figured out how to direct care and prioritize things within budgets," said Richard G. Frank, a professor of health economics at Harvard Medical School. "What our results suggest is that if you are going to do parity and you are concerned about cost growth, then parity is a good idea if it's done along with managed care."

Playing The Odds To Boost Revenues, State Lotteries Wager On Slots (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

LINCOLN, R.I. -- The giant signs on the old dog track show greyhounds and thoroughbreds. But the thousands of New Englanders crossing the wind-swept parking lots on a late winter afternoon are here for another way to gamble: slot machines.

Rhode Island isn't one of the 11 states that allow casino gambling. Its state lottery commission is one of a growing number to embrace slots -- one of the most popular and addictive forms of betting -- as a way to increase revenue.

Paul Musard, an 82-year-old retired engineer from nearby North Providence, says he and his wife come every two weeks. This day, they've both won. Other days, they lose their self-imposed daily limit of $40 each. "It's an enjoyment," Mr. Musard says. "A lot of people spend $150 going out to dinner. I'd rather spend $40 here."

State lotteries have always cast themselves as relatively benign alternatives to casinos, which many states have kept out for fear of fostering problem gambling. But some states have grown frustrated that they are losing revenue as locals travel to neighboring states or Indian reservations to gamble.

Now, with slot machines accounting for about 70% of revenue in America's casinos, even states such as New York, which has shunned commercial casinos, are moving to tap the slot market. They are teaming up with struggling horse and dog tracks, slot-machine makers and casino companies to create venues that are remarkably similar to commercial casinos. The allure to gamblers: no wait for nightly or weekly lottery drawings.

Currently, after debate and approval by state legislatures, state-sponsored slot machines are in use in nine states: Delaware, Iowa, Maine, New York, Oregon, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, South Dakota and West Virginia. Pennsylvania is preparing to add them, and others are debating such a move.

Most states won't allow old-style "one-armed bandits" with mechanical spinning reels. States prefer to call their machines "video lottery terminals," or VLTs. They resemble the electronic slot machines with push-buttons that have become common in casinos. They are made by the same companies, but are often modified slightly. They don't spit out coins for winners, instead printing receipts that must be redeemed with a cashier. Betting generally goes from one cent to $5, and prizes go up to $100,000 or more.

Rhode Island, which added its first slot machines at a run-down dog track in 1992, has been a pioneer in the move to slick, casino-like "racinos," which are slots-only facilities located at racetracks. Last year, the state lottery chose a company headed by South African gambling magnate Butch Kerzner to run Lincoln Park, which converted its shabby clubhouse into a racino. The state's slot machines now produce 80% of lottery revenues.

Later this year, the New York lottery expects Yonkers Raceway, just north of the Bronx, to open a racino with 3,000 slots. And casino giant MGM Mirage has been given authorization to open next year a huge state-sponsored slots facility at Aqueduct Racetrack in Queens -- the first casino-style gambling facility within New York City. MGM will operate the facility, and will get a percentage of the proceeds.

DOJ_NMG_0024248

Pennsylvania has authorized 14 sites to install 61,000 slot machines, which would make it second to Nevada in total slots. Maine, working with big casino operator Penn National Gaming Inc., recently opened a "Hollywood Slots" parlor on Main Street in downtown Bangor, the state's third-largest city. Late last year, Oklahoma introduced state-sponsored slots. Legislators in Massachusetts and Maryland are seriously considering slots operated by their lotteries, too.

Already, states have installed about 86,000 slot machines. By the end of 2007, under laws already passed, they expect to add 49,000 more, a gain of 57%. There are currently about 675,000 slots in private venues, including casinos and cruise ships.

New Concern

All this is sparking new concern among foes of gambling. Studies of compulsive gamblers suggest that slots are among the most addictive forms of gambling, and that proximity to a casino is a risk factor for turning casual players into compulsive gamblers.

Keith Whyte, executive director of the National Council on Problem Gambling, in Washington, D.C., says lotteries are displaying "a willful ignorance about the impact of problem gambling...because they're both the regulator and the operator." Slot-machine venues are more troublesome than lotteries, Mr. Whyte says, because they create "an enveloping environment. For someone who uses gambling as a way to escape their problems, it's a much more narcotic effect."

The nonprofit council says the boom in state slots is coming amid indications that problem gambling is rising. Its national help line received 227,000 calls in 2005, up 23.8% from 183,328 calls in 2004. A 1998 Harvard Medical School analysis of numerous studies concluded that 1.6% of adults in the U.S. and Canada had suffered from gambling addiction, and an additional 3.85% had experienced mild to moderate gambling problems.

Lotteries officials say they are aware of criticism that slot machines contribute to problem gambling, but that their legislative mandate is to raise revenue for their states. Some lotteries make contributions to gambling-treatment centers. "There are a small number who have a problem," says Gerald Aubin, executive director of Rhode Island's lottery department. "Without the lottery they'd have other [gambling] problems."

Julie Muto, a 48-year-old truck-stop cashier from Carlisle, Iowa, says she became addicted to playing slots in Iowa's riverboat casinos, then lost her house, her car, her truck and her teenage daughter, who moved in with relatives. She spent a year in jail for passing a bad check and 18 months in a residential gambling-treatment facility.

When she got out last year, she says, she avoided casinos. But in December, while gassing up her car, she recalls, she saw one of the "TouchPlay" machines the state lottery had placed in hundreds of convenience stores and restaurants beginning in 2003. It looked like her favorite casino slot. She says she drove to a loan office, got a $200 loan on her car, returned to the store and started playing.

Ms. Muto, who says she is recovering again, told her story to a task force appointed by the governor during a campaign earlier this year to eliminate the machines. On March 14, Iowa legislators passed a bill, since signed by Gov. Thomas Vilsack, requiring the removal of all the machines later this year.

The American Gaming Association, a trade group, says that a small percentage of people can't control their gambling, but disputes that gambling problems have increased in recent years.

Attractive Alternative

Some states regard boosting lottery revenues as an attractive alternative to raising taxes. Although some states have posted budget surpluses recently, the costs of Medicaid, retirement programs and education are rising fast in many states. "In the current environment, raising taxes is politically radioactive," so expanding lotteries is very popular, says Sujit Canagaretna, senior fiscal analyst for Washington-based Council of State Governments.

Rhode Island's lottery is expected to contribute $325.1 million to state revenues during the current fiscal year, or 10.6% of the projected total, and legislators expect lottery revenues to increase by 12% next year. In New York, in the fiscal year ended last June 30, the lottery brought in $2.06 billion, paying for 5% of education spending.

Yet lottery players appear to be growing bored with traditional numbers games. LaFleur's Magazine, a trade publication, says revenue from lottery games in which players choose numbers for daily or weekly drawings fell 8.3% to $9.44 billion last year. Revenue from lottery-operated slot machines rose 15% to $3.6 billion, the publication says. All told, U.S. lottery revenues, which also include popular instant scratch-ticket games, rose 6% last year to $46.9 billion.

Until recently, most states rejected slots and casino-style venues due to worries they would lead to problem gambling, crime and social problems. But slots and casinos were spreading anyway. Indian tribes opened 390 casinos since 1989, many in states such as Connecticut and California that otherwise forbid casino gambling. States such as Mississippi and Missouri permitted "riverboat" casinos that never leave the dock. States without casinos watched their citizens cross state lines. Mr. Aubin of Rhode Island's lottery department says the state has tried to make Lincoln Park more appealing for gamblers to prevent them from driving across the border into Connecticut to Foxwoods Resort Casino and Mohegan Sun Resort Casino, two popular Native American venues.

During the 1990s, the two companies that dominate the business of operating lotteries as state contractors -- Gtech Holdings Corp., of West Greenwich, R.I., and New York's Scientific Games Corp. -- acquired their own slots technology and wooed slumping racetracks as allies in marketing to state regulators. Rhode Island was the first to adopt racetrack slots.

The declining popularity of racetrack betting has heightened the interest of track owners in hosting state-sponsored slot operations. At Yonkers Raceway, after attendance fell to a few hundred a night last year from 20,000 in the early 1970s, the track shut down. Under a plan authorized by the state legislature, Pittsburgh's Rooney family, owner of the track and the Pittsburgh Steelers football team, intends to install 3,000 slot machines and to reopen later this year with a refurbished and expanded facility.

Without the addition of slots, "it wasn't feasible to keep going," says Frank Drucker, a spokesman for the racetrack. The legislation authorizing the changes requires harness racing to resume, a measure intended to support the state's horse breeders.

Racinos like Rhode Island's Lincoln Park use some of the same management techniques as casino floors. The money plugged into each slot game is evaluated monthly, and unpopular games are replaced. In another echo of casinos, Lincoln Park expects to soon team up with Delaware and West Virginia racinos to link hundreds of machines in the three states to create jackpots that can run into the six figures.

The slots at Lincoln Park and at an old jai alai arena in Newport have boosted Rhode Island's lottery revenue to $1,370.95 per resident, the highest in the nation and far higher than the national average of $183.70, according to the North American Association of State and Provincial Lotteries. Rhode Island benefits from numerous visitors from Massachusetts.

This year, as part of a $125 million expansion, Lincoln Park will add 600 slots, a comedy club and several restaurants. One of the owners of the management company, Len Wolman, who until last year helped run the Mohegan Sun, says that when upgrades are finished next year, except for the lack of table games, customers will see no difference between Lincoln Park and a casino. (The state doesn't permit Lincoln Park to give away alcoholic beverages, a common practice in most casinos, because 18-year-olds are allowed by law to play the slots, but not to drink.)

Frank Termini, a construction worker from Uxbridge, Mass., says he started coming a year ago and has been visiting two or three times a week in recent months because the construction business is slow. "I think every state should have this," he says.

Some studies suggest that slots pose a bigger risk of problem gambling than traditional lottery games do. In a recent telephone survey of 2,800 Nova Scotia residents commissioned by the province and conducted by Focal Research Consultants Ltd. of Halifax, 3.6% of respondents said they had trouble controlling the time and money they spent on the province's video-lottery machines. These players accounted for 53% of revenue, Focal Research reported.

In a 2004 study of 180 people being treated for problem gambling, published in the International Journal of Mental Health, Rhode Island Hospital psychiatrist Robert Breen concluded that they become addicted to slot machines in about one year, compared to 3 1/2; years for card games and about five years for racetrack or sports betting. According to a 1996 Minnesota study of 944 gamblers in treatment, published in the Journal of Gambling Studies, 37% of gamblers in treatment programs related their problems to slot machines, while fewer than 1% related them to lottery play.

Easy access to casinos appears to lead more problem gamblers into trouble. A 2000 federal study said that problem gamblers are about twice as prevalent within 50 miles of a casino as farther away. Maureen Corbett, director of the Center for Problem Gambling in Albany, N.Y., says that she opened a new office in Saratoga, N.Y., because calls to the telephone help line in Albany increased 64% after a Saratoga harness-racing track added slots in 2004.

Lincoln Park posts messages on walls and slots urging players to gamble responsibly. The messages include phone numbers for gambling help lines. The New York racinos plan similar measures.

When History, Destiny Converged (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

The shots came from the crowd outside the Washington Hilton that drizzly afternoon -- six shots that would show the nation once again how vulnerable to attack its presidents are.

President Ronald Reagan, then 70, a Washington newcomer in office two months, had paused to wave to the knot of people. At the sound of the shots, Secret Service agents shoved him into the presidential limousine and sped away, not realizing he had been hit. Three men lay wounded, one with blood dripping from his head, and the young assailant, whose mission would soon be revealed, was quickly restrained.

Twenty-five years ago today, the nation watched in shock as television brought home again and again the reality of the shooting. It was a moment chilling in its possibilities, reminding Americans another time in two decades that a national tragedy is only an assassin's bullet away. People saw once again that they live in an epicenter of power, where monumental shifts can occur in an instant.

For some, it was a day that forced them to walk alongside history, to participate in the urgent events that unfolded. Some of them were with the president at his most unguarded moments. They saw his attempts to be strong and his sense of humor. They overheard the "Honey, I forgot to duck" quip he delivered when his wife, Nancy, arrived at the hospital. They revisit their memories of this historic episode from time to time. One of them, who suffered a severe head injury, has had to live with the imprint of that day.

Some say they will always be haunted by what could have happened.

"There's a couple of times where truth and training converge, where history and destiny converge," said Jerry Parr, a Secret Service agent working with Reagan that day. "I thought about that for a long time. It's that moment -- either you do it or you don't, either you save him or you don't."Shots Are Fired

When Jerry Parr was a kid, his father took him to see the movie "Code of the Secret Service" (1939). One of the lead characters, agent Brass Bancroft -- played by Ronald Reagan -- made such an impression on the young boy that he later decided to join the Secret Service. More than 40 years later, Parr would marvel that he had helped save this same man, then president of the United States.

By the time Reagan took office in 1981, Parr was special agent in charge of the presidential protection division, with about 120 agents under his supervision. That day, he was among agents helping guide Reagan to the presidential limousine parked outside the Hilton's side entrance on T Street NW. It was 2:25 p.m., and Reagan had just given a speech to union representatives inside. Suddenly, a young man stepped out from the crowd. Parr switched to "muscle memory," he said -- don't think, just respond -- when he heard the shots.

"It was like a rabbit running for a hole," he said. He and agent Ray Shattuck had one goal, to get Reagan safely inside the limousine.

The first shot hit presidential press secretary James S. Brady in the head. The second struck D.C. police officer Thomas Delahanty. Secret Service agent Timothy J. McCarthy, who opened the limo door, shielding Reagan with his body, took the next shot.

Parr "grabbed the president by the shoulder and started getting him down," he said. "Shattuck was behind me, and we were both giving him a tremendous heave into the car."

Parr jumped in after the president. "Let's move," he shouted to the driver, and, according to plan, the limousine headed south on Connecticut Avenue, toward the White House. Parr helped the president sit up, then began to examine him, running his hands under Reagan's jacket and through his hair. He did not find a wound.

As the limo slid under Dupont Circle, however, Reagan began to spit up blood, and Parr quickly directed the driver to the nearest emergency room, at George Washington University Hospital. The trip took three minutes. Reagan wanted to walk in by himself.

"He hitched up his pants. I offered him my hand, and he didn't want it," Parr said. The president took a few steps and collapsed; agents helped him to a trauma table.

These days, Parr, 75 and long retired, thinks a lot about purpose and destiny; he is co-pastor of Festival Church, an ecumenical church in Adams Morgan. In time, Parr would tell the president that he had set his destiny "by impressing me as a kid."

But that afternoon, Parr remembered, he watched the doctors work, his heart sinking.

"I thought, 'My God, we've lost another one,' " he said.News Begins to Unfold

Sarah Brady was home in Alexandria that afternoon, playing with her 2-year-old son, Scott. A chicken was cooking in the crockpot for supper. The past few months had been exciting for Brady and her husband, Jim Brady, the wisecracking press secretary to the new Republican president.

Jim Brady, then 40, a Chicago native and longtime Washington insider, had won his new job, despite, he would joke later, Nancy Reagan's edict that her husband's new spokesman be someone "young and handsome." Nicknamed "Bear," Brady was known for his outsize personality, his zest for life and his way with one-liners.

The television set was on in the Brady family room that afternoon, and a breaking news report said that someone had just shot at the president but that he was not hurt. Although she was alarmed, Sarah Brady had no idea how life had just been shattered. Further reports said her husband had died. Friends hurried over to take her to the hospital.

Arthur Kobrine, Jim Brady's surgeon, had shocking news for her. "I remember him standing there and saying: 'I'm going to go in. If I'm successful, I do know he'll never have any use of his left arm and very little use of his left leg, but he could very easily succumb to this operation,' " Sarah Brady said.

"There was nothing left for me. I mean, he laid it all out. And I said, 'We've got a little 2-year-old, you've got to keep him alive.' "

DOJ_NMG_0024251

She went to a small room to telephone relatives. The first lady walked in and embraced her. Brady still did not know the president was wounded.

"I said something to her, like, 'I am so, so scared.' And she was shaking, and she said, 'So am I.' " And I just knew, nobody had to tell me, I knew he had been shot, too."At the Hospital

The commotion caught security guard Frederick Bailey's attention as he stood near the emergency ramp at GWU Hospital -- a limo pulling in with a couple of men running alongside it.

"We didn't know at the time who was coming," said Bailey, now head of hospital security.

Secret Service agents burst into the emergency room, ordering families out. Police swarmed the area. Armed officers appeared on nearby rooftops. A media corral was set up across the street. "We weren't sure if it was a plot, and other people were involved," Bailey said. "The hospital went to code purple."

Joseph Giordano reported to the emergency room to find his patient lying on a gurney with "a very bad injury." A bullet had ricocheted off the armored presidential limousine and struck Reagan in the left armpit, stopping an inch from his heart and causing bleeding in his lung.

"I tell everybody, five or 10 more minutes may have made a difference," Giordano said. "You lose blood pressure slowly, then it's off the edge. He was almost there. If there had been much more of a delay, it would have been a different ending."

Reagan was stabilized, but the bleeding did not stop, so surgery was scheduled. Still, the president seemed determined to keep laughing.

"Please tell me you're Republicans," he joked to the doctors about to operate on him. And Giordano, whose liberal Democratic stance was well known, said he replied, "Mr. President, today we are all Republicans."

Giordano did not have time to think about his hand in history that day, not then. A couple of days later, he said, "it dawned on me, when my role was over, I said to myself, 'This better work out well.' "The Bradys Now

President Reagan would stay in the hospital 12 days. Delahanty and McCarthy recovered quickly. But for Jim Brady, the next year would bring him close to death at least three times, and his life would be spent adjusting to a brain injury that also left him partially paralyzed.

From his recliner in his sun-filled family room in Rehoboth Beach, Del., he can see the Atlantic Ocean. The Bradys moved permanently to Rehoboth seven years ago and say they do not miss Washington. The last time he visited was in June 2004, for the funeral of Reagan, a man they speak of warmly. For years, the Reagans telephoned Brady every year on his birthday.

The anniversary of the shooting brings a certain trepidation -- the Bradys know they will have to relive the television footage. They will be asked once more what they think of would-be assassin John W. Hinckley Jr., who was found not guilty by reason of insanity and has spent the past 25 years in a mental hospital. Recently, a federal judge granted Hinckley overnight visits with his parents, who live in Williamsburg -- where Sarah Brady attended the College of William and Mary. The Bradys, who have many friends there, visit Williamsburg often.

"We both believe strongly that he was mentally . . . " Sarah Brady began.

"He's several bubbles off plumb," her husband piped in from the recliner.

"He encroached on me personally," Sarah Brady said. "I feel like he changed our life drastically enough that he encroached on our life for 25 years. I mean, we've had to live with the aftermath of it. . . . And now, when you think he could be walking into one of our favorite haunts and we'd run into him, it's like he's sort of encroaching on us going to Williamsburg now."

But the Bradys don't talk much about destiny, and they are not bitter people. "That wouldn't be classy," Jim Brady often jokes.

Instead, the couple made the best of things. The Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act, which they championed for a decade and President Bill Clinton signed into law in 1993, is one of their greatest accomplishments. For the first time, prospective buyers of handguns had a five-day waiting period and had to pass a criminal background check.

"It used to be the dog and pony show when we'd go around the country talking. I would do the straight stuff," Sarah Brady said, "and I never knew what he would come up with. I did notice if I didn't feed him dinner beforehand, he'd do better because he was madder at me. He says I never feed him. And he also says he doesn't get any sleep."

"He doesn't sleep!" Jim Brady repeated from the recliner. His wife ignored him. "I hate to tell you, but he doesn't get up till noon most days," she said dryly.

In their beachfront home, shared with two dogs and two cats, they are happy, they said. Next week, they are going to an autism ball at the local hospital. Their son, Scott, now 27 and a sound engineer, lives south of Charlottesville and visits often. They have lots of friends. Life didn't turn out the way they thought it would, but they made a whole different life.

"When life gives you lemons, you make lemonade," Jim Brady said. "I have several stands around here."

Security Council Message To Iran 'Unmistakable': Rice (AFP)

AFP, March 30, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice greeted as "unmistakeably clear" the UN Security Council's statement giving Iran 30 days to abandon its uranium enrichment activities.

"The adoption today by the UN Security Council of a Presidential Statement on Iran is an important diplomatic step," Rice said in a statement.

"It demonstrates that the international community is united in its concern over Iran's nuclear program," Rice said shortly before she was to depart for meetings in Europe on the Iran nuclear issue.

"Iran is more isolated now than ever. The Security Councils Presidential Statement sends an unmistakable message to Iran that its efforts to conceal its nuclear program and evade its international obligations are unacceptable."

Rice added that the international community expects Iran to comply with the International Atomic Energy Agency's call to suspend its uranium enrichment-related activities and to return to negotiations.

Earlier, the UN Security Council unanimously approved a non-binding statement giving Iran 30 days to halt uranium enrichment activities.

The full 15-member council backed a watered-down text worked out among the five veto-wielding permanent members that requested a report in 30 days from the IAEA director on Iranian compliance with the steps required by the IAEA board.

U.N. Security Council Softens Tone In Asking Iran To Halt Nuke Program (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, March 30, 2006

The United Nations Security Council on Wednesday urged Iran to suspend its nuclear program and said it would take up the issue again in 30 days.

It was the first time the U.N. body has condemned Iran's nuclear ambitions, a move that could ultimately lead to sanctions.

The statement, which took three weeks to craft, is weaker than the United States, Britain and France originally sought. Earlier drafts called for the council to meet again in 14 days and said Iran's activities were a potential “threat to international peace and security.” Under the U.N. charter, that language can justify economic sanctions or military strikes.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Russia and China watered down the statement. “The message is clear nonetheless that Iran's nuclear weapons program is unacceptable,” Bolton said.

The council acted a day before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was to meet in Berlin with foreign ministers from the other four veto-holding members of the council — Russia, China, Britain and France — as well as Germany. The six officials are to discuss longer-range policy toward Iran, said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

In January, Iran resumed efforts to enrich uranium, a fuel that can be used for civilian power plants or bombs. Iran denies it intends to make weapons, but the International Atomic Energy Agency still has many questions about the program, much of which Iran hid for nearly two decades.

Iran has refused a Russian offer to produce nuclear fuel for a power plant the Russians are constructing near the Iranian port of Bushehr.

Russia fears tough measures against Iran more than it fears an Iran with nuclear weapons, says Toby Gati, an assistant secretary of State in the Clinton administration. “They are sure that what we've done in Iraq will make things worse and deadly afraid that we'll repeat the mistake in Iran,” she says.

“Any ideas involving the use of force or pressure in resolving the issue are counterproductive and cannot be supported,” Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said in Moscow on Wednesday.

Russia also does not want to jeopardize commercial ties with Iran, including the $1 billion nuclear reactor it is completing at Bushehr and a plan to sell Iran $700 million in missiles, says Ariel Cohen, a Russia expert at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington think tank. Trade between the two countries is about $2 billion a year, the Russian Embassy in Washington says.

Mark Parris, a former U.S. diplomat and Russia specialist, says Russia is in a “no-lose situation” when it comes to Iran. Sanctions or military action would send the price of oil, currently about $60 a barrel, even higher, enriching a Russia that is already earning half a billion dollars a day from oil sales.

If Iran agrees to suspend its nuclear program, Russia will also benefit because it may win the contract to produce uranium fuel for the Bushehr facility and other nuclear power plants it wants to construct in Iran, he said.

Stop Enrichment, U.N. Tells Tehran (WT/AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024253

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council demanded yesterday that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the first time the powerful body has directly urged Tehran to clear up suspicions that it is seeking nuclear weapons.

The 15-nation council unanimously approved a statement that will ask the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), to report back in 30 days on Iran's compliance with demands to stop enriching uranium.

Diplomats portrayed the statement, which is not legally binding, as a first, modest step toward compelling Iran to make clear that its program is for peaceful purposes. The Security Council eventually could impose economic sanctions, though Russia and China say they oppose such tough measures.

The document was adopted by consensus and without a vote after a flurry of negotiations among the five veto-wielding council members. In the end, Britain, France and the United States made several concessions to China and Russia, Iran's allies, who wanted as mild a statement as possible.

Still, the Western countries said the statement expresses the international community's shared conviction that Iran must comply with the governing board of the IAEA and the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Enrichment is a process that can produce either fuel for a nuclear reactor or the material for a nuclear warhead.

"The council is expressing its clear concern and is saying to Iran that it should comply with the wishes of the governing board," said France's U.N. ambassador, Jean-Marc de La Sabliere.

Members of the council wanted to reach a deal before today, when foreign ministers from the five veto-wielding council members and Germany meet in Berlin to discuss strategy on Iran.

Diplomats would not say exactly what will happen if Iran does not comply with the statement within 30 days, but suggested that would be discussed by the foreign ministers in Berlin.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton said earlier yesterday that the statement "sends an unmistakable message to Iran that its efforts to deny the obvious fact of what it's doing are not going to be sufficient."

The council has struggled for three weeks to come up with a written rebuke that would urge Iran to comply with several demands from the board of the IAEA to clear up suspicions about its intentions. Tehran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes.

The West thinks council action will help isolate Iran and put new pressure on it to clear up suspicions about its intentions. It has proposed an incremental approach, refusing to rule out sanctions.

U.S. officials have said the threat of military action also must remain on the table.

Security Council Calls On Iran To Halt Uranium Enrichment (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, March 29, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United Nations Security Council on Wednesday called on Iran to stop enriching uranium and resolve concerns that it's developing nuclear weapons, but the statement wasn't legally binding, and it was watered down in response to demands from Russia and China.

The Security Council gave Iran 30 days to comply, but Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations, rejected the statement, saying the issue "is only about Iran's rights" and that his country "is allergic to pressure and intimidation."

The U.N. effort to curtail Iran's work on uranium enrichment, a process that produces low enriched uranium for civilian power plants and highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons, came only after weeks of wrangling among the Security Council's five permanent members.

The fact that Russia, China, the United States, France and Britain had a difficult time hammering out a common position suggests that it may be hard for the Bush administration to win approval of U.N. sanctions if Iran ignores the council's demands. Russia and China, which have huge financial stakes in oil-rich Iran and veto power in the council, refused to accept any language in Wednesday's statement that could be interpreted as paving the way for sanctions.

The statement was adopted only after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and Washington agreed to drop a sentence restating the Security Council's authority to impose sanctions, said a senior State Department official who requested anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

The statement set the stage for talks that Rice is to hold in Berlin on Thursday with her British, French, German, Chinese and Russian counterparts on what steps should be taken if Iran refuses to suspend its uranium enrichment work.

Iran denies that it's seeking nuclear weapons and insists that it has the right to peaceful enrichment as a signatory of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the cornerstone of the global system designed to halt the spread of nuclear arms.

However, Tehran has admitted that it hid its program from the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency for 18 years, and Iran has repeatedly failed to explain numerous aspects of the effort. They include deals for weapons-related know-how with an international smuggling ring and information indicating Iranian military involvement in the project.

DOJ_NMG_0024254

The 35-nation IAEA Board of Governors referred the matter to the Security Council in February after Iran ended a more than two-year suspension of uranium enrichment work.

In the statement, the 15-nation council said Iran should comply with the IAEA's demand for a "full and sustained" enrichment suspension and clear up all outstanding questions, saying those steps are "essential to build confidence in the exclusively peaceful purpose of its nuclear program."

"Iran is more isolated now than ever," Rice said in a statement. "The Security Council's Presidential Statement sends an unmistakable message to Iran that its efforts to conceal its nuclear program and evade its international obligations are unacceptable."

"The ball is in Iran's court," said France's U.N. envoy, Jean-Marc de la Sabliere.

U.S. and European officials stressed that they remained open to a resumption of European-led negotiations with Tehran on a settlement under which Iran would give up enrichment but could operate nuclear power plants.

U.S. officials have said that if Iran rejects the council's statement, the Bush administration will press to impose sanctions that would penalize regime members, but not ordinary Iranians.

Unlike the statement, a Security Council resolution would have the force of international law.

President Bush also has refused to exclude the possibility of military strikes on Iranian nuclear facilities. European governments oppose the use of force, as do Russia and China.

Security Council Pressures Tehran (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 29 -- The Security Council called on Iran Wednesday to suspend its uranium enrichment program within 30 days, ending three weeks of deadlock between Western powers and Russia and China over how to pressure Tehran to prove its nuclear efforts are not aimed at making weapons.

The 15-member council unanimously adopted a nonbinding statement on Iran after the United States and five other key countries finished difficult negotiations on its wording. The statement does not commit the United Nations to action against Iran and was written to avoid language that might clearly set the stage for sanctions or subsequent military moves -- the sort of direct pressure that Russia and China have declined to support.

But U.S. and other Western officials said the Security Council's action -- its first unified statement on Iran's nuclear program -- represents an important breakthrough and could set the stage for a tougher line later if Tehran refuses to meet the council's demands. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was set to meet Thursday in Berlin with foreign ministers of Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany to map out the next steps in confronting Iran over its nuclear program.

"Iran is more isolated now than ever," Rice said in a statement after the vote. "The Security Council's Presidential Statement sends an unmistakable message to Iran that its efforts to conceal its nuclear program and evade its international obligations are unacceptable."

Referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' atomic watchdog, she continued: "The international community expects Iran to comply with the IAEA's call to suspend all enrichment-related activity and to return to negotiations."

Iran's U.N. ambassador, Javad Zarif, told reporters his government has not decided on a formal response, but said that Iran will never give up its right to produce nuclear fuel for a peaceful nuclear energy program.

"Iran will want to cooperate with the international community, but it does not accept pressure or intimidation," he said. "We have made it clear at the highest levels of government Iran does not want nuclear weapons, nor does it want to pursue development, stockpiling or acquisition of these inhumane weapons."

The council accord was struck just hours after Rice urged Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov during a telephone call to support a French and British draft statement urging Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment within 30 days or face increased, but unspecified, international pressure. The statement also calls on Iran to fully cooperate with the IAEA, which conducts inspections aimed at preventing the spread of atomic weapons.

U.S., British and French diplomats secured Russian and Chinese support by offering concessions that softened the tone of the statement, which was read by the council's rotating president, Cesar Mayoral of Argentina. They included extending the deadline for Iranian compliance from 14 to 30 days, and dropping language hinting that Iran's nuclear program constitutes a threat to international peace and security.

DOJ_NMG_0024255

The agreement on the statement masked persistent divisions among the Security Council five veto-wielding powers over the threat of sanctions or the military force to compel Iranian cooperation.

Lavrov said in Moscow that "any ideas involving the use of force or pressure in resolving the issue are counterproductive and cannot be supported."

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, told reporters in New York that the council's statement underscores the importance of pursuing a diplomatic settlement and letting U.N. inspectors, not the Security Council, take the lead.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, insisted that the Security Council, which is vested by the U.N. charter with responsibility for responding to threats to international peace and security, has the obligation to prevent Tehran from producing nuclear weapons. He expressed frustration that Moscow and Beijing had blocked language in the statement highlighting the council's obligation to react to such threats.

"What happened here today is that Russia and China declined to quote from the U.N. charter," said Bolton, waving a copy of the charter. "We accept that . . . because the message is clear, nonetheless, that Iran's nuclear weapons program is unacceptable."

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Andrei Denisov, conceded that there are "suspicions, very strong suspicions" that Iran is developing nuclear weapons, but he said there is still no hard evidence and that it is up to U.N. nuclear inspectors to decide.

The U.N. statement expressed concern that the IAEA has not provided assurances, after years of investigation into covert aspects of Tehran's nuclear program, that Iran is not secretly developing nuclear weapons. It calls on Iran to comply with the agency's demand to halt all of its uranium enrichment activities to "build confidence" that Iran's nuclear activities are for an "exclusively peaceful purpose." IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei is to report on "the process of Iran's compliance" in 30 days.

Iran says it needs to enrich uranium to produce electricity for an energy-hungry society. The IAEA has accused Iran of engaging in a pattern of deception and concealment that has fueled international suspicions. It acknowledges that Iran has the right to nuclear energy and that it cannot prove Iran is pursuing a nuclear weapons program.

U.N. Council Urges Iran To Halt Atom Activity (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 29 — The Security Council urged Iran on Wednesday to suspend its uranium-enrichment activities and asked the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency to report back on Iran's compliance within 30 days.

The Council took its action in a presidential statement, a nonbinding declaration that needs unanimous support and usually achieves consensus among the 15 members with little resistance. But this one, on the highly charged issue of Iran's nuclear program, which the West maintains is geared toward producing weapons, resulted in three weeks of bruising negotiations that ended up producing a markedly weakened final version.

In a last-minute concession on Tuesday afternoon by the European authors of the final draft, the text eliminated language suggesting that any Iranian drive to produce nuclear weapons would be a "threat to international peace and security." China and Russia had argued that the term established a pretext for sanctions, which they both oppose.

"When you speak about a threat to international peace and security, you must have strong, clear and legally proved evidence," Andrei Denisov, the Russian ambassador, said before the Council acted.

The statement also dropped references to specific charges and demands for compliance from Tehran and lengthened the period for the report from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Vienna-based United Nations nuclear watchdog, to 30 days from 14 days.

In another step necessary to gain Chinese and Russian support, the statement gave the nuclear agency continuing shared authority over the Iran issue that earlier drafts assigned wholly to the Security Council. Beijing and Moscow fear the Council's power to impose sanctions.

Western ambassadors conceded that the document had been watered down, but argued that it was still meaningful.

"There are some points not in the text that frankly we would have preferred to have seen in the text," said Emyr Jones Parry, the British ambassador. "Other colleagues said no, that would send a different message at this particular time."

Despite the text changes, he said, "no one doubts that the Security Council is competent for this issue, no one doubts that proliferation is a threat to international peace and security, and we all say the same thing: that we do not wish to see Iran develop nuclear weapons."

The statement avoids suggesting any consequences for noncooperation by Iran, but Jean-Marc de la Sablière, France's ambassador, said: "Iran has 30 days. We hope that Iran will comply. If Iran doesn't comply, then the Security Council will have to take its responsibilities."

DOJ_NMG_0024256

The most vocal critic of Iran's nuclear activity, John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, said, "This is an unambiguous signal to Iran that the Security Council, charged with the maintenance of international peace and security under the Charter, is now dealing with this issue."

He said the Council action would allow an Iran-themed meeting on Thursday in Berlin involving Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign ministers of Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia to be "forward looking."

"We're finished with the presidential statement: that step is over," he said. "Now we look to the future and see if Iran varies the conduct from that it has been following for the past 18 years."

The European ambassadors said they would not prejudge Iran's response and urged Tehran to comply so that negotiations over its nuclear program could resume.

Mr. Bolton held out no such hope. "We are prepared to be back on the 31st day," he said, "given the Iranian record to date of consistently flouting the International Atomic Energy Agency, attempting to obstruct what they have done and continuing to pursue nuclear weapons."

In a news conference after the Security Council session, Iran's ambassador, Javad Zarif, said Tehran had historically placed little faith in the Security Council and doubted that its action would have any effect on Tehran.

"Pressure and threats do not work for Iran," he said. "Iran is a country that is allergic to pressure and threats and intimidation."

U.N. Security Council Drafts Statement On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council broke a three-week impasse on Iran and agreed on a statement demanding that Tehran suspend all uranium enrichment.

Diplomats hailed the step as an important breakthrough, but it is unclear what impact the statement will have in Tehran, where the Iranian government insists it will proceed with its nuclear-development plans as a matter of sovereign right.

Concerns over the U.N. standoff with Iran have helped keep oil prices above $60 a barrel in recent weeks. Iran is the second-largest producer in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries after Saudi Arabia. The U.S.'s Energy Information Administration yesterday reported that commercial stockpiles of gasoline declined by 5.4 million barrels last week to 216.2 million barrels. The May crude delivery contract on the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday rose 38 cents a barrel to $66.45.

The U.N. statement, which isn't legally binding and falls short of a resolution, expresses "serious concerns" that Iran has failed to comply with a series of steps laid out by the International Atomic Energy Agency to assure that Tehran isn't pursing nuclear weapons. Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but the statement notes "that the IAEA is unable to conclude that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran."

The statement asks IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei to report to the Security Council in 30 days on Iran's compliance.

The U.N. agreement "demonstrates that the international community is united in its concern over Iran's nuclear program," said U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a statement. "Iran is more isolated now than ever."

The five permanent members of the Security Council -- the U.S., France, Britain, China and Russia -- have been locked in negotiations since early this month to craft a joint position on Iran, even one that makes no mention of potential sanctions or other leverage. Each permanent member of the Security Council has powers of veto. Russia and China have staunchly resisted any diplomatic moves that might eventually pave the way to sanctions or military actions, as happened with Iraq. They have also pushed to assure that the IAEA be the main focus of diplomatic action instead of the Security Council.

In a clear nod to those concerns, the statement says that Iranian compliance with all IAEA requests, including the suspension of all nuclear-enrichment activities, "would contribute to a diplomatic, negotiated solution that guarantees Iran's nuclear program is of exclusively peaceful purposes."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told reporters yesterday, before the U.N. agreement was reached, that "any ideas involving the use of force or pressure in resolving the [Iran] issue are counterproductive and cannot be supported."

A top British official this month privately floated the idea of offering Iran a new package of unspecified incentives, saying in a letter that that was the only way to get the Russians and Chinese "to accept significant sanctions [on Tehran] over the coming months." The Bush administration rejected the idea of enticing Iran into compliance with diplomatic sweeteners.

U.S. ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton told reporters the statement "sends an unmistakable message to Iran that its efforts to deny the obvious fact of what it is doing are not going to be sufficient."

The diplomatic path ahead, however, is sure to be rocky. If Iranian officials refuse to suspend enrichment and to make various technical moves required by the IAEA, and Mr. ElBaradei reports back that they remain noncompliant, the U.S., Britain and France are likely to try to push ahead on a resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0024257

But crafting a resolution that contains any threat of sanctions could take months, and will prove exceedingly difficult in the face of a potential veto threat from Russia or China.

Could Sanctions Stop Iran? (WP)

By Carne Ross

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Now that the U.N. Security Council has agreed on a statement demanding that Iran restrict its nuclear program, the United States and its allies are doubtless considering tougher measures, including sanctions, to force Iran's compliance. The experience of sanctions imposed on Iraq (and on other countries), which I helped engineer and maintain as a British diplomat at the Security Council, offers some lessons.

First, no sanctions regime is effective unless its objective is widely shared, especially by the neighbors of the targeted state. On Iraq, even though the United States and Britain managed, through strenuous diplomatic effort, to gain Security Council approval of sanctions, there was considerable evasion of the sanctions by Iraq's neighbors and others, for whom their economic welfare was more important that the goal of disarming Iraq. Even if China and Russia do not block any sanctions resolution on Iran, no resolution will be effective unless they and other states choose to enforce the sanctions.

Second, oil sanctions are a double-edged sword. In the latter years of the 12-year sanctions regime on Iraq, Saddam Hussein often threatened to stop Iraq's oil exports in order to deter the United States and Britain from imposing measures in the Security Council to thwart his sanctions-busting techniques. Then as now, the gap between global oil demand and supply was so small that even the threat of stopping Iraq's exports caused damaging spikes in global oil prices. Any attempt to block or limit Iran's oil exports would surely have similar effects.

Third, even the most aggressive sanctions regimes, such as comprehensive economic sanctions, tend not to achieve their desired effects. While they were in effect, sanctions on Iraq prevented it from rearming -- despite the claims of the U.S. and British governments before the 2003 invasion. But the sanctions did not force Iraq to comply fully with the United Nations' weapons inspectors. It finally took the threat of invasion for Iraq to cooperate with the inspectors in the months before the war.

Instead, comprehensive sanctions caused considerable human suffering in Iraq and, thanks to the control over food rationing that the oil-for-food program placed in the regime's hands, they arguably helped reinforce Hussein's rule. This mistake must not be repeated.

Fourth, any sanctions regime requires a long-term, patient and detailed effort to succeed. Sanctions on Slobodan Milosevic's Yugoslavia were effective partly because the United States and the European Union devoted considerable resources to targeting Milosevic's illegal financial holdings. Although there was lots of rhetoric, and American ships patrolled the Persian Gulf, sanctions enforcement on Iraq was sporadic, as the United States and its allies allowed Iraq's neighbors, particularly Jordan and Turkey, to import oil illegally. It's hard to believe that support for sanctions against Iran, even if they were imposed, would endure for very long.

Sanctions on Libya, imposed in 1992 after the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, were more effective in part because they were more limited. The U.N. ban on arms sales and air travel to Libya was seen as measured and commensurate pressure on Moammar Gaddafi to comply with the Security Council's demand that two Libyan agents accused of planning the bombing be handed over for trial. Even then, it took many years before Libya complied. Here there is a lesson that sanctions, when supported politically and patiently applied, can eventually work. Perhaps here there is scope for something that could work with Iran: a package of travel bans and financial measures targeting Iranian leaders. Targeted sanctions are, after the Iraq experience, now the fashion.

But there is one big reason why any U.S. effort to obtain sanctions against Iran is unlikely to be effective. All U.N. sanctions in the past have been imposed on governments that have done something seriously wrong -- such as invading other countries (Iraq) or brazenly hosting terrorist organizations (the Taliban). The claim that Iran might be developing a nuclear bomb hardly meets this standard, particularly because Pakistan and India got away with it (and with U.S. sympathy) and because U.S. intelligence assertions on weapons of mass destruction are, thanks to the Iraq experience, thoroughly disbelieved. Unless Iran is silly enough to do something such as testing a bomb (which is not very likely), there will probably not be sufficient international support for punitive measures.

All of these reasons suggest that sanctions, as a policy option, are far from straightforward. Without troublemaking from Iran (which perhaps the United States is hoping for), they are unlikely to be agreed to under the current circumstances, and even if they are, they will succeed only if they are very carefully designed, targeted and supported by long-term and diligent diplomacy to shore up support.

US Bans Meetings With Hamas (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

The US administration banned its officials on Wednesday night from meeting the Islamist group Hamas, as the new Palestinian government was sworn in and while Israel's centrist Kadima party opened talks to form a coalition after winning the largest number of seats in Knesset elections.

US officials in the region were instructed by e-mail on Wednesday to have no contacts with Palestinian ministries from 6pm last night.

Canada also announced last night it was suspending assistance to the Palestinian Authority because the new Hamas-led government refused to renounce violence and recognise Israel.

The US brands Hamas a terrorist organisation and bans all contact with the group. But the impact of that policy will become more severe with Hamas now in government.

Washington wants Hamas, which won by a landslide in Palestinian elections in January, to recognise Israel, renounce violence and abide by previously signed peace accords before it will consider a change in attitude.

The US policy will now affect not just Hamas min-isters but also independents and technocrats in the newly formed Palestinian government – though US officials will still be able to speak to Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president.

However, Omar Abdel-Razeq, the new government's finance minister, said he believed that Europe would eventually encourage a rethink of the boycott.

He told the Financial Times: "We believe these positions will be reversed, hopefully by Europe in the beginning and later by the US once they realise that we are serious about the financial transparency and accountability they have been demanding from the Palestinian Authority."

The Palestinian Authority is facing chronic shortfalls in a budget that runs to about $160m (£92m) a month. The US, which has given $1.5bn over the past decade, will donate only to humanitarian agencies in future.

State Dept. Warns Envoys On Hamas Meetings (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 29, 2006

U.S. diplomats considering contacts with Palestinian officials should clarify beforehand whether they have links to Hamas, the State Department said Wednesday.

The warning came as the new Hamas-led government took power in the Palestinian territories. The United States regards Hamas as a terrorist organization, so contacts with Hamas members would be forbidden because of U.S. laws barring exchanges with such groups.

"We will not have contact with members of Hamas, no matter what title they may have," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

McCormack said a notice was sent to U.S. diplomats outlining procedures they should take if questions arise about the affiliations of Palestinian officials.

As a condition of dealing with Hamas, the U.S. and its allies want it to agree to the recognition of Israel, renunciation of terrorism and acceptance of international commitments made by the Palestinian Authority.

Hamas Cabinet Is Sworn In, Widening Break With The Israelis (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, March 29 — The new Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, and his cabinet were sworn in Wednesday, formally putting the Islamic movement Hamas in charge of the Palestinian Authority and marking an almost total break in the government's contact with Israel.

The swearing-in of the Hamas-dominated cabinet, coming just a day after Israel's national elections, crystallized the great shifts in Israeli and Palestinian politics that have come in the past decade: from sweeping peace negotiations to years of fighting and now to declarations that neither side wants anything to do with the other.

Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and his Kadima Party, which came out ahead in the Israeli election, say they want to define Israel's borders over four years and are ready to do it unilaterally.

But Hamas refuses to recognize Israel and has shown no signs of meeting Israeli and international demands to disavow violence and accept previous agreements.

"My message to Israel is to put an end to the occupation, and then there will be no fighting," said Aziz Dweik, the new speaker of the Palestinian parliament and a Hamas member.

DOJ_NMG_0024259

He presided over a budget session on Wednesday that took place simultaneously, through video conference, in Ramallah and in Gaza City because Israeli travel restrictions prevent Hamas members from traveling between the territories.

Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said: "With Hamas formally taking over the government structure of the Palestinian Authority, Israel and many in the international community cannot continue with business as usual. We will not talk to an unreformed Hamas, and we believe many countries think the same as we do."

The United States and the European Union regard Hamas as a terrorist group and refuse to deal with it. Immediately after the new government was sworn in, Canada suspended some assistance to the Palestinian Authority.

But American officials have maintained ties with Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, who leads Fatah, the dominant political movement until its electoral defeat in January.

Still, Israel and the Palestinians cannot completely disentangle themselves. For example, Israel controls the electricity and much of the water supplied to the Palestinians. All food, medicine and other goods going in and out of Gaza must pass through an Israeli-controlled crossing.

Mr. Regev said the policy was to avoid contact with the Hamas government, while trying not to impose hardship on ordinary Palestinians.

But Palestinian officials argue that this distinction is impossible. The Palestinian Authority runs the schools and hospitals, and if Israel continues withholding monthly tax revenues of some $50 million that it collects on behalf of the Palestinians, these essential institutions could quickly collapse, the officials say.

"A hungry man is an angry man," said Mr. Dweik, the speaker. "We hope the world will not allow the Palestinian people to suffer, because this will only make people more radical."

The new Palestinian government faces the urgent problem of raising roughly $170 million each month that it says it needs just to pay government workers and keep the Palestinian Authority functioning.

The swearing-in ceremony on Wednesday, which was held after the parliamentary session, was also conducted by video conference.

Mr. Abbas, who is allowed to travel between the West Bank and Gaza, was in Gaza City. He stood before the 10 new ministers from Gaza as each took his oath with his right hand on the Koran. In Ramallah, the 14 ministers were sworn in before a large television screen beaming the image of Mr. Abbas.

Olmert's Border Plan Draws Fire

By The New York Times

KHARTOUM, Sudan, March 29 — At the end of a two-day Arab League summit meeting here, the leaders on Wednesday condemned Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, for his threat to draw up Israel's borders unilaterally by 2010.

The leaders passed a resolution that rejected the plan as "advancing an insatiable expansionist intention," adding that any such action would prevent establishing an independent and sovereign Palestinian state.

Other concerns raised at the talks included the tense situation in Iraq, Iran's nuclear program and growing influence, and the victory of Hamas in the Palestinian election. Arab countries also pledged $150 million to support the African Union peacekeeping mission in Darfur in Sudan.

This year, only 12 of the 22 Arab heads of state attended.

Commentators for the Arab news media have reflected a general feeling of disappointment with the meeting. One, Dawood as-Shiryan, wrote in the pan-Arab newspaper Al Hayat: "Clearly, the Khartoum summit has earned its place as a model Arab summit. It ignored the important issues. It failed to play a mediatory role, let alone rise to the challenges."

Abbas Swears In Hamas Cabinet Ministers (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, March 30, 2006

Hamas formally took power Wednesday, with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas swearing in 24 Cabinet ministers, including 14 who served time in Israeli prisons.

Soon after the ceremony Canada announced it was suspending aid to the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority, and other nations were expected to follow suit.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States is looking for ways to get humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people, but "we are not going to provide funds to a terrorist organization. And we are not going to provide U.S. funds to a Hamas-led government."

With Hamas now at the helm, the Palestinian government faces a crippling international economic boycott, and may run into immediate difficulties next week when March salaries are to be paid for some 140,000 government employees.

DOJ_NMG_0024260

The Palestinian Authority gets a large part of its approximately $1.9 billion annual budget from overseas sources. Without money from the Arab world, Europe and the United States, a Hamas-led government would be nearly broke.

The newly installed Palestinian Information Minister, Youssef Rizka, called the Canadian action "hasty" and said it "shows obvious bias."

"What we need from the Canadian government is that it ask the Israeli authorities to admit that they are occupying Palestinian land," he told The Associated Press.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay said his government had no choice but to suspend assistance and decline any contact with the new Hamas Cabinet.

"The stated platform of this government has not addressed the concerns raised by Canada and others concerning nonviolence, the recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the roadmap for peace," MacKay said.

"As a result, Canada will have no contact with the members of the Hamas Cabinet and is suspending assistance to the Palestinian Authority."

However, Ottawa emphasized it would continue giving humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people through U.N. and nongovernment organizations.

Wednesday's swearing-in ceremony came just a day after Israel's election and drew clear lines of confrontation. Hamas says it will not soften its violent platform and Israel's victorious Kadima Party says if that is the case, Israel will set the borders of a Palestinian state itself, without negotiations, and keep large areas of the West Bank.

Arab leaders, wrapping up an annual summit in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum, rejected any Israeli move to unilaterally draw its borders with a West Bank withdrawal. In a final statement, they renewed a peace offer for Israel — a 2002 initiative that Israel has rejected, promising a peace with Arab states in return for a withdrawal from all occupied Arab lands.

Israeli officials said it is very unlikely acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert will create a "Hamas bypass" and negotiate directly with the moderate Abbas as long as Hamas refuses to change. Abbas, leader of the defeated Fatah Party, was elected separately and wields considerable power.

Israel suspended tens of millions of dollars in monthly tax transfers to the Palestinian Authority after the Hamas victory, and Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said the Israeli Cabinet would decide on additional sanctions next week.

"With Hamas taking over now, you can't have business as usual," Regev said.

The Cabinet ministers took their oath in two ceremonies, held simultaneously in the West Bank and Gaza because Israel bans the travel of Hamas leaders between the two territories. The two locales were hooked up by video conference.

Abbas presided over the 10-minute ceremony in Gaza City, looking glum, then left without speaking.

The first to be sworn in was Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who walked along a red carpet, then placed his hand on a copy of the Muslim holy book, the Quran, laid out on a low table. He pledged to be "loyal to the homeland and its sacred places."

Haniyeh later told a news conference his government would cooperate with Abbas. He reiterated Hamas won't negotiate with Israel under the current terms, but appeared to be softening his message. Haniyeh said if Abbas wants to go ahead with peace talks, "it's his prerogative and we have no problem with that."

Abbas then held a separate news conference and said the new government "knows what is required" of it, including dealing with Israel. Abbas reiterated that many differences remain between him and Hamas, and that both sides should try to bridge them.

In all, the new Cabinet has 24 ministers, including Haniyeh. Ten are from Gaza and 14 are from the West Bank. Nine have engineering degrees and the rest are university graduates in other fields. Nineteen are Hamas activists and five are independents. One is a woman and one a Coptic Christian.

Fourteen spent time in Israeli prisons, serving terms ranging from six months to six years, most for membership in Hamas or fundraising activities. Haniyeh was arrested by Israel in 1989, and served three years for allegedly heading a Hamas unit that hunted down suspected informers for Israel.

Hamas claims its military and political wings are separate, while Israel maintains Hamas politicians have had direct knowledge of the group's violent attacks that have killed hundreds of Israelis over the years.

The militants took office just a day after Olmert, head of the centrist Kadima Party, emerged as the victor in Israel's parliament election. It will probably take several weeks for Olmert to form a ruling coalition. He has said he would only invite parties that accept his West Bank plan.

Olmert has said he would take unilateral action if the Palestinians don't indicate a readiness for compromise in a reasonable period of time. Olmert wants to keep large West Bank settlement blocs, but dismantle several dozen smaller settlements with about 70,000 residents.

Kadima Plans To Form Coalition Quickly After Election Win (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

After its victory in Israeli elections, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima Party said Wednesday it would quickly form a broad ruling coalition that will carry out its plan to pull out of much of the West Bank and draw Israel's borders by 2010.

Party officials said that despite a weaker-than-expected performance in Tuesday's election, Kadima has widespread support in parliament.

In an election with lower turnout than any other in Israeli history, Mr. Olmert's Kadima Party won 28 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, Israel's parliament. The Labor Party, headed by Amir Peretz, finished second with 20 seats. Likud, the conservative party led by Benjamin Netanyahu, won 11 seats.

Haim Ramon, a senior Kadima lawmaker, told Israel Radio that the party is confident it will get broad backing for its withdrawal plan in parliament. "I believe we will have more than 70 legislators who will support the disengagement plan," Mr. Ramon told Israel Radio, referring to the expected West Bank pullout.

Mr. Ramon was quoted as saying he expects Mr. Olmert to have a government in place after the Jewish holiday of Passover, which begins in mid-April.

For Kadima, a party formed by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon before he suffered a stroke in January, it was a remarkable debut. The party, which lured members from both the left-wing Labor Party and the right-wing Likud, reshaped Israel's political landscape during the election. Kadima didn't garner the 42 or so seats that some early polls showed its support might win.

That would have given Mr. Olmert, who will become prime minister, an extraordinarily strong hand. But Labor, which focused on Israel's economic problems and the poor, surged in the final weeks of the campaign, along with several other smaller parties. Israel Beitenu, a party led by a charismatic Russian immigrant, appeared to become the country's third-largest parliamentary bloc, winning about 14 seats with a platform that consisted largely of advocating moving Arabs out of Israel. Party chairman Avigdor Lieberman drew much of his support from the one million immigrants from the former Soviet Union who want a leader with a strong stand of security issues.

Likud, which has dominated Israeli politics recently under the leadership of Mr. Sharon, turned out to be the big loser in Kadima's successful opening run. It won 38 seats in Israel's last election in 2003 and controlled the government until recently.

Voters gave Mr. Olmert, who is Israel's acting prime minister, a green light on his plan for the Palestinian territories. Mr. Olmert offered to negotiate with Palestinians under certain circumstances over borders in his acceptance speech, but he has said Israel would move to establish Israel's borders within his four-year term even if no Palestinian negotiating partner emerges. That plan is controversial because it flies in the face of decades of Middle East peacemaking, which has envisioned mutually negotiated borders between Israeli and Palestinian states. Mr. Olmert has also made clear his plans include closing many West Bank Jewish settlements, though he has vowed to keep the biggest for Israel. Reacting to projections showing a Kadima Party victory, Hamas said it would resist the party's platform.

Mr. Olmert needs a coalition of more than 60 seats to move forward, and to achieve that he will have to cut deals with other parties. That could require softening his plan or putting more emphasis on some other areas of policy, such as bolstering the country's welfare programs as Mr. Peretz would like to do, in order to win over partners for his government.

The election's turnout was the lowest in Israeli history with 63.3% of Israelis voting, reflecting a growing disenchantment with the candidates. That compares to 67% in the 2003 election.

Israel's ceremonial president, Moshe Katsav, said Wednesday that he will start talking to party leaders next week about forming a coalition. Traditionally, the Israeli president gives the nod to the leader of the largest party to try to form a government.

"I assume there will be a stable government," Mr. Katsav told Army Radio.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Wednesday that the results of the Israeli election would have little effect unless Mr. Olmert agrees to peace talks. "We want negotiations and not to dictate unilateral solutions," he said in Khartoum, Sudan, where he was attending an Arab Summit.

Olmert Considers Options After Slender Victory (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

Ehud Olmert on Wednesday embarked on forming a broad coalition to implement his plan for separating Israel from the Palestinians after his new Kadima party won the largest number of seats in Tuesday's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0024262

With just 28 seats in the 120-member Knesset, Kadima's less-than-decisive victory meant tough bargaining ahead as Mr Olmert weighed his options for bringing left-wing and single-issue parties into a new ruling coalition.

Although the election was billed as a referendum on the acting prime minister's plan to fix Israel's borders – unilaterally if necessary – on the basis of future withdrawals from the West Bank, many voters opted for sectarian and special interest factions. Parties representing the ultra-Orthodox, Russian immigrants, Israel's Arab minority and even pensioners took around a third of Knesset seats.

In the first Israeli election that neither the traditional ruling Likud or Labour blocs was tipped to win, Amir Peretz's Labour party re-gained some of the status it lost with the collapse of the peace process it sponsored, ending up with 20 seats.

Likud, however, the battleground of last year's struggle over the decision of its then leader, Ariel Sharon, to disengage from the Gaza Strip, plummeted to fifth place with only 11 seats, down from the 38 it won in 2003 when Mr Sharon was prime minister.

The rightist Yisrael Beitenu and its predominantly Russian immigrant electorate fared better, taking 12 seats to place it fourth in the party rankings. Avigor Lieberman, its leader, fought an anti-crime campaign in which, despite his ultra-nationalist credentials, he hinted he would be open to an offer of a place in a Kadima-led coalition.

The National Union-National Religious bloc, defender of the right of Jewish settlers to remain in all parts of the West Bank, took nine seats, having apparently failed to garner many votes from rightwingers disenchanted with Likud.

Mr Olmert on Wednesday called a meeting of senior party officials to review the election results and set up a coalition negotiation team.

Kadima leaders acknowledged the difficulties of forming a working coalition with such a slender mandate for the party. “I think we can run a government with 28 seats. It will be difficult, but possible,” said Shimon Peres, the former Labour leader.

Haim Ramon, another Labour defector to Mr Olmert's party, nevertheless believed the government would be in place before next month's Jewish holiday of Passover.

He told Israel Radio that Kadima could implement its so-called “convergence” plan in the West Bank with support from 70-80 members of parliament. Labour was a possible central partner, he said, and “social issues will not be a hindrance in coalition negotiations”.

Labour was expected to emerge as Mr Olmert's key coalition partner, despite its reservations about a unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank. Mr Olmert has said Israel would prefer a negotiated settlement but was prepared to go it alone if necessary.

Other potential allies – including the new Pensioners party with seven seats and the ultra-Orthodox Shas, with 13 – are more agnostic about the Olmert plan and might demand government concessions to their constituencies as the price for supporting it.

Labour itself is likely to press for senior ministries to reflect its coalition role and was already eyeing the finance portfolio which it would use to push the party's social welfare agenda. Israeli stocks fell more than 2 per cent and the shekel weakened 0.5 per cent against the dollar as investors counting on a stronger Kadima showing contemplated possible higher government spending.

It could be a year before Kadima finalises its plan to determine Israel's final borders by pulling out of part of the West Bank, according to one of the party's winning candidates.

Otniel Schneller, an architect of the disengagement plan, was yesterday quoted as saying he had been working on the plan on Mr Olmert's behalf ahead of the election. “The wisdom of the plan is that there is no precise timetable but rather you flow with the plan and set a timetable as the plan develops,” he told Associated Press.

Under the plan, Israel would maintain and strengthen its hold on the main settler blocs that are home to the bulk of the 250,000 Israelis in the West Bank while evacuating smaller communities to the east of its separation barrier. Jerusalem, including most if not all of the annexed and predominantly Arab eastern sector, would remain part of Israel.

Ismail Haniya, incoming Hamas prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, said: “Such a plan definitely won't be accepted by the Palestinian people or the Palestinian government.”

Not With A Bang But A Pop (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 29 — In an election that Israeli leaders hoped would produce "the big bang," creating a strong, stable centrist majority, Israeli voters delivered a small pop, unwilling to give too much power to an untested acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert.

Mr. Olmert should be able to govern the country, cobbling together a coalition that will support a further Israeli pullout from the West Bank. But it will be an expensive coalition for Mr. Olmert and the new Kadima Party, which will have to give up some important ministries.

DOJ_NMG_0024263

It is likely to be expensive for the Israeli taxpayer, too, because Mr. Olmert's main prospective partners are all committed to big increases in social benefits for the poor and the old.

There were surprises in this election, but no big winners. There was one obvious loser, though: Benjamin Netanyahu, the former prime minister, who led his Likud Party to a disastrous showing of 11 parliamentary seats out of 120.

Likud came in fifth, behind even Yisrael Beiteinu, the party of Mr. Netanyahu's former aide Avigdor Lieberman, who favors handing over Israel's Arab citizens to the Palestinian Authority in exchange for settlement land.

Mr. Netanyahu was being punished in part for his economic policies as finance minister. His battles to cut the power of unions, slash social benefits and cut taxes were praised by economists and helped restore growth to the economy, but they were a target for his political rivals, especially for the new Labor Party leader, the Moroccan-born trade union leader Amir Peretz. Mr. Peretz was one of the small winners of the election, because Labor kept 20 seats, close to Kadima's 28.

Already, Mr. Netanyahu's enemies in Likud are circling to overthrow him, but the party looks likely to be on the margins for some time, and it risks being swallowed up again by Kadima from the center and by Yisrael Beiteinu from the right.

"Take yourself back two years," Yair Lapid wrote in the daily Yediot Aharonot. "The Likud has 40 seats, and the sense is that the right is going to govern here for another 40 years. Then take a look at yesterday."

Most important, the right plus the religious parties will be unable to muster a 61-seat majority to block any West Bank withdrawal plan, while Kadima plus the left and the Arab parties, which won 10 seats, will control more than 61 seats.

Mr. Lieberman was another small winner, bringing his Russian-oriented party into fourth place, and could end up as a member of the governing coalition or as the opposition leader.

After Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's severe stroke, Mr. Lieberman understood that many Russian voters who loved Mr. Sharon wanted a strong, security-minded leader who would not be too nice to Arabs, and that Russians were angry at Mr. Netanyahu for slashing social services.

Some Israelis accuse Mr. Lieberman of being a racist; Ari Shavit of the newspaper Haaretz suggested that his rise was "an expression of a crisis in Israeli democracy."

It was a disorienting election, with Israelis turning away from the large, sophisticated parties that deal with a range of issues. Kadima, Labor and Likud together won only 59 seats — not even a majority. Kadima won substantially fewer seats than the 44 predicted at its birth under Mr. Sharon in November.

"This was a missed opportunity for Israel to stabilize the political system, which is what Sharon wanted to do," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem research institute. "We needed a strong center party, and we haven't quite gotten one. The vote reinforces the sense that Olmert doesn't have the mandate Kadima claims he has for a withdrawal."

Still, analysts speculated that with Labor, the Pensioners Party — which won a surprising seven seats by seeking more benefits for the elderly — and the religious party Shas, Mr. Olmert and Kadima would have a stable majority of 68. Moreover, they said the leftist party Meretz and the Arab parties, controlling another 14 seats, would not vote against a withdrawal even if Shas defected.

Mr. Olmert may also attract the religious party United Torah Judaism, which is flexible on policy and controls another six seats.

But the two defining ideologies of Israeli politics for the last decade have been marginalized, Mr. Halevi pointed out. Only Likud remains committed to the idea of Greater Israel, comprising the full biblical land of Israel, while only the small, dovish Meretz remains committed to the kind of negotiations with the Palestinians that failed at Camp David under President Clinton.

In a way, Mr. Halevi said, "it's the marginalization of the left and right, of the idea of peace and of the settlements."

Yuval Steinitz of Likud, the chairman of Parliament's foreign affairs and defense committee, was bitter: "Apparently the right is stupid," he said. "The national camp did not protect and preserve its ruling party. The right will pay; the national camp will pay; the whole country will pay."

Stephen P. Cohen of the Israel Policy Forum noted the importance of domestic economic issues. "Because there's such a strong consensus that Israel's romance with the territories is over, people felt free to vote on domestic issues, which is healthy," he said.

The election was also strange for its displacement of old voting loyalties, said Shlomo Avineri, a political scientist at Hebrew University. With a split Likud, the new Kadima, Mr. Sharon's disappearance, the collapse of the centrist, secular Shinui Party, and Mr. Peretz instead of Shimon Peres as leader of the Labor Party, few Israelis felt that they could vote in traditional ways.

"It helps explain the wavering, the undecideds, the low turnout and the success of the Pensioners Party," Mr. Avineri said. The party, led by a former Israeli spymaster, Rafael Eitan, 79, did not make it into Parliament last time, but this year voting for it became modish among young voters alienated by other choices.

It was also hard to create excitement and passion for the idea of a unilateral withdrawal from parts of the West Bank in the absence of serious negotiations with a Palestinian Authority able to make a deal for peace. "Even those who support unilateral withdrawal are depressed by it," Mr. Halevi said. "It's kind of an admission of failure."

Menachem Brinker, a professor of philosophy at Hebrew University and a man of the left, was pleased at the collapse of the right. "The right — those who still believe in the postcolonial era that you can rule 3.5 million Palestinians — has no future now," he said. "The great majority of Israeli Jews have absorbed the need for more withdrawals from the West Bank."

Olmert Seeks Coalition Partners (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, winner of Tuesday's Israeli election, began informal negotiations yesterday with prospective coalition partners, several of which laid out demands for joining a government that is expected to be bottom heavy with smaller niche factions.

"The bang," read one newspaper headline, referring to the disintegration of the two-party system into a confusing array of 12 parliamentary factions with no dominant group. One commentator called the new legislature a "postmodern" parliament in which older ideologies of left and right have been discredited.

Mr. Olmert's centrist Kadima Party, which disappointed party members by managing only 28 of the 120 seats in the Knesset, is expected to shape its coalition around a partnership with the dovish Labor Party, which earned 20 seats.

Israel's Channel 2 television news suggested that Mr. Olmert would piece together a coalition of more than 70 members by adding a party of pensioners and two ultrareligious parties, including the third-place Shas Party. The results indicated that the prime minister probably could rely on 69 votes to support his plan to withdraw from much of the West Bank within four years, either through negotiation or unilateral withdrawal.

"I want to see a coalition that doesn't become sucked into a crisis midway, like we've seen" in the past, said Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. "[We want] a coalition that supports a division into two states."

The negotiations began as a new Hamas-led Palestinian Cabinet was sworn in at ceremonies in Ramallah and Gaza City. Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said his government would give its blessing to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' pursuit of peace negotiations with Israel, even though the Islamic militants have ruled out talks in the past.

"If the Palestinian Authority chairman, as the serving president, wants to accelerate the negotiations, we won't oppose this," he said."If what President Abbas [presents after] negotiations serves our interests, we can also redefine our positions."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said he hoped that Israel's new government would abandon unilateralism in favor of peace negotiations.

"The right is down and the right is up, the left is center and the center is left, and its all very confusing," said Mr. Erekat.

Unstable coalitions in Israel have prompted five general elections in less than 10 years, spurring widespread disillusionment and apathy.

Kadima, the first party other than Labor and Likud elected to run the government, had been expected to reel in close to 40 seats as recently as a few weeks ago. The lackluster performance puts Labor in a position to demand one of three top ministerial portfolios -- foreign, defense or finance.

"Suddenly the results will force Kadima to see us as almost equal partners," said Labor Knesset member Yuli Tamir. "We are going to be tough negotiators."

Israel's Olmert Hastens To Form Governing Coalition (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

JERUSALEM — Urged by Israel's president to move swiftly, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert began working Wednesday to assemble a governing coalition in the wake of his centrist party's narrower-than-expected election victory.

The pressing nature of the task was underscored in Gaza City by the swearing-in of the new Palestinian government dominated by the Islamist group Hamas — a regional milestone that will greatly complicate any steps on the peace front.

Since its own election victory two months ago, Hamas has resisted calls to renounce its aim of destroying Israel. Now that its Cabinet is officially in place, that stance is likely to bring about a near-cessation of official Palestinian contacts with whatever Israeli government emerges and to imperil international aid to the Palestinian Authority.

Wednesday, in the latest international move to isolate Hamas, Canada announced that it was suspending assistance to the Palestinian Authority.

DOJ_NMG_0024265

With a glum-looking Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas looking on, members of the new Palestinian Cabinet each laid a hand on a Koran and took the oath of office.

The ceremony was linked by video teleconference between Gaza City and the West Bank town of Ramallah, because of travel restrictions placed by Israel on Hamas lawmakers and government ministers.

Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, said an array of potential threats had spurred him to put aside the waiting period for a formal announcement of election results, expected to be made next week. He called on the various political factions — some of them natural allies, some of them bitter foes — to start aligning themselves without delay.

"The new government does not have much time — there are weighty issues on the agenda," Katsav said. "All the parties … should pull together and start cooperating so that the government can form and run the country." Informal talks between the various political camps were already underway, Israeli media reported.

Tuesday's election results gave a clear victory to Israeli parties that are committed to ceding more territory to the Palestinians in the wake of last summer's Israeli pullout from the Gaza Strip.

Both Olmert's party, Kadima, and the second-place Labor Party say Israel will have to give up many of its West Bank settlements, though the two differ on whether the Jewish state should proceed unilaterally or on the basis of negotiations.

With Hamas now in power, however, any peace talks are highly unlikely. Still, Olmert signaled in his victory speech that he hoped to maintain contacts with the more pragmatic Abbas.

Israeli analysts and Olmert's allies said that although Kadima's mandate was smaller than he had hoped for — 28 seats in the 120-member Knesset — parties likely to ally with him would be able to fend off efforts by the right wing to block West Bank withdrawals.

"I believe we will have more than 70 legislators who will support the disengagement plan," senior Kadima lawmaker Haim Ramon told Israel Radio on Wednesday.

But the results will leave Olmert and Kadima vulnerable to the often-bruising vicissitudes of Israeli coalition politics.

"A leading party with less than 30 seats is much more dependent on partner parties," said analyst Yoram Peri of Tel Aviv University.

And some influential commentators pointed to the low voter turnout and Kadima's slippage in support in the weeks before the elections as signs that Olmert would have to proceed with caution.

"The voters accepted him and his plan, but did so with a decided lack of enthusiasm," prominent political analyst Nahum Barnea wrote in the Yediot Aharonot mass-circulation daily.

"He and his party are going to have to work hard to stabilize the government and to establish their public standing. They are in a test period — a little modesty wouldn't hurt them."

In Israel, the assembling of a governing coalition traditionally entails delicate negotiations coupled with bare-knuckled assertion of claims to the most powerful government ministries.

Labor, by virtue of picking up 20 Knesset seats, will be in a position to demand senior Cabinet positions such as the Ministry of Finance or Defense. Its strong showing also dictates that the social welfare issues championed by its leader, Amir Peretz, will have to be high on the new government's agenda.

Small but important players in the new government could include the Pensioners Party, which won a very respectable seven seats advocating the rights of the elderly — to the bemusement of many Israelis.

"Who would have thought the trendy, 'hot' party in this election would be an obscure bunch of senior citizens?" commentator Ofer Shelah wrote on Yediot Aharonot's website, YNET.

Olmert has said any coalition partners must support his plan to consolidate West Bank settlements and draw Israel's borders. Some parties scrambled to retrofit their views in order to reap the benefits of entering the government.

The constituents of Shas, an ultra-Orthodox party that placed third with 13 seats, have vehemently opposed pullbacks from Palestinian territory in the past. But as coalition discussions began, the party was touting a ruling by its spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, that such withdrawals were in keeping with scriptural edicts that saving lives was the highest religious priority.

The vote was nothing short of a full-blown disaster for former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whose Likud Party, once a political powerhouse, fell to fifth place.

Israeli media buzzed Wednesday with accounts of furious but anonymous senior party figures sharpening the political knives to force him from the party leadership.

Some saw poetic justice in the voter rebuke of Netanyahu, who had tirelessly harried Prime Minister Ariel Sharon before the Israeli leader was felled by a massive stroke.

"It was Ariel Sharon's last revenge," columnist Ben Caspit wrote in the Maariv daily. "He is lying between life and death, and now the Likud is in similar straits."

Israeli Voters Turn To New Issues, Parties (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

JERUSALEM - Asked for their votes at a turning point in their history, Israelis were deeply divided. A slim majority chose parties keen to make dramatic steps toward solving the conflict with the Palestinians, be it through negotiations or unilateral moves to reshape Israel's borders.

But creating some unexpected power realignments that will reshape the country's political scene for years to come, nearly half of those who voted chose smaller, special-interest parties whose agendas were not primarily focused on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"The results show that the elections were not about disengagement, because if you look at the support for the three major parties that purport to represent the general interest - Kadima, Labor, and Likud - they got only half the vote," say Ofer Shelach, a columnist for Yedioth Ahronoth.

Most of the other parties, while holding some views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, gleaned votes for other reasons, mostly on the basis of socio- economic, religious, or ethnic interests.

Israel's right, much of it opposed to concessions to Palestinian statehood aspirations, has experienced a stunning reversal of fortune. The once-mighty Likud party, led by Benjamin Netanyahu, won just 11 seats.

Israel Beitenu (Israel Is Our Home), a far more nationalist party with a base among Russian immigrants, leapt into the country's No. 4 spot, all but anointing its leader, Avigdor Lieberman, as the new frontman of the Israeli Right. Next is Shas party with just one more seat in the Knesset, Israel's parliament. It was the choice among many religious Israelis of Sephardic - or Middle Eastern - origin.

The numbers are expected to add up to a center-left coalition, a sort of collage dominated by the two biggest parties in the picture: Kadima, founded by Ariel Sharon, and the left-wing Labor Party, who brought Israel into the Oslo process with the Palestinians.

Frustrations over ongoing socioeconomic problems allowed for the surprise success of the "Pensioners' Party," which promises to advance the interest of retirees who face an uncertain future in a country still struggling for a balance between social-democratic ideals and market-driven reforms.

"This election was billed as a referendum on disengagement, but it really wasn't, and it's difficult to get a reading on what these results mean," says Mark Heller, a political scientist at Tel Aviv University. "We don't really know where Shas stands, where the Pensioners stand," on the question of making additional pullouts from the occupied West Bank.

Amid this splintering of power, the constant at the center is Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Mr. Olmert, who took over as Kadima party leader after Mr. Sharon's stroke in January, will now be premier despite having won less than a quarter of the vote.

Under him, the party had hoped to take close to 40 of the 120 seats, but must settle on 28. The smaller-than-expected number is viewed as a mark of the tepid support he has from the public, and an indication of the difficult job that lies ahead for him.

In a victory speech, Olmert made an appeal to the Palestinians that was statesmanlike in quality, and which seemed to run counter to some of the assumptions made about Kadima's do-it-yourself, unilateralist approach to the conflict.

"There is no substitute for a peace agreement. There is no more stable peace than one with a peace agreement," said Olmert, specifically citing the Bush administration's road map as a primary means to reaching an end to the conflict. He called on the Palestinians to be realistic, and like Israel, consider forfeiting land they cherish.

"For thousands of years, we have dreamed in our hearts of a Greater Israel, and such a country will always remain our dream in our hearts," Olmert said. "But out of a recognition of reality we are prepared to make compromises, we are prepared to turn our backs on these areas, and to painfully pull out our residents from settlements."

Olmert's speech seemed an apparent opening to talk with the Palestinian Authority (PA), even one led by Hamas. Israel, the US, and other Western allies have declined to deal with Hamas because they view it as a terrorist group, and because it does not recognize Israel's right to exist.

Many analysts here, however, say that the chances of a resumption of negotiations are extremely slim, making unilateral moves far more likely. But such major moves to pull unilaterally out of settlements beyond Israel's West Bank barrier are not expected to be made for at least a year, says Mr. Shelach, the columnist.

"Right now, Olmert is going to try to put the ball in the Palestinian court and see how things work out between [Palestinian President] Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas," he says. "Unless the security situation deteriorates, both sides of the conflict and the international community will wait it out."

DOJ_NMG_0024267

Part of the suspense in this election drama, he adds, is whether most Israelis actually voted on the questions of the conflict with the Palestinians. Probably half voted on internal questions - economic problems or narrower, special interests.

One common thread among the "other half," as it were, is a backlash against the economic cuts made by Mr. Netanyahu while he was finance minister under Sharon.

The Pension Party wants a better national retirement plan - support payments were cut by about 30 percent during Netanyahu's reforms. Shas will push for the restoration of a per-child support check from the state.

"The real complication is that it's difficult to get a common denominator on economic issues," says Mr. Heller.

Kadima Victory Is Disturbing For Some West Bank Settlers (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman And Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, March 30, 2006

YITZHAR, West Bank — Yigal Amitay moved to this Jewish settlement to walk with God, he says.

However, Amitay's beloved Yitzhar community may be one of the settlements Israel's new governing political party and its leader, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, have pledged to evacuate within four years.

Israeli voters endorsed Olmert's evacuation plans Tuesday when they gave Kadima and other political parties that favor a West Bank withdrawal enough seats in parliamentary elections to form a government.

Amitay, 40, lives in a hilltop home with his wife and nine children, part of a settlement of about 150 families. He says he'll fight to keep his home.

The West Bank is home to 250,000 Israeli settlers. Based on Kadima's plans, about 60,000-80,000 settlers would be evacuated from the West Bank, according to Yaacov Bar-Siman-Tov, a political scientist at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Bar-Siman-Tov describes a future West Bank withdrawal as “dramatic and possibly bloody.” Losing the West Bank and the biblical land of their forefathers is so daunting to settlers, he says, that they would probably put up a fight.

“A prime minister (Yitzhak Rabin in 1995) was assassinated because he dared raise the subject of withdrawals,” he says.

Last summer, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon ordered the withdrawal of troops and 9,500 settlers from Gaza. Thousands of people who supported the settlers, including Amitay, flooded Gaza's settlements to help residents there resist. Amitay calls the expulsion “ethnic cleansing.”

Settlers there clashed with soldiers and police, and more than 200 people were injured, but the evacuation was successful in removing settlers.

Israelis began settling the West Bank soon after Israel captured it in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. What began as a series of tent outposts has become a network of developed villages and towns that dot the crests of West Bank hills.

The villages often attracted ideological Jews, such as Amitay, who believed that it was their God-given duty to settle land once walked by Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

Sharon, who remains comatose after suffering a stroke on Jan. 4, was a key proponent of settlements in the 1980s, when he was Israel's agriculture minister. Sharon helped establish some of the West Bank settlements.

By the time Sharon created the Kadima Party in November, he had set out to undo what he once advocated.

Olmert, Sharon's protégé, is carrying out that policy. He has said he would evacuate far-flung settlements such as Yitzhar and relocate settler housing on the Israeli side of the 400-mile security barrier that Israel is building in the West Bank.

Olmert hasn't pinpointed which settlements he would dismantle. Nor has he set a timetable other than saying the withdrawal will be completed by the time his term as Israel's new prime minister ends in 2010.

The Palestinians have long considered the settlements the greatest obstacle to peace with the Israelis.

To Amitay, it makes little sense for the Israeli government to destroy what it had constructed. “Do you have the right to kill a child you brought into the world?” he says.

The Yitzhar settlement near Nablus is a cluster of cookie-cutter homes with red-tile roofs. They were built solely by Jews, Amitay says. No foreign workers or Palestinians are allowed in. Amitay's terrace has panoramic views of hillsides with olive groves in the valleys below.

Amitay argues passionately that Jewish settlers like him have a right to remain. “We pay taxes, we serve in the army, we are productive people,” he says.

Amitay says he knows that if Yitzhar is targeted for dismantlement and residents don't accept a buyout, the Israeli army could forcibly remove them and bring in bulldozers just as it did in Gaza.

“Like a lot of values, this is something people will die for,” he says.

Pensioners Now New Kids On The Bloc (WT)

By Abraham Rabinovich

DOJ_NMG_0024268

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

JERUSALEM -- The biggest surprise of an Israeli election filled with surprises was the performance of the Pensioners' Party, a newly formed and unheralded political bloc that emerged with seven seats -- most going to men in their upper 70s.

No one was more shocked than the pensioners themselves, who find themselves confronting national questions they had not prepared for when they announced their one-issue campaign for increased pension rights two months ago.

"We haven't formulated a policy about issues like the pullback from the West Bank," said party leader Rafi Eitan, 79. The party will hold a caucus today to figure out what its policies actually are.

The outcome may determine whether the golden agers are invited to take part in a ruling coalition led by Kadima party leader Ehud Olmert, who yesterday began informal talks to find a parliamentary majority supporting his positions.

Mr. Olmert's key campaign promise was to withdraw from most of the West Bank and unilaterally set Israel's final borders if a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority fails to meet international demands that it recognize Israel. Kadima aides said yesterday they would take at least a year to finalize those plans.

Kadima, with 28 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, is expected to join forces with the Labor party, which finished second with 20 seats. Russian immigrant-led Yisrael Beitenu, with 12 seats, and Likud with 11 will likely go into opposition, meaning Mr. Olmert must find at least 13 more votes from among two religious parties, the leftist Meretz party, three Israeli Arab lists and the Pensioners.

If the aging parliamentarians get a Cabinet seat, it will likely go to Mr. Eitan, a former senior Mossad operative who played a major role in the 1960 capture in Buenos Aires of Adolf Eichmann, the Gestapo official in charge of the extermination of Europe's Jews. Most of the others on the party list are former union leaders, some of them quite vigorous.

The Pensioners' Party was among more than 30 groupings to field candidates, and was regarded with the same amusement as the Green Leaf Party -- which advocated the legalization of marijuana -- and other niche groups. Pollsters missed the rise of the Pensioners until the last week of the campaign, when they predicted that, incredible as it sounded, the party might actually get two seats.

Analysts think that the party profited from the confusion created by the redrawing of Israel's political map after Ariel Sharon abandoned the right-wing Likud and founded the centrist Kadima party, drawing in left-wing Labor stalwart Shimon Peres.

Uncertain where to deposit their votes, many chose to place them for safekeeping with the cheerful band of oldsters, even though no one knew what their politics are. A Tel Aviv man said that many of the young people exercising in his sports club said they would vote for the Pensioners.

"I think we radiate sincerity and credibility," said Mr. Eitan.

Some analysts saw the vote for the pensioners reflecting a sense of humor that cut across party lines.

Israel's Muddled Election (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Israelis went to the polls Tuesday for the fifth time in 10 years, and what's remarkable is that they emerged more or less as they had entered: leaderless.

Ehud Olmert did get a mandate of sorts for the Kadima (Hebrew for "Forward") party he inherited from the now-comatose Ariel Sharon. Given that Kadima is not yet six months old and brings together an ideologically eclectic group of candidates, that's not a trivial achievement. But with only a 28-seat plurality in Israel's 120-seat parliament -- down from the 35 seats the party was polling a few weeks ago -- Mr. Olmert will have to form a government with some of Israel's 11 other parties.

The coalition Mr. Olmert is now predicted to form is principally with the Labor Party, led by the truculent union leader Amir Peretz, perhaps along with Israel's ultra-Orthodox parties. Labor would support Mr. Olmert's plans to dismantle settlements in the West Bank and draw Israel's self-declared final borders with the Palestinians.

But as a socialist of the old school, Mr. Peretz will insist on halting or rolling back some of the pro-market reforms instituted by former Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. For a country that only recently emerged from four years of deep recession, the choice between a sensible security policy and a sensible economic one is unfortunate and bitter.

Alternatively, Mr. Olmert could tack right and join forces with his old allies in the Likud, now reduced to 11 seats under Mr. Netanyahu's leadership, and the ethnically Russian Yisrael Beitenu party. The markets would welcome Mr. Netanyahu's return to the Finance Ministry, and the Likud slate also includes such talents as former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky. But Mr. Netanyahu has painted his party into a corner, both by his opposition to Israel's withdrawal last year from the Gaza Strip and his political opportunism. His attempt to blame a dying and helpless Mr. Sharon for Likud's drubbing this week was not a class act.

The larger task Mr. Olmert faces is asserting himself as a credible national leader. Most Israeli prime ministers have come to office with some large record of past accomplishments. Mr. Olmert has been a professional politician most of his life and his 10 years as Jerusalem mayor were notable for the city's decline. As Mr. Sharon's deputy, Mr. Olmert functioned mainly as a political canary, floating ideas that his boss didn't yet dare endorse publicly. One such is the re-division of Jerusalem into two cities, one Arab, one Israeli.

Now Mr. Olmert has a relatively narrow window of opportunity to show Israelis he has both vision and backbone. The vision is of an Israel that withdraws to borders that best suit its strategic and demographic interests. It remains to be seen, however, whether Mr. Olmert can carry out the withdrawals in a way that a majority of Israelis can accept and which does not signal weakness to the Palestinians, the way Ehud Barak's hasty withdrawal from southern Lebanon in 2000 did. Mr. Olmert will do even better if he can commit himself to an economic course not dictated by Israel's labor federation and the Pensioners' Party, which came out of nowhere to take seven seats.

Ultimately, this election demonstrated that, in the absence of Mr. Sharon's reassuring presence, Israelis remain uncertain about their future and skeptical of a new generation of untested leaders. That's still a step forward from the sense of despair Mr. Sharon faced when he came to power five years ago. Mr. Olmert has many doubters and a great deal to prove. He can benefit from the example of his predecessor, who showed what real leadership can do.

West Bank Withdrawal (NYT)

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

Tuesday's election in Israel was a minor breakthrough. Israeli voters rightfully slammed Likud, the right-wing party of former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, casting their lot instead with Kadima, the infant party created by Ariel Sharon, who remains comatose after a severe stroke.

Kadima can't be happy with its performance under the relatively lackluster Ehud Olmert, who is now likely to become prime minister, because it received only 28 parliamentary seats and will have to form an alliance with at least two parties. But by placing the more centrist Kadima, along with Labor, which received 20 seats, in the driver's seat, Israeli voters have endorsed the idea of withdrawing from the West Bank. We're not happy with Mr. Olmert's proposal of a unilateral withdrawal. But at this point, we're heartened by anything that leads to an Israeli withdrawal from land that the Palestinians must control if the area is ever going to evolve into two peaceful, co-existing states.

It may take weeks to sort out a coalition government, but the strong likelihood is that the next government will proceed with Mr. Olmert's pledge to set Israel's borders by 2010.

While the ultimate solution to the conflict can be only a negotiated one, as opposed to a unilateral drawing of final borders by Israel, a negotiated deal is not going to happen until Hamas repudiates terrorism and recognizes Israel's right to exist. Hamas has yet to earn itself a seat at the negotiating table. But in the meantime, Israel can start to rid itself of its self-created problem in the West Bank.

Immediately after the vote, Mr. Olmert made it clear that this remains his intent. He invited the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to enter into negotiations on permanent borders, while clearly indicating that he would proceed alone if necessary. With Hamas now in control of the Palestinian legislature, the invitation seemed mainly symbolic.

Whatever borders Israel fixes are not likely to get international recognition, particularly if those borders leave Palestinians cut in half — in the West Bank and Gaza — and unable to get from one part of their country to another without going through Israel. But figuring out what the borders should look like is the least of the problems. After years of peace talks and road maps, the general lines are pretty clear, and they require a West Bank withdrawal. Israel's voters know that, too, as Tuesday's election results confirm.

A Decisive Election (WP)

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

AN ELECTION cast as a historic referendum over whether to redraw the borders of Israel produced a curious reaction from voters Tuesday: the lowest turnout in history, coupled with a surge of support for small parties focused on domestic issues. That may mean Israelis are uninspired by the man who will now become their prime minister, Ehud Olmert, who stepped in after Ariel Sharon suffered a stroke in January. Or it may mean that many Israelis already assumed what the election results showed: that the debate over whether to give up most of the West Bank and its Jewish settlements is over.

Though Mr. Olmert's Kadima party won fewer parliamentary seats than it hoped for, up to two-thirds of the new Knesset will probably support a West Bank withdrawal. That doesn't mean it will happen in the next four years; this is still the Middle East. But the Israeli parties that favor holding on to all of the remaining occupied territories and settlements were devastated by the election. The Likud Party, which governed Israel for most of the past 30 years and pursued the cause of a "greater Israel" during most of that time, won only 11 of the 120 Knesset seats; even among right-wing parties, it took second place to one that favors a territorial separation of Israelis and Palestinians. Mr. Olmert should have little trouble forming a coalition, though he may have to agree to some big government spending on social programs and pensions.

The pullout that Mr. Olmert favors, and that he boldly outlined before the election, won't take place anytime soon. First, the new government will have to complete the system of fences and walls it is building through the western edge of the West Bank and around Jerusalem; that may take a year. During that time, Mr. Olmert will probably hold to a stated policy that a negotiated settlement with the Palestinians, as envisioned by President Bush's "road map," is still possible. But negotiation would require either a radical change of position by the Hamas government that took office yesterday in the Palestinian Authority, or its early collapse under Israeli and international pressure. In the meantime, Israel will still exchange blows with Palestinian militants, who fired a Katyusha rocket this week from Gaza into Israel for the first time.

In the absence of Palestinian movement, Mr. Olmert then will seek the support of the Bush administration for a unilateral withdrawal. As the new prime minister sees it, this could involve the removal of some 70,000 Jewish settlers from the West Bank, but also the de facto annexation of other large settlements to Israel, along with 10 percent of the West Bank's land. Such a large Israeli withdrawal would be a major practical step toward a Middle East settlement. But the United States would be bound to ensure that the new border made possible the eventual creation of a viable Palestinian state and that it strengthened rather than weakened Palestinian alternatives to Hamas. Managing that diplomacy may well emerge as one of the greatest opportunities, and challenges, of President Bush's second term.

Sharon's Moment (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

THE BIGGEST WINNER IN Tuesday's election in Israel will almost certainly never learn of his victory. Ariel Sharon lies comatose in a hospital in Jerusalem, unlikely ever to recover after suffering a massive stroke three months ago. But Kadima, the centrist party he founded after leaving the conservative Likud Party last year, won 28 of 120 seats in the Knesset, more than any other party — an endorsement, if not a resounding one, of Sharon's improbable legacy of moderation.

Kadima (it means "Forward") supports the unilateral withdrawal from some Israeli settlements in the West Bank. A clear majority of Israelis supports withdrawal from the settlements, yet Kadima faces obstacles on every front. To govern, the party's leader, Ehud Olmert, will have to form a coalition, probably with leaders of the liberal Labor Party and several smaller parties. It promises to be fractious. And the victory of the terrorist group Hamas in Palestinian elections in January will only make the peace process all the more difficult; Hamas remains dedicated to the destruction of the Jewish state.

Still, it's worth pausing to note what Sharon hath wrought. First is the simple fact that neither Labor nor Likud, but a new party created to reflect the center of Israeli politics, will now govern Israel. Voters had plainly tired of the long-standing Likud-Labor slugfest, and it took the willful former general nicknamed "the Bulldozer" to create a new dynamic. As happened in Gaza, Kadima is now determined to preside over the dismantling of some of the very West Bank settlements whose construction Sharon oversaw as agriculture minister in the 1970s.

Debate over Sharon's legacy will last at least as long as Sharon's life (he turned 78 last month). But this much is undeniable: Israel is closer now to peace than it was when he took office in 2001. The question, as ever, is how to inch still closer to that goal.

Olmert, Sharon's successor and the former mayor of Jerusalem, has promised to continue Sharon's policy of "disengagement," which he has renamed "convergence." By any name, it is an imperfect but welcome development. Ideally, the Palestinians would be partners in the process of Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and the West Bank. But Hamas has shown no interest in negotiating with Israel. President Bush, for his part, has invited Olmert to the White House, an invitation that rightly will not be extended to the new Palestinian prime minister. Now that the Palestinian government is officially controlled by Hamas, the U.S. will have only limited contact with it, though Washington has pledged to continue its aid to Palestinians through other means.

It is a sensible yet vaguely unsatisfying policy. Perhaps the best thing that can be said about it is that it is flexible enough to allow Bush to change as circumstances warrant — as Ariel Sharon did.

Bush Rejects Idea Of Boycotting Meeting In Russia (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 29 — President Bush said Wednesday that it would be a mistake for the United States to boycott the Group of 8 meeting in Russia this summer.

He also said he needed a personal relationship with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia so he could walk into a room with him and have him "not throw me out."

Addressing members of Freedom House, a pro-democracy group, Mr. Bush said he was hopeful that Russia would move toward a more open society even though it has cracked down on democratic institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0024271

"I haven't given up on Russia," he said at the Hyatt Regency Capitol Hill. "I still think Russia understands that it's in her interest to be West, to work with the West, and to act in concert with the West. Nobody is saying to Russia, you must look like the United States of America.'"

Although he said, "I've heard some say, 'Don't go to the G-8,' " there have not been recent major objections to the American presence at the meeting, in July in St. Petersburg.

Last year, Senators John McCain of Arizona and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut introduced legislation urging the president to suspend Russia's membership in the group of eight major industrialized nations until it ended its rollback of democratic reforms.

Mr. Bush, who spoke and took questions from the audience, was freer in his remarks than usual. He told the group, for example, that he had sought advice on how best to be effective with Mr. Putin.

"I remember meeting with human rights groups in Russia, and I asked them what strategy should I take as the president of the United States," Mr. Bush said. "Should I be in a position where I can engage the president in frank discussion, or should I publicly scold him, in which case he may turn a deaf ear?"

He continued, "And the universal consensus for them kind of played to my own instincts, which is that I think it's important for the United States to be in a position to be able to express our concerns."

He also said he found meetings like the Group of 8's useful because he could serve as a consensus builder and advocate for other democracies. "One of the things that I find is that nations oftentimes approach me at these different meetings we go to and say, hey, pass the message for me, will you?" he said. "We need you to pass a message, Mr. President."

The president also fielded a question about the American decision to cut off direct funds to the Palestinian Authority now that Hamas has taken control of the government. Washington has decided to redirect the money through the United Nations and independent relief groups.

The questioner, a Palestinian, asked why the United States was "punishing us and cutting funds for people who chose fair and free elections," and hurting "the refugees, the poor, the malnourished mothers and children?"

Mr. Bush said, "I think that aid should go to suffering Palestinians, but nor should it go to a government, however, which has expressed its desire to destroy its neighbor," Israel.

He added, "We support the election process, we support democracy, but that doesn't mean we have to support governments that get elected as a result of democracy."

US Delaying Russia's WTO Membership: Putin (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Frances Williams

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

Russian president Vladimir Putin on Wednesday accused the US of "artificially" holding back progress in talks on Russia's accession to the World Trade Organisation, adding to a chill in relations between the two countries.

Mr Putin made his comments during an annual meeting with Russian business leaders, otherwise largely devoted to domestic policy.

"Unfortunately we have received a list of questions from our American colleagues that require additional agreements that we thought had been settled long ago," the Russian president said, without specifying what areas the US demands covered. "The negotiation process is being artificially set back."

He added that Russia was still interested in WTO membership but "only on economically beneficial conditions".

The US rejected Mr Putin's claim. Robert Portman, US trade representative, said: "The remaining issues with Russia's accession...are not new problems and they are not dissimilar to those issues addressed by others who have acceded to the WTO."

President George W. Bush on Wednesday acknowledged pressure not to attend the G8 summit in Russia later this year, but said that would be a mistake. "I need to be in a position where I can sit down with him [Mr Putin] and be very frank about our concerns ... I haven't given up on Russia. I still think Russia understands that it's in her interest to be west, to work with the west, and to act in concert with the west."

Moscow had hoped to wrap up its 13-year-old talks on joining the WTO by the end of last year, then, after that deadline was missed, at least before it hosted the summit of the G8 summit in St Petersburg in July.

But Alexander Shokhin, head of the Russian Union of Entrepreneurs and Industrialists, a lobby group, said after the meeting with Mr Putin that the July deadline looked doubtful. He said Mr Putin's comments were "news both for members of the government and for business".

Russia has become impatient over the past year or so as targets for WTO entry have slipped. Moscow now says it is aiming for the end of 2006 – but even this is threatened, not only by failure to wrap up bilateral market access talks with the US but by sluggish progress in multilateral negotiations dealing with Russia's compliance with WTO rules.

Agreement with Washington has been held up over US demands for Moscow to allow foreign banks to open direct branches, not just Russian subsidiary companies as now. Russia says its financial sector could not withstand the competition and that it has security concerns about foreign banks opening branches. The US has also said Russia must clamp down on video and software piracy and cut import duties on aircraft.

The recent WTO accord between Ukraine and the US has rubbed salt into the wound, raising the prospect that Ukraine may join the trade body before Russia.

Russia is the biggest economy not yet to be a member of the 149-nation WTO, but has struck all necessary bilateral deals with other members apart from the US, Australia and Colombia.

Abominable Gasman? (WSJ)

By Vijay V. Vaitheeswaran

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

Is there really an Abominable Gasman stomping around in the frozen wilds of Siberia? To judge by the hysteria surrounding Russian natural gas, you might think so. Energy ministers from the G7 countries clashed with Russia over "energy security" this month, and the topic is sure to be at the top of the agenda when G8 heads of state meet soon at their St. Petersburg summit.

At first blush, such concerns seem justified. Russia's political showdown with Ukraine in early January over natural gas tariffs temporarily affected gas supplies to Europe. That spooked Germany, and led to accusations of Russia playing pipeline politics. Then, in mid-March, Vladimir Putin announced that Russia will build a $10 billion gas pipeline from Siberia to China. That upset not only the EU but also gas-starved Japan and America. Both countries have been eager to secure access to new Russian gas (to be shipped not by pipeline but in frozen form, as liquefied natural gas). The Chinese deal also stoked fears that Mr. Putin intends to use his country's unrivalled gas endowment to forge a gas-supply cartel akin to the OPEC oil cartel.

So will Russia really bring the global economy to its knees by playing pipeline politics or by creating a "GOPEC"? Don't hold your breath. Saber-rattling aside, pipelines are a lousy tool for imposing an embargo. Because piped gas cannot easily be redirected to the world market, a supplier who embargoes his pipeline customer is in effect losing the money he would have made from that gas. That explains why Russia immediately backed down during the Ukraine standoff in January when Germany, its best customer, growled publicly. As a long history of failed energy embargoes proves, even the most unsavory regime needs money to feed its people.

The notion of a GOPEC is also far-fetched. Global gas reserves are far more abundant and better distributed than oil reserves, so cartel-minded regimes opposed to foreign investment will stagnate no matter how much gas they have. That is why hostile Venezuela has lost out to investor-friendly Trinidad on new gas investments, and why Qatar has become the Mecca of LNG while its gas-rich neighbors Iran and Saudi Arabia remain largely untapped. Besides, what power Saudi Arabia has over the oil market arises from its massive investment in spare capacity. Since the cost of building spare LNG capacity is far larger than for oil, nobody will.

If the G8 wants to do something useful about energy security, it should focus on market liberalization. Russia's pious vow to be a reliable supplier of gas would sound a lot more persuasive if Mr. Putin stopped harassing private investment in energy and opened up access to the country's gas pipeline network. The European Commission must crack down on member states obstructing energy liberalization (especially France and Spain, which have been backsliding recently). And only if America sweeps away over-bureaucratic processes for siting LNG terminals will the country be assured of growing supplies of this clean, plentiful fuel.

In sum, there is no Abominable Gasman. The recent ructions involving Russia arose because the global natural gas market is not yet as transparent or liquid as the global oil market. But there are harbingers of change. In early April, Gazprom is expected to announce which foreign firms will help develop its Shtokman project. This field, located under the Barents Sea, is so massive its gas could meet all Europe's needs for seven years -- though, thanks to flexible LNG technology, that gas could end up in America too.

In the current panic, the great danger is that politicians will turn back the tide of market liberalization. If instead they forge ahead, then the gas future need not be so bleak after all. As the Shtokman example suggests, the dynamic interplay of global markets and technological innovation could yet prove to be the ultimate anti-GOPEC.

Taylor Caught, Sent To Sierra Leone (WT/AP)

By Clarence Roy-macauley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone -- Former Liberian President Charles Taylor, captured on the run in Nigeria with sacks full of cash, was flown to Sierra Leone yesterday to be tried on war-crimes charges.

A white United Nations helicopter carrying Mr. Taylor left neighboring Liberia and landed inside the compound of the U.N.-backed war-crimes tribunal that will try the former warlord, U.N. officials said. A second U.N. chopper also landed on the helipad in the capital, Freetown.

Mr. Taylor then was jailed.

Mr. Taylor was captured Tuesday night by security forces in the far northeastern border town of Gamboru, in Borno state, nearly 600 miles from the villa in southern Calabar from which he reportedly disappeared Monday night, Information Minister Frank Nweke said in a statement. He was trying to cross the border into Cameroon.

President Olusegun Obasanjo, who was visiting the White House yesterday, gave few details about Mr. Taylor's arrest except to say he was picked up in a car with his wife and taken to a regional state capital.

President Bush said he appreciated Nigeria's work in apprehending Mr. Taylor.

"The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia and is a sign of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood," Mr. Bush told Mr. Obasanjo in an Oval Office meeting.

A Nigerian police official said Mr. Taylor was in a vehicle with his son, an aide and a local guide when arrested. They also were carrying two 110-pound sacks filled with U.S. and European currency, Alhaji Mohammed Aminu Bello said.

Mr. Taylor and his son were taken into custody while the others were let go, Mr. Bello said.

Mr. Taylor then was flown on a plane bearing a Nigerian flag to Monrovia, Liberia, where hundreds of U.N. troops patrolled. Dozens of elite Irish troops in armored personnel carriers parked their vehicles on the airstrip.

There are 15,000 U.N. peacekeepers in Liberia.

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf had said she did not want Mr. Taylor back because his presence could destabilize her fragile country as it takes its first steps toward rebuilding since she was installed in January.

In New York, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan told reporters "it's a great relief that he's been recaptured."

"I think his capture and being put on trial does not only close a chapter, but it also sends a powerful message to the region that impunity will not be allowed to stand and would-be warlords will pay a price," Mr. Annan said.

Mr. Taylor disappeared just days after Nigeria, which had granted him asylum under a 2003 agreement that helped end Liberia's 14-year civil war, bowed to pressure to surrender Mr. Taylor to face justice before the tribunal.

All 22 Nigerian police officers responsible for guarding Mr. Taylor have been arrested, the Nigerian government said Tuesday.

The admission that Mr. Taylor had slipped away came an hour before Mr. Obasanjo left Nigeria to meet with Mr. Bush. The White House had suggested the meeting might be canceled if Nigeria's leader did not have some answers about Mr. Taylor's disappearance.

Mr. Obasanjo said the mood of the White House encounter had "changed drastically" as a result of Mr. Taylor's arrest.

"I feel vindicated," Mr. Obasanjo said as he rejected the notion that Nigerian authorities may have been complicit in Mr. Taylor's escape.

Nigeria announced last week it would hand Mr. Taylor over to the tribunal to be tried for reputed war crimes related to Sierra Leone's 1991-2001 civil war, but the government made no moves to arrest him before he disappeared.

Mr. Taylor, a one-time warlord and rebel leader, is charged with backing Sierra Leonean rebels, including child fighters, who terrorized victims by chopping off their arms, legs, ears and lips. He would be the first African leader to face trial for crimes against humanity.

While the Sierra Leonean tribunal's charges refer only to the war there, Mr. Taylor also has been accused of starting civil war in Liberia and of harboring al Qaeda suicide bombers who attacked the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, killing more than 200 people.

Bush Sure Nigeria's Taylor Will Be Tried (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, March 29, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday he's confident that Charles Taylor, a former warlord charged with brutal crimes during Sierra Leone's civil war, will be tried in an international tribunal.

DOJ_NMG_0024274

"I think he is headed for where he belongs, which is trial," Bush said.

Taylor, the former president of Liberia who has been living in exile in neighboring Nigeria, disappeared just days after Nigeria bowed to pressure to surrender him to face charges at the international criminal tribunal in Sierra Leone.

News that he had slipped away came Tuesday, just an hour before Nigerian President Olesegun Obasanjo left Nigeria for his Wednesday meeting with Bush at the White House. On Tuesday night, Taylor was captured on the run with sacks full of U.S. and European currency.

"I do believe that he is headed for trial," Bush said. "We certainly will do our efforts in the diplomatic channels to see to it that that's the case."

A U.N. helicopter carrying Taylor landed inside the Sierra Leone tribunal compound shortly after noon Washington time.

All 22 of the Nigerian police officers who had been guarding Taylor have been arrested, but at the White House, Obasanjo rejected claims that Nigerian authorities may have been complicit in Taylor's escape.

"I do not agree, must disagree that we have been negligent in the way we handled the Charles Taylor issue," Obasanjo said.

Taylor is charged with backing Sierra Leone rebels, including child fighters, who terrorized victims by chopping off their arms, legs, ears and lips. He would be the first African leader to face trial for crimes against humanity.

"If we had been negligent, then Charles Taylor would have got away," Obasanjo said. "He would not have been arrested if there was negligence."

Bush said he appreciated the government of Nigeria's work to apprehend Taylor.

Bush recalled his meeting last week with Liberia's new President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, who had asked Obasanjo to hand over Taylor. Sirleaf told Bush that her impoverished nation cannot move beyond its years of civil strife until Taylor, who continues to have operatives in Liberia, had his day in court.

"The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia and is a signal, Mr. President, of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood," Bush said after his meeting with Obasanjo.

The Sierra Leone tribunal has jurisdiction, but Bush said the United States is working to have Taylor tried at the International Criminal Court in The Hague, Netherlands — something that would require a U.N. Security Council resolution.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "told me that she thought that might happen relatively quickly," Bush said.

Bush said he and Obasanjo also talked about an international effort to help end Sudan's 21-year civil war, which has left more than 180,000 people dead and 2 million displaced.

Bush has called for greater NATO involvement in Sudan's Darfur region, which the United Nations has described as the world's gravest humanitarian crisis. But he said the African Union must request that its mission in Darfur be converted to a U.N. mission. When that happens, NATO can move in with U.S. help.

"I made it very clear to (Obasanjo) that we are deeply concerned about the humiliation, the rape, the murder that is taking place among the — against the citizens of Darfur. He agreed," Bush said.

On other topics affecting U.S.-Africa relations, Bush asked Obasanjo about conditions in Nigeria's oil-rich southern delta. Obasanjo has been criticized for failing to control militants who have launched attacks on oil facilities in the area. Nigeria is the fifth-biggest source of U.S. oil imports.

"We are very grateful that the measures we are taking, which are essentially socio-economic measures to address some of the grievances, identified grievances (that) will resolve the issue of the Niger Delta," Obasanjo said.

The Nigerian leader said he also talked to Bush about West Africa's Gulf of Guinea, where an oil boom could outpace Persian Gulf exports to America in a decade. The United States is wary about the security of an increasingly strategic part of the world that some U.S. officials believe is vulnerable to piracy, political instability and terrorism.

Obasanjo said he told Bush about how he is working to establish a Gulf of Guinea commission to address any misunderstandings between Nigeria and other countries in the Gulf and how activity in the region can be monitored.

Liberia's Taylor Found And Arrested (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024275

MONROVIA, Liberia, March 29 -- On a rain-drenched tarmac, former Liberian president Charles Taylor was arrested by U.N. security officials Wednesday, read his rights, placed in manacles and then flown by helicopter to neighboring Sierra Leone to face charges of crimes against humanity.

So ended, for now anyway, the political career of one of the most-wanted men in the world, a charismatic warlord-turned-president-turned-fugitive who finished the day in the custody of a U.N.-backed tribunal that has indicted him on 11 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for his long reign of terror across this fragile region.

Among his alleged crimes are mass murder, rape and mutilation, including support for a brutal rebel group in Sierra Leone that cut off the limbs of its civilian victims. Taylor, 58, is also accused of destabilizing Liberia and several neighboring countries while amassing a personal fortune from illicit trade in diamonds, guns and timber.

Taylor, who served as president from 1997 until he resigned under pressure in August 2003, is the first former African head of state to face international criminal charges for alleged misdeeds while in office. After stepping down, he went into exile in the southeastern Nigerian tourist city of Calabar, but last week Nigerian authorities agreed to return him to Liberia at the request of the newly elected president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf.

"It's an important day for justice in the whole African region," said Ezekiel Pajibo of the Center for Democratic Empowerment, based in Monrovia. "It means that Liberia has begun the process of curbing the culture of impunity that has been existing in our country."

Liberians expressed relief, wonder and some unease at the dramatic turn of events for their former president. Only one day earlier, they had learned that Taylor had mysteriously disappeared from a government guest house in Nigeria where he had spent the past 2 1/2 years in exile. Many Liberians feared that he was on his way back to the country, where he stills commands some support.

Johnson-Sirleaf, who on March 5 requested Taylor's return from Liberia, made no immediate public comments but announced plans to address the country in a televised speech Thursday morning.

Taylor, who lived in the United States for years and served a stint in a Boston jail, returned to Liberia in 1989 to launch his rebel movement. Since then, he has exerted a hold on the imagination of Liberians, first by helping to topple the hated dictator Samuel K. Doe, then by winning election in a country he had terrorized for years.

To many Liberians, his return to power had loomed as a real possibility. As he left for exile, Taylor vowed: "God willing, I'll be back." They were words few Liberians have forgotten.

But it was not the return Taylor and his supporters had envisioned.

The office of Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo announced Tuesday that Taylor had disappeared the night before. Obasanjo ordered the arrest of the security detail that was guarding Taylor and created a commission of inquiry.

News of the disappearance provoked denunciations from the United States, the United Nations, international human rights groups and the special prosecutor in Sierra Leone. Alarm spread through Liberia as well, which has recently begun to show signs of recovering from decades of war and instability.

But an immigration official in Gamboru, in northeastern Nigeria, spotted Taylor in a jeep with diplomatic tags that was attempting to cross into Cameroon about 7:30 a.m., according to Nigerian authorities. Under orders from Obasanjo, who for years had resisted pressure to deliver Taylor to the war crimes court, Taylor was taken into custody and, courtesy of a sleek green-and-white government jet, flown to Monrovia, Liberia's seaside capital.

Reports of Taylor's capture reached Washington a few hours before Obasanjo was due to meet with President Bush at the White House, heading off what would have been an embarrassing encounter for both leaders. Rather than meeting with the man who had lost a war criminal, Bush was able to applaud Obasanjo for the arrest and focus on other issues.

"The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia and is a signal, Mr. President, of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood," Bush told Obasanjo in the Oval Office as cameras recorded the moment.

Obasanjo thanked him and then denied any mishandling of Taylor. "I do not agree, must disagree, that we have been negligent in the way we handled the Charles Taylor issue," he said. "If we had been negligent, then Charles Taylor would have got away."

U.S. officials were not sure what to make of the incident and the dramatic developments. Obasanjo arrived in Washington after 9 p.m. Tuesday amid reports that Taylor had escaped, and the Nigerian president and his delegation were promptly met at their hotel by State Department officials seeking information on what had happened. The national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, met separately at the White House with his Nigerian counterpart, Aliyu Mohammed.

Administration officials went to bed Tuesday night uncertain what would happen at the Oval Office meeting the next morning, but by the time they arrived at work, they had received reports that Taylor had been caught.

DOJ_NMG_0024276

"It's an open question as to what happened," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack. "We will follow up with the Nigerian government on that issue, but as I said, the important fact is that he is in custody and he's going to face justice."

For Taylor's arrival at Roberts International Airport in Monrovia, dozens of Jordanian and Nepalese military police officers took up positions on the tarmac. White U.N. tanks were posted at every corner of the runway and two helicopters patrolled.

A half-hour before Taylor's plane landed, thick clouds rolled in. The temperature dropped. The wind picked up and churned the propellers of a waiting plane. Then rain poured down.

It had slowed only slightly when Taylor's plane landed about 4:30 p.m. The former president, dressed casually in a beige traditional robe and slacks, was somber as he was read his rights and placed under arrest, according to Liberian officials. In a matter of several minutes, he boarded a waiting U.N. helicopter a few steps away.

He was then flown to Freetown, the capital of Sierra Leone. About an hour after arriving there, Taylor was in the custody of the special court.

Many Liberians learned of Taylor's arrest by listening to live radio broadcasts. A surge of jubilation shot through the capital.

"I'm so grateful today to hear that Taylor has gone to Sierra Leone," Samuel Kanneh, 31, said in downtown Monrovia. "Liberia will be safe."

The joy was tinged with frustration that the United Nations, pushed mostly by Western powers, had brought Taylor to justice rather than Liberians themselves.

"He was my president," said Marcus Kelley, 27, a student. "He was loved by a lot of people."

Even Harris Banni, 29, an unemployed man who said his father was killed by Taylor-led rebels, expressed wounded pride at the manner of Taylor's arrest.

"I am a Liberian even though he killed my father," Banni said.

Liberian Seized To Stand Trial On War Crimes (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone, March 29 — Charles G. Taylor, the warlord who became Liberia's president, was captured Wednesday after a dramatic 24 hours in which he disappeared from the villa in Nigeria where he had lived in exile and then was recognized at a remote outpost as he tried to leave the country.

He was brought here to face war crimes charges for his role in a brutal decade-long civil war in Sierra Leone, one of a series of conflagrations that he set off, killing at least 300,000 people. He is the first African head of state to face such charges in an international court.

Mr. Taylor's arrival by helicopter under extraordinary security capped a saga that began nearly three years ago, when he fled his nation in the face of a rebel onslaught. He was captured Wednesday morning after a customs official recognized him as he tried to escape into Cameroon.

He arrived unshaven and dressed in a white tunic covered by a bullet-proof vest, tan pants and slip-on shoes. His appearance was in stark contrast to his dapper look in his last public appearance, in 2003, when he went into exile after a 14-year civil war that killed a quarter million of his countrymen, defiantly declaring, "God willing, I will be back."

He did return to Liberia, briefly, on Wednesday, but only to be handed over to United Nations troops who promptly flew him here, where he was read the indictment from a United Nations-backed court dealing with war crimes in Sierra Leone — 11 counts of crimes against humanity — then jailed.

Desmond de Silva, the prosecutor who will try the case, said Mr. Taylor's arrival "sends out the clear message that no matter how rich, powerful or feared people may be, the law is above them."

The trial is sure to resonate on a continent where dictators have ruled with ruthless impunity. From Idi Amin, the soldier whose murderous rule in Uganda gave way to comfortable exile in Saudi Arabia, to Haile Mengistu Mariam, whose 14-year Communist rule in Ethiopia brought political purges that killed more than a million people but who is now living quietly in Zimbabwe, African leaders who brutalize their citizens have faced few consequences.

"The current perpetrators of serious human rights crimes should be put on notice that international courts take the crimes they commit very, very seriously," said Corinne Dufka of Human Rights Watch.

Mr. Taylor's arrival here was a dramatic turn in the already complicated saga of the effort to bring him to justice after he ignited a series of civil wars in the 1990's that engulfed much of West Africa.

In the early 1980's, Mr. Taylor was a senior government procurement officer in Liberia. Charged in 1983 with embezzling nearly $1 million, he fled. He was arrested in Massachusetts in 1984, then escaped from jail in 1985. He resurfaced in Liberia in 1989 as a Libyan-trained warlord, leading a rebel force. He was elected president in 1997, in a vote overshadowed by fears of what might happen if he lost.

DOJ_NMG_0024277

A warrant for his arrest was issued in March 2003. But as part of an agreement to remove him from power and halt a bloodbath in Liberia, Nigeria offered him asylum and refused to hand him over to the court in Sierra Leone, where he was accused of fomenting a civil war.

Though under intense pressure by the United States to arrest him, President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria had insisted he would hand over Mr. Taylor only to an elected Liberian government. Earlier this month, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, Liberia's new president, herself facing pressure from the United States, made the request, and Mr. Obasanjo agreed.

But Nigeria insisted that it was Liberia's responsibility to go and arrest him, with Mr. Obasanjo's spokeswoman declaring that Mr. Taylor was "not a prisoner," which seemed almost to taunt Mr. Taylor into trying to escape from his lightly guarded compound in Calabar.

Late Monday night the Nigerian government said he had vanished. He was found more than 600 miles north, in an ash-colored Land Rover with a large quantity of dollars, in the company of a woman and a driver, Haz Iwendi, a spokesman for the National Police, said by telephone.

A customs official spotted Mr. Taylor, whose vehicle had diplomatic license plates, early Wednesday morning in the border town of Ngala, Mr. Iwendi said.

The escape was an acute embarrassment for Mr. Obasanjo, who arrived Tuesday in Washington for a visit to the White House to discuss security in the volatile Niger Delta, where attacks by militants on oil facilities and kidnappings have slashed output. Nigeria is the United States' fifth-largest supplier of oil.

Outraged American lawmakers called on President Bush to cancel his meeting with Mr. Obasanjo, with whom Mr. Bush has had a warm relationship, based in part on their shared Christian faith and bolstered by Mr. Obasanjo's role as a regional problem solver.

But internal problems have eroded the Nigerian's status. Militants in the Niger Delta, sectarian violence that killed more than 100 people last month and a political crisis stemming from plans to try to extend his rule to a third term have roiled Nigeria.

Mr. Bush met with him on Wednesday, and at a joint news conference, hailed the arrest of Mr. Taylor. "The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia," Mr. Bush said, "and is a signal, Mr. President, of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood."

Mr. Taylor was flown on a Nigerian government jet from Borno State, in northeastern Nigeria, where he was captured, to Monrovia, Liberia's capital. There he was handed over to Liberian officials, who promptly turned him over to United Nations peacekeepers, who arrested him. After a brief medical checkup, he boarded a helicopter for Sierra Leone.

The reaction to Mr. Taylor's arrival here was muted and fearful.

J. B. Jenkins-Johnson, a human rights lawyer in Freetown, worried that Mr. Taylor's arrival would cause unrest in a country still reeling from the long civil war. "Let them not bring that man here," Mr. Jenkins-Johnson said. "This man will bring us nothing but problems."

Indeed, many Sierra Leoneans wonder if the court's work will do much to help them improve their lives. "The Taylor case doesn't have a lot of resonance," said Olu Gordon, a political analyst and journalist in Freetown. "It is abstract, while the problems they face are concrete: what to feed their children, how to pay for school, and so on."

The loudest calls for Mr. Taylor's arrest came not from his victims but from the United States, which has backed the international court here financially and diplomatically.

Ms. Johnson Sirleaf, the Liberian leader, had been hesitant to act on Mr. Taylor, saying that the peace in Liberia was still fragile and that any action could stir up his allies, several of whom hold seats in Liberia's new legislature. Several of his commanders remain in Liberia, and news of Mr. Taylor's arrest caused immediate fears of a coup attempt.

But removing him from the scene could also help stabilize the region, said Mike McGovern, an analyst for the International Crisis Group, by demoralizing Mr. Taylor's supporters.

"The arrest closes an ugly chapter in Liberian history and gives people the confidence to look to the future," Mr. McGovern said in an interview in Monrovia. "A lot of people are still sitting on the fence. Once they have a clear idea of where Taylor is and what's likely to happen to him, they're likely to really turn their backs on that period and move forward."

In Liberia, human rights advocates exulted in the news. "This is a great day," said Jerome J. Verdier Sr., head of the country's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. "It's a fundamental triumph for the rule of law both in Liberia and the sub-region."

For Liberia's Expats, Relief And Jubilation (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 30, 2006

Kai Wleh, whose parents were murdered by soldiers of former Liberian president Charles Taylor, has waited 15 long years for justice. Yesterday, unlike any other day, he felt his quest could soon be over.

DOJ_NMG_0024278

Like many Liberians across the Washington region, Wleh awoke to a news report that Taylor had been captured while trying to flee Nigeria, where he was exiled. Unconvinced, Wleh jumped out of bed and called co-workers in Liberia to check whether the report was true.

"My prayer had been answered," said Wleh, 46, who fled Liberia in 1998 and lives in Silver Spring. "Taylor must face trial to bring closure to the atrocities he committed against all of us."

Liberians across the region heaved a sigh of relief yesterday morning as word spread of Taylor's capture and handover to a U.N.-backed war crimes tribunal in neighboring Sierra Leone. Many feared that his dramatic escape Monday from his villa in the Nigerian city of Calabar could trigger another bloody chapter of war and chaos in Liberia.

Hundreds of people phoned Radio Free Liberia, a local radio station that Wleh manages, and joined online chat rooms, refusing to believe that Taylor had finally been apprehended. Shock soon gave way to outright joy.

"This is a great day of celebration, a great day of relief, a great day of jubilation and a great day for freedom for Liberians," said the Rev. Joseph Samuel Reeves, 51, of Culpeper, Va., who said he fled Liberia after several attempts were made on his life.

An estimated 10,000 native Liberians live in the Washington region, many of them refugees who fled different periods of civil war in their West African homeland. Over the years, they have remained connected, wiring home millions of dollars to support poor relatives and to help finance Liberian political candidates.

Last year's historic post-civil war elections, held under the protection of 15,000 U.N. peacekeepers, promised a new era of peace and stability with the election of Harvard University-trained economist Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, Africa's first female elected president.

But many Liberians in the United States still worried about their homeland's future. Taylor has many supporters inside Liberia, and as long as he was in exile, Liberians feared he could return to launch another rebellion. So when the news broke about Taylor's escape, they worried for relatives at home who were putting their lives back together after more than two decades of conflict.

"Charles Taylor on the loose, that could mean insecurity in the region," said Caroline Barnard, a well-known singer in College Park, who fled Liberia in 1990. "That's what we were so afraid of."

Barnard said her mother, who like many older Liberians plans to return home soon, is relieved that Taylor was captured. For many Liberians, it's the most promising sign that their country has turned a corner on the road toward peace.

"The election was an historical landmark, but the capture of Charles Taylor paves the way for the building of peaceful coexistence," Wleh said. "As long as Taylor was in exile or alive, the possibility of peace in Liberia was on slippery ground. This solidifies Liberia's march towards democracy."

Ex-Liberian Leader Arrested In Nigeria, To Face U.N. Tribunal (USAT)

USA Today, March 30, 2006

Former Liberian president Charles Taylor was arrested Wednesday and flown to a United Nations tribunal prison in Sierra Leone to face 17 counts of war crimes. Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo said Taylor was arrested in a car as he tried to cross Nigeria's northern border into Cameroon. He was flown to the Liberian capital, Monrovia, and then to Sierra Leone. The charges stem from Taylor's alleged role in civil strife that killed tens of thousands in Sierra Leone from 1991 to 2002.

Taylor had disappeared Monday from his villa in southern Nigeria, where he had been living in exile since being forced from power under a peace deal in 2003 that ended Liberia's civil war. Obasanjo, who met Wednesday with President Bush at the White House, denied that Nigeria helped Taylor's attempted escape.

An Afghan man who could have been executed for converting from Islam to Christianity arrived in Italy and was granted asylum, Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi said. Abdul Rahman, 41, was released Monday from a prison in Kabul after a court dismissed charges of apostasy — abandoning his faith — because of a lack of evidence and suspicions he might be mentally ill.

President Hamid Karzai was under international pressure to end the case. Afghanistan's new parliament sent a letter to the Interior Ministry demanding that Rahman be barred from leaving the country, but no vote was taken, parliamentary speaker Yunus Qanooni said. Muslim clerics condemned Rahman's release and threatened to incite violent protests; Zabul province's top cleric, Abdulrahman Jan, called it “a terrible thing and a major shame.”

Also, Taliban rebels attacked a coalition military base in southern Afghanistan, killing a U.S. soldier and a Canadian soldier but losing 32 of their own, British military spokesman Col. Chris Vernon said.

Vernon said the fighting was the deadliest in months. The Taliban has warned of a renewed offensive more than four years after U.S.-led forces ousted the hard-line regime.

female fetuses. Sushma Saini, an information officer for the Haryana state government, said the sentence includes a $125 fine. Girls in India are often seen as burdens requiring huge dowries. The British medical journal Lancet reported that ultrasound sex-determination tests resulted in nearly 10 million female fetuses being aborted in India during the past two decades.

Fugitive Ex-Liberian President Is Captured At Nigerian Border (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon And Hans Nichols

The Los Angeles Times, March 30, 2006

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone — Looking unshaven and haggard, former Liberian President Charles Taylor was placed in a detention cell in Sierra Leone on Wednesday, after his early-morning arrest trying to flee Nigeria carrying large bags of cash.

He will be the first former African head of state to face international justice on war crimes charges, which include forced recruitment of child soldiers, as well as murder, rape, mutilation and sexual enslavement of civilians in a decade of civil war in Sierra Leone. More than 50,000 people were killed in the conflict, which ended in 2002.

Taylor's arrest is a further sign that the international community is catching up with the leaders of West Africa's bloodiest conflicts. Nine former leaders in the Sierra Leone conflict have been detained and await trial in that country. In addition, Thomas Lubanga, a former militia leader during the civil war in Zaire, now the Democratic Republic of Congo, is facing judgment in The Hague.

A United Nations helicopter carrying Taylor, escorted by two other helicopters, landed in the compound of the U.N. Special Court for Sierra Leone in Freetown at dusk.

Handcuffed and wearing a bulletproof vest over a white tunic, Taylor stepped out and was hustled into an SUV and driven about 100 yards to the door of the detention center.

As he emerged from the helicopter, about two dozen Sierra Leoneans on the roof of a nearby house cheered in apparent support of his arrest. Taylor gave no sign he had heard, nor did he answer a question shouted by a reporter.

Inside, away from reporters, a court official read him an amended 11-count indictment on war crimes for his role in the civil war in diamond-rich Sierra Leone, which neighbors Liberia. Taylor is due to appear in court in the coming days to enter his plea, but it will be months before he is granted a hearing.

The court's original 17-count indictment, in March 2003, was reduced by the court this month to 11 counts, prosecutor Desmond de Silva said.

"This will ensure a more focused trial," De Silva said in a statement. "The thrust and gravity of the former indictment is in no way diminished."

Analysts said Taylor's arrest was a boost for West African stability and would give Liberia the chance to break with its violent history.

President Bush welcomed Taylor's arrest in comments to journalists with Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo in Washington. "The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia and is a signal, Mr. President, of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood," he said.

Bush added later that he hoped the U.N. Security Council would pass a resolution to place Taylor under the jurisdiction of The Hague in the Netherlands.

Taylor, who wore no disguise, was arrested after 5 a.m. in a Land Rover carrying two large sacks of currency, including American dollars, at Nigeria's border with Cameroon, said Nigerian officials in the northeastern state of Borno.

Traveling in an entourage of several cars, Taylor passed through the Nigerian customs post but found the gate at the immigration post padlocked, according to reports from the scene. When immigration officials pounced, the other vehicles in the convoy fled, according to the reports.

Taylor's capture, a day after he had disappeared, saved Obasanjo intense embarrassment in his meeting with Bush on Wednesday.

Obasanjo said he felt vindicated by the arrest, adding that there was no negligence by Nigeria. "If we had been negligent then Charles Taylor would have got away," he said.

But some still raised questions about Nigeria's role.

This month, Liberia's recently elected president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, requested Taylor's extradition from Nigeria, but Nigeria took no steps to detain him.

Mike McGovern, West Africa analyst for the International Crisis Group, said the near escape was "very peculiar."

"The fact he would be miraculously found in this way is also very peculiar."

After 14 years of civil war in Liberia, Taylor accepted exile in Nigeria in 2003 and left power, vowing that he would return, "God willing." He was accused by many of breaching the conditions of his exile by trying to interfere in Liberian affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0024280

In the Freetown detention center, Taylor joined nine other detainees, some former allies and some enemies: three former leaders of the Sierra Leone Civil Defense Forces, three members of a former military junta and three leaders of the rebel Revolutionary United Front.

Congress Wary Of Trade Deficit With China (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

Last year, Americans sold just $1 of goods to China for every $6 of goods flowing the other way. That imbalance is tipping the scales in Congress toward confronting China about its trade.

The growing trade gap - nearly $202 billion in 2005 - threatens the US economy, some lawmakers say. They want China to end what they call unfair trade policies and an artificially low yuan, its currency.

But others say the greater danger lies in provoking a trade war with China, which could hurt the two biggest drivers of the global economy.

Those stakes pose a delicate challenge for America: finding the right balance between assertiveness and patience.

"There's strong bipartisan concern that this growing trade deficit with China is a serious problem," says Robert Scott, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank in Washington.

So far this year, Congress and the Bush administration have leaned hard on China's leadership. One Senate bill introduced Tuesday by Charles Grassley (R) of Iowa and Max Baucus (D) of Montana outlines new consequences for trade violations and artificially low exchange rates. Sens. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina and Charles Schumer (D) of New York, meanwhile, have delayed a vote on their proposal to impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports if the yuan's value doesn't rise.

The next few weeks could reveal whether the path ahead involves confrontation or common ground. Chinese leader Hu Jintao meets with President Bush in April. And the US Treasury Department is preparing to issue an assessment of whether China is manipulating its currency.

The blend of pressure and patience with China is already a well-worn balancing act for US officials. That's because both the economics and politics of the issues are tricky.

Many US companies are developing profitable operations in China and don't want to antagonize the nation that offers superior growth prospects. Wal-Mart, for example, recently said it expects to hire 150,000 Chinese workers as it expands retail operations there during the next five years.

By some measures, China may already be the world's No. 2 economy. And forecasters estimate that it could surpass America as the world's biggest economy by about 2040.

Economists say the two nations stand to reap big rewards from their expanding ties. The low-cost goods imported from China represent a boost in the purchasing power of American consumers - a kind of "China dividend" for the US standard of living.

And trade is flowing the other way too, with US exports booming last year.

In effect, many economists say the greatest risk is not the trade deficit but the prospect that a rift over trade could result in a resurgence of protectionism.

"Personally, I can think of no faster path to a worldwide recession than for the twin engines of the global economy - the United States and China - to turn against one another," Caterpillar Inc. chairman Jim Owens said in a speech to manufacturers last week in Illinois.

The company's exports of machinery to China have grown 40 percent in the past few years, helping to support 5,000 US jobs. The company is also adding workers rapidly in China.

Although trade and economic prosperity have historically gone together, critics say the US has not done enough to defend US jobs against unfair trade practices - especially in China.

Counting the number of manufacturing jobs lost due to trade is notoriously difficult. Many economists contend that even if China cut export subsidies and boosted the yuan by 25 percent, the impact on US employment would not be dramatic. Americans might simply import more goods from other nations.

But the effect on US manufacturers might be greater. An analysis by the Economic Policy Institute concluded that since 1989, the rising trade deficit with China has displaced production that supported 1.5 million US jobs.

The Grassley-Baucus bill would address currency imbalances and trade violations through a system of "engagement." "We need to engage China and other nations firmly, but with an eye to economic opportunities as well as economic concerns," Senator Baucus said.

DOJ_NMG_0024281

Currency is a primary concern for the National Association of Manufacturers. With the yuan undervalued by some 20 to 40 percent, "it does confer a very significant artificial price advantage," says Frank Vargo, who specializes in trade issues at the association. "That's huge."

He hopes that the Bush administration will work with other nations to bring joint action against China to reform the exchange rate. "There really are no quick routes," says Mr. Vargo. "It's the one we prefer."

US Adds To Pressure On China Over Trade (FT)

By Richard Mcgregor And Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 30, 2006

The US government on Wednesday stepped up efforts to press China into making big trade concessions before Hu Jintao, their president, visits Washington next month.

Amid a fresh salvo of criticism of Chinese recalcitrance, the Bush administration also gave its first indication that it would back a Senate bill that would require it to take a tougher line on China for not allowing its currency to appreciate.

Carlos Gutierrez, the US commerce secretary, warned in Beijing on Thursday that China would risk protectionist retaliation if it failed to open its market faster and that such measures could be “devastating” to the Chinese economy. “It is important for our colleagues in China to recognise that the voices in the US calling for protectionist policies are real,” Mr Gutierrez said ahead of trade negotiations scheduled for next month.

A few hours later in Washington, Timothy Adams, US undersecretary of the Treasury, told a Senate hearing that China had been “far too cautious” in moving to greater currency flexibility. “They continue to say all the right things...they need to walk the walk,” he said.

Washington is demanding action by Beijing on a range of fronts, including more stringent enforcement of intellectual property rights, the reduction of auto parts tariffs and action on subsidies of state companies and government procurement policies. Pressure also continues to mount for China to allow its currency to appreciate more rapidly.

The Senate has temporarily backed away from threats to put tariffs on Chinese imports in retaliation but is moving ahead with legislation that would threaten China with sanctions if the renminbi failed to appreciate.

Mr Adams indicated on Wednesday that the administration would endorse legislation introduced by Republican Charles Grassley and Democrat Max Baucus that would allow for some sanctions against countries deemed to have currency “misalignments” with the US. He called it “a novel approach” that “would help us”.

Mr Adams said, however, that the administration was not in favour of some of the more draconian proposals put forward by lawmakers. “There are several bills in Congress that would close our markets to Chinese goods if China does not move more on its exchange rate. We do not support those isolationist approaches.

“They would damage our economy and not achieve our shared goals.”

The US efforts are designed to press China into faster action by threatening consequences that the administration – and powerful US companies – would prefer not be carried out.

In spite of Mr Gutierrez’s warning, he struck a much milder tone than on previous trips to China. The importance of cheap Chinese goods to US consumers and the huge investments made by US companies in China make the imposition of any penalties by Washington on Beijing problematic.

China Is Told Of U.S. Impatience On Trade (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

BEIJING, March 29 — The rise of protectionist sentiment in the United States over a $202 billion trade deficit with China could hurt the Chinese economy, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said Wednesday.

Mr. Gutierrez said at a business forum here that protectionist measures could lead to a decline in Chinese exports to the United States, its biggest international customer.

That would hurt the United States, but be even more damaging for China, he said.

Mr. Gutierrez said China could help the Bush administration counter that threat with improved market access for United States products and stricter enforcement of intellectual property rights.

He acknowledged that Chinese tariffs had fallen since the country's entry into the World Trade Organization in 2001, but he said a wide array of barriers remained that restricted sales of products from companies in the United States and other foreign countries.

"It is important for our colleagues in China to realize that the voices in the U.S. calling for protectionist policies are very real," he said. Mr. Gutierrez was on the last day of a four-day visit to China.

DOJ_NMG_0024282

While Mr. Gutierrez was in Beijing for trade talks, one looming threat to its exports to the United States appeared to have eased. Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, delayed plans for a bill that would have threatened steep tariffs on Chinese imports if Chinese leaders refused to let their currency, the yuan, rise in value against the dollar.

The senators said they had become more optimistic as a result of their trip to China last week when Chinese officials emphasized their willingness to let the yuan float more freely and to address other aspects of their country's growing trade deficit with the United States.

Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, respectively the top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee, are pushing a separate bill that would focus more attention on currency policies but would stop short of threatening tariffs on imported goods.

Mr. Gutierrez, in earlier talks with senior Chinese officials, including Prime Minister Wen Jiabao; the vice prime minister, Wu Yi; and the commerce minister, Bo Xilai, urged China to accelerate moves to open its markets.

In a statement posted on the Web site of the Commerce Ministry, Mr. Bo said "global economic trends," not Beijing, were to blame for the deficit.

He also said that United States consumers enjoyed the benefits of cheap high-quality goods from China.

The Bush administration is pushing China to make tangible progress on market access at the next meeting of the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade, to be held in Washington on April 11.

The outcome of the talks could set the tone for President Hu Jintao's visit to the United States later in April, according to United States and Chinese officials.

Mr. Gutierrez did not publicly raise concerns about the value of the yuan, in keeping with a longstanding policy that only Treasury officials deal with currency issues.

US Targets Chinese Piracy Of US Goods (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, March 30, 2006

BEIJING - Liu Tong is polite to a fault, speaks perfect English, majored in American studies, has loads of American friends he loves to phone - and duplicates Japanese and American high-tech goods for a living.

Mr. Liu buys unusual, specialized technology - a machine to make film subtitles is a recent project, for example. He disassembles the machine, duplicates the parts, and rebuilds a Chinese version. The process, called "reverse engineering," is the more serious side of a long-running feud between the US and China over intellectual property rights violations - one that includes mass production of pirated DVDs of movies, music, and software.

Now, as Chinese president Hu Jintao prepares to visit the US next month to discuss what Bush administration officials term "our $250 billion relationship," Washington seems to be backing away from a trade war over currency valuation that would slap an epic 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese exports.

Instead, US Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez indicated here Wednesday that the White House will focus on a more diffuse and difficult problem: intellectual property rights (IPR).

"Not currency valuation ... but intellectual property rights violations are the main threat to US industry" argues Stephen Green, senior economist for the London-based Standard Charter Bank in Shanghai, China. "It is the taking of emerging technology, the sophisticated technology that resides in the products of large Western firms, that can do the most harm in the long term."

For nearly a decade, complaints about IPR violations have been a mantra by US trade officials coming to China. Little is done, apart from occasional bonfires of illegal DVDs by Chinese police.

But as the US trade deficit with China climbed to $202 billion last year, protectionist sentiment has built in Washington. Talk of a lack of access to Chinese markets, unfair and obscure business rules that penalize foreign companies, and the recent bill, introduced by Sens. Lindsey Graham (R) of South Carolina and Charles Schumer (D) of New York, which would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports - have seized Beijing's attention. Some 67 senators agreed to pass the bill, despite opposition by the White House. After high-level meetings last week with Vice-Premier Wu Yi and Commerce Minister Bo Xilai, Sens. Schumer and Graham agreed to delay the vote.

Secretary Gutierrez says that while China is the world's No. 2 buyer of personal computers, it ranks No. 25 in software purchasing - a result of widespread use of "pirated software" in China. In a talk to an American business audience, he noted that if China cut the use of pirated software to 80 percent from 90 percent of all software, the country would gain $6.5 billion in tax revenue.

Just around the corner from where Gutierrez spoke, one major DVD shop had removed all current Hollywood movies from its shelves, leaving an odd assortment of Alfred Hitchcock, Charlie Chaplin, exercise videos, and Korean, Japanese, and Chinese films. But at the store counter, two huge folders of movie flyers were available - Capote, Crash, Pride and Prejudice. Buyers simply pulled the flyers, paid $1 each, and a young Chinese person left the store and returned with movies under his or her coat, already wrapped.

On Treasure Street, Ya Ba Lu, hundreds of vendors who front for factories outside Beijing tell reporters that they can have name-brand coats, shoes, and purses mass-produced for shipment to Moscow, Warsaw, Bangkok, and other destinations.

Economic relations between the US and China have arrived at something of a crucial juncture, US officials say. Gutierrez said that US firms have shifted from thinking of China as a "land of opportunity" to giving its business environment a more "mixed assessment." The secretary also adjusted his criticism of piracy practices and closed markets, shifting from a tone that Chinese see as one of self-interest to an argument that greater opening and fair trade was ultimately good for the Chinese.

IPR enforcement is highly problematic, requiring China to police deeply inside a corrupt system that sprawls over local provinces and cities.

The US isn't alone in showing greater worry over China's capability as a superb duplicator of innovative products. The European Union is preparing to file a WTO suit arguing that Chinese laws requiring European auto-parts makers to create joint ventures with Chinese firms will mainly allow Chinese firms to learn to duplicate European technology and then abandon the firms.

Beijing is showing signs that it understands the sentiment behind US protectionist feelings. Last week, five Chinese agencies held a rare joint press conference arguing that China has done, and will do, much more to police IPR violations. China has shut down more than a dozen factories making illegal DVDs in the past year. Moreover, in a development also praised by Gutierrez, China has shifted IPR violations from a civil to a criminal violation - though the fine print on this is unclear. That Vice Premier Wu is handling IPR violations inside the state structure is an affirmative fact, the commerce secretary said.

"They are closing down the DVD factories, but will they remain closed?" Gutierrez asked, adding that China may need to pay more attention to the concerns of "its No. 1 customer."

"In private business, the thought of my No. 1 customer preparing to change policy ... that would have a significant impact on my thinking," Gutierrez told reporters here.

U.S. Officials Urge China On Markets, Yuan (WSJ)

By Mei Fong

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

BEIJING -- U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez warned of rising U.S. protectionist sentiments against China and told China it must do more to open up its markets.

In a speech to the U.S. business community in Beijing yesterday, Mr. Gutierrez warned of "a real protectionist sentiment" that was "creeping up" in America, in part due to the U.S.'s ballooning trade deficit with China.

Later in Washington, the Bush administration warned China that it must do more to allow its currency's value to be set by market forces.

U.S. Treasury Undersecretary Timothy Adams told a congressional committee that getting China to move toward a more-flexible exchange rate system remained his department's No. 1 priority and that the Chinese have failed to do enough since announcing last summer a small revaluation of the currency.

"To date, China's progress has been far too cautious," Mr. Adams said in testimony to the Senate Finance Committee. "China could easily move more rapidly towards greater flexibility. It should do so now."

The comments of Messrs. Gutierrez and Adams came after U.S. Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, announced Tuesday that they wouldn't force an immediate vote on a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all imports from China in retaliation for the alleged advantage that Beijing's currency policies give to Chinese firms.

Discussions on China's yuan policy and the U.S.-China trade imbalance are expected to figure high on the agenda during President Hu Jintao's planned visit to Washington next month. U.S. critics say China has been slow to open its markets to outsiders and that it has kept the yuan artificially low, making its exports unfairly cheap. The U.S. deficit with China exceeded $200 billion last year by Washington's reckoning.

Mr. Gutierrez said "China still had a lot to do" to alleviate trade tensions, including improving enforcement of intellectual-property rights and removing barriers to entry, such as a requirement that foreign telecom firms invest $241 million before they are allowed to provide basic telecom services in China. He said that amount is "24 times more than normal" compared with most other countries.

DOJ_NMG_0024284

Chinese authorities say the country has been opening its markets in accordance with its World Trade Organization commitments, after it joined the international trade body in 2001. They also maintain that other factors, including profligate consumption in America and shifting global trade patterns, are to blame for the trade imbalance, not Beijing's yuan policy.

Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai, in a meeting with Mr. Gutierrez on Tuesday, said China's low-cost imports brought "hundreds of billions of dollars" in benefits to American consumers, according to the ministry's Web site.

Still, protectionist sentiment appears to be mounting in the U.S. Congress, despite the decision to delay the Schumer-Graham bill. Currently, there are at least 15 bills and amendments pending in Congress that threaten new taxes or tighter restrictions on Chinese trade, including a bill proposed Tuesday by the two top-ranking senators on the Finance Committee, Republican Charles Grassley of Iowa and Democrat Max Baucus of Montana. Their bill would leave it up to the Treasury Department to decide if China deserved retaliation and would offer much milder sanctions than the Schumer-Graham bill.

In Washington yesterday, Mr. Adams, the Treasury undersecretary, said the proposed Schumer-Graham legislation would damage the U.S. economy without helping achieve a more-flexible Chinese foreign-exchange policy. The bills amount to isolationism that "would damage our economy and not achieve our shared goals," he said.

In his testimony to the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. Adams reiterated Treasury's opposition to such legislation, arguing constructive engagement with China toward a more flexible foreign-exchange regime is working, albeit not as swiftly as the U.S. would like.

"The obstacles are no longer technical; China could easily move more rapidly towards greater flexibility," he said. "It should do so now."

In Beijing, Mr. Gutierrez also said yesterday that if China cut the proportion of pirated software used in the country to 80% from 90%, it would generate $6.5 billion in tax revenue and create 2.6 million jobs for China.

Besides Mr. Bo, Mr. Gutierrez met this week with Premier Wen Jiabao, China's top economic official and the commissioner in charge of China's State Intellectual Property Office, which enforces patents and copyrights. He declined to give details of their talks but said earlier he would bring up market access, product piracy and complaints about China's exchange-rate controls.

Open-Door Policy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

From the Beltway panic over the Dubai ports deal to Europe's bout of merger anxiety, ambitious politicians are baring their protectionist teeth. Now would seem a good time to recall how well their countries and others have done by flinging doors open to trade, capital, services and people.

The emergence of China and India as global giants in the making dates directly to their decisions to liberalize. The current U.S. expansion is powered in part by capital from abroad. The Asian Tigers grew off trade. The singular achievement of the European Union was to create the biggest zone on the planet for the free trade of goods, capital and people.

In the past four decades, open economies (mostly from Europe, East Asia, North America) have fared far better than closed ones (Africa, Latin America, parts of Eastern Europe). Economists Jeffrey Sachs and Andrew Warner found that from 1970-1989 average annual growth in open developed economies was 2.3%, compared with 0.7% in the closed. In developing countries, those numbers were 4.5% and 0.7%. That trend hasn't changed much as trade and foreign investment have powered global growth.

As befits the dismal science, not to mention the dismal profession of politics, this evidence hasn't settled the intellectual argument. So New York Senator Chuck Schumer and French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin can make their case for "economic patriotism," to use the Frenchman's phrase, with a straight face.

But Europe is a good laboratory to test the link between market access and prosperity. Forget about old and new, south and north; the real EU divide is between open and less open economies. The former category include the "Anglo-Saxon" success stories of the past decade, Britain and Ireland. Starting with the Thatcher era, the U.K. put a "For Sale" sign out. A swath of British industry, including its car makers, is now in foreign hands. But -- Mr. de Villepin, take note -- the world didn't end. Britain focused its attention on services, turning London into a global financial center. Britain's rate of growth and employment is the envy of Europe.

The real star pupil is Ireland, which went from the bottom of the EU league tables in GDP per capita to the top in a generation by slashing taxes and barriers to investment. Of the OECD countries, Ireland has the highest share of foreign-controlled affiliates in terms of employment (nearly 50%) and turnover (78%). In Portugal, which puts up higher obstacles to foreign investment, it's 15% and 8%. Portugal is today the poorest country in Western Europe.

Less well-known is Austria. Having emerged from the Cold War with a state-dominated corporatist system, Austrian fortunes changed with the opening of the east and its own economy. Barriers to foreign direct investment went from above to below the OECD average. In 1998 Austria had the most legal barriers to investment; by 2003 Vienna had the least after New Zealand, another socialist backwater that liberalized its economy starting in the 1980s.

An open-door policy may be the only proven way that EU countries will be able to salvage their beloved "social model." Consider the Nordic states. Other Europeans envy their high economic growth and welfare spending but don't want to see what makes it possible. These countries have deregulated product and service markets and are open to foreign investment. Volvo and Saab aren't owned by "Swedes" anymore.

The human capital in those countries, often cited as one reason for their strong performance, didn't spare them the downturn of the 1990s. That's when Sweden, Denmark and Finland embraced market reforms to become the most dynamic economies in Europe. Call it "a second-generation Nordic Model," socialist mainly in the welfare sphere.

Foreign capital and free trade have also kept the more protectionist EU states afloat. No Western European country has more barriers to foreign investment than France, according to the OECD. (Britain has the least.) But investors have nonetheless moved into France. By one measure -- the stock of foreign direct investment as a share of GDP -- France (41.8%) is ahead of Britain (36%) and Germany (21.3%), according to Eric Chaney of Morgan Stanley. French multinationals are flourishing abroad. With the state eating up half of GDP, the private sector drives the little growth -- a paltry 1.4% last year -- that France has.

Imagine what a freer market for capital and services could do for France. But the government's nationalist turn of recent years is proving costly. Outside investment is dropping, amounting to half the level of 2003 in each of the past two years. French investors may in turn soon find themselves unwelcome in other countries. When the French political class vilified Indian-born steel baron Lakshmi Mittal and his hostile bid for Arcelor, the Indian finance minister warned that the French may not be so welcome in his booming economy.

Globalization is a two-way street. Nations can't take advantage of it abroad and try to protect themselves from it at home. Maybe in the halls of Congress, this message will eventually sink in. The world's prosperity depends on it.

Door Threatens To Slam On Open Skies (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, March 30, 2006

The rising tide of protectionism that killed the Dubai ports deal threatens to swamp another major transportation proposal: removal of 62-year-old limits on air service between Europe and the USA.

If European Union transport ministers approve the move at a meeting scheduled for June, any U.S. airline could fly to any of the European Union's 25 nations. Likewise, any European airline could fly from anywhere in Europe to anywhere in the USA.

Supporters of so-called Open Skies say it would allow airlines to step up competition for an estimated 17 million new passengers annually, making a trans-Atlantic market already valued at $22 billion a year even more lucrative. For travelers, Open Skies could mean more flights, more convenient routes and cheaper fares across the Atlantic.

But Open Skies has been controversial since negotiators for the U.S. departments of State and Transportation and other agencies began talking to the EU in 2003 about dropping arcane restrictions that limit air service between the continents.

In the USA, the Bush administration backs Open Skies because officials believe it would lower fares and benefit U.S. carriers. No. 2 United Airlines and No. 3 Delta Air Lines support it as a welcome step toward globalization of the industry. Just as adamantly, Houston-based Continental Airlines argues that the promised benefits are illusory. Open Skies has also drawn vehement opposition from labor groups that fear American jobs might be lost.

“Giving away another vital U.S. industry to foreign interests is one more example of globalization run amok,” says the AFL-CIO's Edward Wytkind.

Open Skies was no sure thing even before the political flare-up that killed the plan to turn over management of five major U.S. ports to Dubai Ports World, a company based in the United Arab Emirates. Now some of the same arguments used to thwart that deal are being used to attack Open Skies.

Opponents are aiming criticism not at Open Skies directly, but at a proposed change in rules that govern ownership of U.S. airlines. EU transport ministers aren't inclined to approve Open Skies unless the U.S. first relaxes restrictions on foreign control of U.S. airlines to better reflect foreign ownership rules for European airlines.

The House has approved a non-binding measure to delay the DOT proposal to relax foreign ownership rules. Separately, 163 House members have co-sponsored a bill to delay or veto the DOT rule change. The Senate has similar legislation pending. If enacted, Open Skies could be stalled indefinitely.

Tight restrictions on foreign control of U.S. airlines date back to the 1920s, when memories of World War I were still fresh. Even today, no U.S. airline is permitted to have foreign interests control more than 25% of its voting stock or more than one-third of its board of directors.

In addition, foreign investors may not currently exert “actual control” over any aspect of a U.S. airline by, for example, having a majority of votes on a board committee or a company president who is American but beholden to them.

U.S. citizens must control an airline's safety, security, routes, fares — everything. To invite foreign investment and to pave the way for Open Skies, the DOT now proposes changing this rule so foreign investors could exert control over purely “commercial” decisions, such as fares and routes. Only U.S. citizens would make decisions on safety and security, the proposal says. Limits on stock ownership and board control wouldn't change. Loosening foreign-control restrictions is not formally linked to Open Skies, but EU officials say one follows the other.

Daniel Calleja, air transport director for the European Commission, said in an interview from Spain that Americans don't face the same restrictions on investments in European airlines. Companies in the EU want “the possibility to invest in the American (aviation) market.” In Europe, foreigners can own up to 49% of voting stock.

If the U.S. refuses to loosen its rule on airlines, “The EU ministers would have to re-examine the situation, and I think there would be no agreement,” Calleja said.

Reaction in the USA to the foreign-control proposal has been swift and severe. Changing the U.S. rule would open the door to investment not only from Europe but also from anywhere else. Critics have not forgotten that U.S. oil company Unocal was nearly sold last year to CNOOC of China before a U.S. political backlash prompted withdrawal of the Chinese offer.

U.S. labor leaders fear foreign investment could threaten airline jobs at a time when tens of thousands of airline workers already have been laid off amid heavy losses and bankruptcies. U.S. pilots on trans-Atlantic flights could be replaced with foreign pilots, or more U.S. jet maintenance could be farmed out to foreign companies. Reps. James Oberstar, D-Minn., and Frank LoBiondo, R-N.J., sponsors of the House bill to block the easing of ownership restrictions, are sounding alarms about homeland security and national defense. During war, the Pentagon pays U.S. airlines to transport troops in the airlines' jets. Critics of the rule change say foreign investors might resist allowing aircraft use in a war they oppose.

“Allowing the daily operations of our airlines to be controlled by competing — and potentially unfriendly — foreign interests could significantly undermine homeland security,” LoBiondo says.

Critics also say the DOT is trying to make an end run around Congress by changing the rule administratively. “If they straight up asked Congress to amend the law, it would fail,” says Duane Woerth, national president of the Air Line Pilots Association.

But DOT officials say they have the legal authority to revise the ownership rules and are prepared to defend their actions in court.

“I am a little surprised by the ferocity” of the criticism, says Jeff Shane, the DOT undersecretary for policy. He chafes at opponents' likening the Dubai ports deal to foreign investment in airlines.

“The two cases are dramatically different,” he says. In the foreign-investment proposal, “We have walled off security issues entirely” from foreign influence.

Restrictions on trans-Atlantic air service are almost as old as those on foreign investment. In the final years of World War II, the U.S., with the world's largest commercial fleet, wanted to fly anywhere.

But at a 1944 meeting in Chicago, the United Kingdom and other nations refused, citing their competitive disadvantage. The countries agreed instead on a system of individual agreements between nations regulating air service.

Although the U.S. has since negotiated individual Open Skies agreements with 15 European countries, the United Kingdom, Ireland, Spain, Greece and several Eastern European countries are not among them. They still restrict service to protect their own interests.

For example, only two U.S. airlines, American and United, have the legal right to take off and land at London's Heathrow Airport, the world's busiest international gateway. United, however, is not allowed to fly from Heathrow to all of its U.S. hub airports: Heathrow-Denver flights are prohibited.

Open Skies would end that.

“Those would be significant openings,” says Michael Whitaker, vice president of United, which supports the changes. “It would get government out of those decisions.”

It would also lift restrictions on European airlines, allowing them to fly between the USA and European cities outside their home countries for the first time.

“Instead of just Alitalia flying to the U.S. from Rome, you might see Air France, KLM or Lufthansa offering non-stop service to the U.S.” from there, says Washington, D.C., aviation consultant Mark Gerchick.

Delta Air Lines has come out publicly for Open Skies, but No. 1 American Airlines has been quiet, as have others. Continental, the only U.S. airline to come out publicly against Open Skies, has gone so far as to threaten litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0024287

Continental President Jeff Smisek calls it “ludicrous” to think an airline could wall off safety and security decisions from a major foreign investor. And he says Open Skies would not be all its supporters promise. U.S. carriers already operate so many trans-Atlantic flights that “the only thing they really need in Europe is access to Heathrow,” he says.

Open Skies would technically make it possible for any U.S. airline to fly to Heathrow, but the agreement would not automatically make it possible to land there. Heathrow is so congested that takeoff and landing times must be owned. Although slots there may be bought and sold, they are costly.

If Open Skies is signed, Continental, which now flies to London's Gatwick Airport, would be locked out of the more popular Heathrow until it could buy slots and gate facilities there. Getting enough slots might take years.

Meanwhile, London-based British Airways could launch Heathrow service to Continental's home base of Houston if it wished. British Airways already flies between Heathrow and Continental's hub airport of Newark, N.J., but Continental can't compete. “If a U.S. carrier can't actually serve Heathrow, Open Skies is a worthless piece of paper,” Smisek says.

Shane acknowledges Heathrow slots are costly and may not be readily available. But, he says, “Anyone who thinks we can live with the status quo should think long and hard.”

The next move is up to the Bush administration. The DOT is scheduled to issue its decision on foreign control next month. The EU's transport ministers are scheduled to meet on Open Skies in June, when they could ratify it. U.S. and EU leaders could sign Open Skies in August.

Meanwhile, criticism in the USA shows no sign of relenting. “Some of the rhetoric has been embarrassing, even xenophobic,” United's Whitaker says.

Protect Our Heritage (WSJ)

By Stuart E. Eizenstat And Michael C. Maibach

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- There is a clear and present danger that Congress will use the recent Dubai Ports World controversy as a platform to fundamentally change the rules governing foreign investments in the U.S. -- and do so in ways that will scare away investments that are a lifeblood for a healthy economy.

We need to be clear-eyed about our vital national interests. Little direct foreign investment comes from the Middle East: 94% of foreign assets in America are owned by companies from the 25 industrialized, democratic OECD member countries, and 73% of all foreign investments in the U.S. are made by European companies. Our traditionally open investment climate has greatly benefited the American people. At a time when concerns are raised about the "outsourcing" of jobs abroad, foreign investment represents "in-sourcing," a vote of confidence by foreign firms and investors in the openness, flexibility and strength of the U.S. economy.

In-sourcing foreign companies employ more than five million Americans, some 5% of private industry employment. At a time when U.S. manufacturing employment is hemorrhaging, almost 35% of the jobs created by foreign firms in this country are in manufacturing. Foreign direct investment often saves a struggling American company, which might otherwise be shut down or moved abroad.

Foreign-owned U.S. operations account for 21% of our total exports and in 2004 plowed $45 billion in profits back into the American economy. Foreign-owned affiliates purchase 80% of their intermediate components from U.S. firms; they also spend $30 billion on R&D and over $100 billion on plant and equipment annually in the U.S. Moreover, we also need to keep the arteries of foreign investment open to fund our record current account trade deficit and compensate for our low savings rates; foreign capital flows keep long-term interest rates lower.

As Congress looks at changing the rules for foreign investment it should recognize that its actions will reverberate around the world. Today the European Union is facing its own foreign investment debate as France, Poland and Spain seek to check intra-European investments by their own EU fellow-members. Spurred by a takeover threat to the French yogurt industry from a U.S. company, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin has restricted foreign investment in 11 "strategic" sectors. Those on the other side of the Atlantic will be watching to see what the U.S. government does if the DP World controversy spills over into new anti-investment policies. Russia, already suspicious of foreign investment, may take comfort from U.S. restrictions.

In 1988, at the height of American concerns over Japanese investments, Congress passed the Exon-Florio Amendment to the Defense Production Act, empowering the president to block proposed foreign acquisitions that threatened national security. The president assigned the 12-agency Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. (CFIUS) to review such transactions. Since then, over 1,600 investments have been reviewed, and while the overwhelming majority have been approved, several have been withdrawn, either because CFIUS told the foreign company that they would recommend the president reject the acquisition on national security grounds, or because of congressional opposition, like the DP World deal. Many others were approved only with strict security agreements. The CFIUS process works well and has found a path that addresses national security concerns while maintaining an open investment climate.

The DP World case has spawned eight congressional hearings and some 20 bills. Even without formal changes, the controversy will lead to greater scrutiny of foreign investment, with more "split" decisions between agencies, and thus more decisions landing on the president's desk, subjecting him to case-by-case lobbying.

One set of bills would give Congress a greater role in overseeing individual investments by unprecedented, intrusive reporting requirements of all filings with CFIUS, including reports which identify disagreements by agencies. This could politicize foreign investment decisions, encourage agencies to go on record in opposition to foreign investment deals, and potentially lead to leaks of propriety information. But confidentiality is central to acquisitions. Another legislative initiative would transfer congressional jurisdiction over CFIUS from the Banking Committee, which has traditionally balanced security concerns with a recognition of the importance of foreign investment, to the Homeland Security Committee, tilting the balance away from investment.

Most troubling are proposals to require a mandatory 45-day investigation -- now reserved for only the most controversial deals with genuine national security concerns -- for all foreign investments, even by purely private firms, in "critical infrastructure." This would include a dozen sectors, from agriculture to telecoms and banking. The effect would be to chill foreign investment in some 25% of the U.S. economy: It might even have required the European firm that acquired Ben & Jerry's to go through an additional 45-day review! This is a virtual duplication of the French decree, and could lead to mirror-image bills by other countries, restricting U.S. investment in their countries. Increasing the time for approval of many CFIUS filings would drastically curtail the willingness of American firms to go through an acquisition process with any foreign firm, even from our closest friends and allies. Time is money; the longer a deal takes to approve, the more it costs and the more variables can affect the underlying transaction. Together these bills would threaten America's proud heritage of openness to foreign investment.

In an age of terrorism, foreign investments in U.S. assets must be carefully scrutinized for national security concerns. The current CFIUS process already provides such protection. More effective oversight and communication between the administration and Congress can be done under current law. Members of Congress from both political parties should avoid fundamentally changing the rules of foreign investment in ways that would create a less inviting climate for such investment at the very time we need more of it. If they do not, this would be an excellent choice for President Bush's first veto, because America must remain open for business.

Mr. Eizenstat, a former trade official in the Carter and Clinton administrations, is the American chairman of the European American Business Council (EABC), a group of 55 U.S. and European companies with transatlantic investments. Mr. Maibach is the president and CEO of the EABC.

Foreign Investment Needs (WT)

By John Castellani, Thomas Donohue And Todd Malan

The Washington Times, March 30, 2006

Today, reacting to the public concern about the Dubai Ports World transaction, the Senate Banking Committee will begin a legislative process in which very important national issues will be the focus -- none more than national security. But Congress needs to be careful as it moves forward in this area: National security, our economy and the health of many American's investment portfolios are at stake.

As leading business associations representing multinational companies based here and abroad, we have a strong interest in making sure the public and elected officials view the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) process as an effective national security tool. Our member companies will either have to comply with any changes to U.S. foreign investment policy or live with other nations' reaction to them.

Members of Congress are introducing legislation to "fix" the CFIUS system that many say created the storm in the first place. Some legislation focuses on refinements to CFIUS, while other bills go beyond to ban non-U.S. firms from entire sectors of our economy.

The most draconian proposal would ban non-U.S. companies' ownership of U.S. assets not only in seaports, but in energy, telecommunications, financial services and other industries viewed as "critical infrastructure." The bill would force companies based in countries that are among our staunchest allies, such as Great Britain, to sell their U.S. operations within a five-year period, the equivalent of a fire sale.

Why is it a bad idea to restrict foreign direct investment in the United States, provided it does not endanger our national security interests? Let's start with jobs. Restricting foreign direct investment would put at risk the jobs of 5.3 million Americans employed by foreign companies in the United States.

Next, let's look at the American investor's stock portfolio. Americans now hold more than $2.9 trillion in shares of foreign companies. For instance, cell phone maker Nokia may be based in Helsinki, but 40 percent of its shares are owned in America. The forced sale of U.S. assets by foreign-owned companies would hurt U.S. pensions, mutual funds and investors through falling stock prices and lower investment returns.

Foreign direct investment is also critical to the success of our capital markets, which provide the "seed corn" essential to the creation of new businesses and jobs, innovations and ideas. Our growing economy and robust capital markets attract more foreign investment than any other single country: more than $1.5 trillion. Shut off that spigot and our competitive edge and mighty economic engine will run dry.

And just think of how our trading partners would respond. While nearly 90 percent of U.S. company investments on an annual basis are made in this country, the fact is we invest more in their countries than they do in ours -- more than $2 trillion. Closing our markets would lead to retaliatory actions that would deeply harm the U.S. economy.

Clearly some changes are warranted. While we know the CFIUS process to be extremely rigorous, there is room for improvement. Congress was clearly unimpressed with the quality and depth of communication from the administration. To remedy this, there should be a focused process for dialogue between CFIUS and the committees of jurisdiction in Congress. Also, CFIUS should be especially alert in the case of wholly state-owned enterprises. One only has to look at Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's political use of CITGO Petroleum to see the reasoning for the current law's heightened review of state-controlled enterprises.

However, a congressional "veto" over CFIUS decisions would inevitably lead to politically motivated interference in a national security process. This would depart from every other administrative procedure in law regarding specific commercial transactions. Congress does not have a procedure for second-guessing anti-trust reviews, anti-dumping decisions or patent and trademark awards. It should not start here.

Nor should Congress tinker with the law's flexible definition of national security or, worse, expand CFIUS' mission to include "economic security." One of the strengths of the current law is its flexibility to adjust with the times: The Internet was barely known in 1988 when the law was written, but CFIUS now reviews most cross-border telecom transactions because the Internet backbone is part of critical communications infrastructure. Including "economic security" in the definition of the law is protectionism masquerading as national security policy. This charade emulates the very worst of other nations' policies.

As Congress debates how to respond to the Dubai deal, it should keep the Hippocratic oath in mind: First, do no harm. America enjoys the world's strongest economy, the most open and transparent markets, and one of the highest standards of living in the world, thanks in no small measure to international investment. Let's not put those benefits at risk now.

Belarus Plans To Charge Defeated Candidate Who Led Protest (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

MOSCOW, March 29 — Prosecutors in Belarus said Wednesday that they would bring criminal charges against a defeated presidential candidate who led an antigovernment march last week, and that they were considering lesser charges against a second candidate who organized a rally.

The announcement, during which prosecutors also said the police had arrested more than 500 demonstrators last week, continued the crackdown on the opposition to President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, who is often called Europe's last dictator.

It was also an unmistakable snub to the West. The United States and the European Union have demanded the release of the candidate, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, and of demonstrators arrested last week during peaceful protests against Mr. Lukashenko's re-election, which the opposition says was a fraud.

Mr. Kazulin, who was arrested Saturday as he led a march toward a detention center where opposition members were being held, faces charges of organizing group actions and hooliganism, Belarus's federal prosecutor said, according to the Belapan news agency. The first charge could carry a prison term of up to six years.

Mr. Kazulin received 2.2 percent of the officially tabulated vote on March 19.

In an interview Friday, he said an honest count would show he received roughly a third of the votes cast. The next day, he led a group of demonstrators who were attacked by an elite riot police unit, SOBR, which has been widely accused of human rights abuses.

His wife, Irina Kazulin, said the charges were retaliation for his daring to challenge Mr. Lukashenko's authoritarian rule. "It is personal revenge," she said by telephone. "It is purely a political case."

DOJ_NMG_0024290

Ms. Kazulin also said her husband had been kicked and beaten, and had a back injury that had not been examined by a doctor. The prosecutor said Mr. Kazulin had not filed a complaint. Neither claim could be independently verified.

Prosecutors also said they were considering charges against Aleksandr Milinkevich, who received 6.1 percent in the official vote count and who has called for peaceful acts of public assembly. The potential charge, disturbing public order, could carry a sentence of 15 days.

Mr. Milinkevich, in a telephone interview as he prepared for meetings in Poland, said that he expected to be jailed, and that the announcement on Wednesday was part of a mounting campaign against him. "At first, it is usually a P.R. action," he said. "It is only beginning."

He added that the government's pressure was counterproductive.

"I think they would very much like me to emigrate, fearing imprisonment, but I am not going to do that," he said. "The more repression they bring against the protesters and the organizers of protests, the more protests they will have. They are losing their supporters."

The United States warned Belarus's prosecutors not to proceed with charges.

In a telephone interview, David J. Kramer, the deputy assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said officials involved in these cases risked personal sanctions in the West.

The European Union is expected to discuss sanctions against Belarussian officials when foreign ministers of its 25 nations meet on April 10. The United States, which has its own process for applying sanctions, including bans on travel and asset freezes, has been adding names of Belarussian officials on an almost daily basis since last week, Mr. Kramer said.

Gas Deal Roils Ukraine And May Have Cut Leader's Vote (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, March 30, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, March 29 — The official residence of the managing director of a company now set to control Ukraine's supply of natural gas is a one-story, clapboard house in a tumbledown village bordering a defunct collective farm outside Moscow. A dirty rug covers the floor, a bare light bulb hangs from the ceiling and scraps of plywood plug gaps in the wall.

Olga P. Sakharova, 49, lives there with her mother and a German fox terrier called Lyusa and has never heard of the director, Oleg A. Palchikov, who operates a business worth $7 billion a year.

"What boss would want to live here?" Ms. Sakharova asked, surprised to learn that she occupied one of the few known addresses of any of the executives of the shadowy gas trading company involved in a deal between Ukraine and Russia that continues to roil politics here in Kiev, nearly 400 miles away.

The company, RosUkrEnergo, became a broker in a deal to resolve a New Year's confrontation between Russia and Ukraine over the price of natural gas — a deal that has prompted accusations of corruption and almost certainly contributed to President Viktor A. Yushchenko's poor showing in parliamentary elections last Sunday, when his party finished a distant third.

The mysteries surrounding the company — ranging from the identity of its owners and the circumstances of its selection, to even the places its executives live and work — reflect the post-Soviet combustion of politics and business that still afflicts Ukraine despite the significant progress that Mr. Yushchenko and his allies have made in making the country a freer, more democratic society.

Yulia V. Tymoshenko, Mr. Yushchenko's erstwhile ally in the mass protests that swept him to the presidency in 2004, campaigned fiercely against the deal, citing it as an example of the corruption and untrustworthiness of the leadership of Mr. Yushchenko's party, Our Ukraine.

With her party having won significantly more votes than Mr. Yushchenko's, according to nearly complete results announced Wednesday, she has now claimed the right to lead the coalition in Parliament representing the reformist, Western-leaning forces who took part in what came to be known as the Orange Revolution.

And she has promised that one of her first acts as prime minister, should she return to the post she held for the first eight months of Mr. Yushchenko's presidency, would be "by all means" to scuttle the deal and RosUkrEnergo's part in it.

"These are the standards preached by Kuchmaism," she said of the deal in an interview on Wednesday, referring to the scandal-tainted presidency of Ukraine's previous leader, Leonid D. Kuchma.

Ms. Tymoshenko's fierce opposition to the deal echoes her zeal in revisiting scandalous privatizations that took place during Mr. Kuchma's tenure, and could complicate efforts to reunite the coalition that swept Mr. Yushchenko to power.

Already, Mr. Yushchenko and his aides have met with his bitter rival, Viktor F. Yanukovich, whose party won the largest bloc of votes, 31 percent, raising speculation that he would seek a parliamentary alliance that would exclude Ms. Tymoshenko. Mr. Yushchenko's party announced Wednesday that it would not commit to any coalition until at least April 7.

DOJ_NMG_0024291

Reopening the deal could provoke a new conflict with Russia over the supply of natural gas, only months after the New Year's showdown, which resulted in a disruption of supplies across Europe, deeply rattling countries that rely heavily on Russian and Central Asian gas that passes through Ukraine's pipelines.

"Any agreement that is unstable is one that is undesirable from the point of view of Europe," said Thane Gustafson, a senior analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates.

The deal's critics say the instability comes from the murky nature of the arrangement, which granted substantial control over Ukraine's gas market to a little-known company with links to Russia's state energy monopoly, Gazprom, and unknown investors.

Even now, nearly three months after the deal was announced, the ownership and operations of RosUkrEnergo remain murky. Registered in Zug, Switzerland, it is owned half by Gazprom and half by Centragas, an umbrella corporation run by Austria's Raiffeisen bank for a group of investors whom the bank will not identify, despite pressure from American and European officials.

Officials in Russia and Ukraine have accused one another of having beneficiaries in the company and have provided contradictory accounts of who suggested that RosUkrEnergo be included in the first place.

"This is the Ukrainian part and you need to ask them," President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia told journalists earlier this month. Mr. Yushchenko, by his own accounting, knows no more. "I have personally turned several times to the Russian side to receive this information," he said at a news conference earlier this month. "Unfortunately, as of today, I do not have any information about the founders of this structure."

Executives of the company, some of whom also work for Gazprom itself, declined to discuss the matter in detail. Aleksandr I. Medvedev, the director of Gazprom's export arm, Gazexport, and one of eight members of the board of RosUkrEnergo, has denied knowing the unknown investors.

Konstantin A. Chuychinko, the head of Gazprom's legal department and a longtime associate of Mr. Putin, is a co-director of RosUkrEnergo with Mr. Palchikov. The head of Gazprom's banking subsidiary, Andrei I. Akimov, also sits on the board.

Little else is known about the company. There is an office of a company called RosUkrEnergo on Saksagansky Street here in Kiev, but it operates a series of gas stations, and according to a woman there, has no connection to the company with its name.

Wolfgang Putschek, a member of RosUkrEnergo's board representing Centragas, said in a telephone interview that the company had an office in Moscow, but he referred questions about it to a public relations agency in London, Merlin PR.

Michael Rummel, a spokesman for the agency, could not provide an address for any office, and said officials would not comment. At the same time, he defended the company's role. Only a company like RosUkrEnergo, he said, could handle the complicated transactions necessary to supply natural gas from Russia and Turkmenistan to Ukraine and onward to Romania and Hungary.

The vacuum of information has led to reports, so far unsubstantiated, that RosUkrEnergo's beneficiaries have links to Mr. Yushchenko's top advisers. Mr. Yushchenko himself was forced to deny any involvement by his brother, Petro, who has been involved in the gas-trading business.

Although much remains unclear, there is little doubt the deal has weakened Mr. Yushchenko politically, tarnishing his reputation as an uncorrupted reformer. Mychailo Wynnyckyj, a professor of sociology at the University of Kiev-Mohyla Academy, attributed the electoral failure of Mr. Yushchenko — and Ms. Tymoshenko's success — to the gas deal.

"Yushchenko came to power on the whole idea of transparency," he said. "And he was pushing a deal that obviously had some corrupt aspect to it."

Date For Compulsory ID Cards In Britain Put Back To 2010 (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 29, 2006

The target date for compulsory ID cards in Britain was pushed back to January 2010 when the House of Lords accepted a compromise deal with Prime Minister Tony Blair's government.

By a vote of 287-60, the upper chamber of parliament agreed that Britons renewing or applying for a passport will not be obliged to take out an ID card as well in 2008, as originally proposed in the Identity Cards Bill.

Those people, however, will nevertheless have to have their personal details included on a National Identity Register -- something that Britain has never maintained before.

"The amendment preserves the integrity of the National Identity Register by ensuring that everyone who applies for or renews a passport or other designated document has their biometric information and other identity details placed on the register," said Home Office Minister Andy Burnham.

DOJ_NMG_0024292

"However, it also goes towards meeting the concerns of those who have argued that the card itself should not be compulsory at this stage, by allowing those who apply for or renew their passport before 1 January 2010 to 'opt-out' of being issued the ID card itself, even though their identity details will be entered onto the register."

Unlike its continental European neighbours, Britain has never had a mandatory ID card scheme other than in wartime, but the idea has gathered momentum since the deadly July 2005 suicide bombings in London.

Critics of the scheme have argued that it would be next to useless as a weapon in the war against international terrorism and that it infringes cherished civil liberties.

In a vote on May 14, the House of Commons handed Blair its approval for the principle of linking the issue of biometric ID cards to passport applications and renewals -- a political bone of contention with the Lords.

Silvio's World As Italy Votes, Golden Career Of Berlusconi Is At Crossroads (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn

The Wall Street Journal, March 30, 2006

ROME -- When Italy's prime minister, Silvio Berlusconi, addressed a joint meeting of the U.S. Congress earlier this month, he recounted how he was inspired by a boyhood visit to the graves of American soldiers who had died in the fight to liberate Italy from fascist oppression.

Minutes later, in an informal gathering with lawmakers, he hailed another American icon that guided him in his youth: Playboy. Mr. Berlusconi said he would rent out a copy, sent to him by an uncle, at 10-minute intervals to classmates at his Milan high school run by Salesian monks. "Of course," he said, "we were still good Catholics."

From his start with the monks, Mr. Berlusconi went on to one of the most glorious records of success of any man in Europe. Time and again he has broken into fields that in Italy had been the domain of an established elite -- from construction to television, sports to politics.

Along the way, he has amassed a fortune of close to $12 billion, almost twice that of Rupert Murdoch, mostly from his commercial television network, Mediaset SpA. He owns one of the most successful soccer teams in Europe, A.C. Milan, and he is the longest-serving prime minister in the history of the Italian republic. In his spare time, he has created a world-class collection of exotic flowers and cactuses, which he tends himself on his estate in Sardinia.

"It's not a superiority complex; it's an objective fact," he said once during a news conference aboard a cruise ship he rented for an election campaign. "No one is as valuable as Berlusconi."

Yet the man with the golden touch has proved a surprisingly leaden leader during his five years in power. Even on this sluggish continent, Italy is an underperformer. Growth last year was zero. Though nominally a free-market conservative, Mr. Berlusconi has done little to break monopolies, including those that keep Italians paying among the highest energy prices in Europe and impose steep fees for opening a business.

His detractors say adroit manipulation of his media empire explains his political success. "He has represented a giant step backward for democracy," says former Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi, who is running against Mr. Berlusconi in national elections on April 9-10. Critics say Mr. Berlusconi's legislative achievements are few because he has spent so much energy pushing laws to help himself avoid criminal charges from bribery to false bookkeeping.

Mr. Berlusconi has said it is a "disgrace" for anyone to suggest that his government has passed laws to benefit him personally. He denies wrongdoing in the criminal cases against him. His office didn't respond to requests for an interview.

Now, a few months short of his 70th birthday -- though he looks much younger after a face-lift and two hair transplants -- Mr. Berlusconi faces an uphill re-election battle. Polls say his coalition trails Mr. Prodi's by five percentage points. Mr. Berlusconi has been stumping throughout the country insisting that the economy is booming. Surely, he says, a nation that has more cellphones than people must be called prosperous. He also cites laws that made it easier to hire workers and overhauled the bloated pension system.

But businessmen and shopkeepers, once his core constituency, have begun to tire of his ebullient promises. "Considering all he has been able to achieve in his life I had expected much more," says Lucia Lolli, who runs a small stationery store in Rome. "I'm profoundly disappointed."

Should he lose, it may be the last great act in one of the most fascinating political careers ever seen in the land of the Medicis and Mussolini. Yet Mr. Berlusconi has often succeeded against seemingly unbeatable odds. In both business and politics, he has understood the market better than his adversaries.

He has long ignored all boundaries, whether between business and politics, between the appropriate or inappropriate, or between personal and public. A pioneer of commercial television in Italy in the early 1980s, Mr. Berlusconi cultivated a close friendship with Socialist Prime Minister Bettino Craxi, whose government provided crucial support that allowed his television network to stay on the air. In 1994, when Italy's political order was collapsing under a bribery scandal, he used the money, men and means of his advertising company to create a new party, Forza Italia, or "Go Italy." Two months later, his coalition won parliamentary elections.

Even his personal schedule knows few bounds. He often sleeps four hours a night and schedules appointments for 1 a.m., associates say. Most Saturdays, he travels to his villa in Sardinia, where a personal musician is frequently on hand to play the guitar as Mr. Berlusconi sings songs of his own composition. On Sundays, he flies to Milan to watch his soccer team play. On Mondays, he's back in Rome in his rented apartment in a 17th-century palazzo.

One of Their Own

Despite his glamorous lifestyle, many Italians still perceive him as one of their own, a regular guy. He is prone to gaffes, tells bawdy jokes in public and suggests it's acceptable to cheat on one's taxes, or one's wife. When he was asked in a recent radio interview whether he is faithful to his second wife, Veronica, Mr. Berlusconi answered: "I've frequently been faithful." In a speech two years ago to Italy's tax police, he said people shouldn't "feel guilty" about evading tax rates that were too high. On the campaign trail this week, he sparked a minor diplomatic incident when, trying to make a joke about the left-wing opposition, he said Communists in China would boil babies for fertilizer.

"He's not a snob. He's on the same wavelength as the average Italian," says Fedele Confalonieri, Mr. Berlusconi's best friend from grade school, who is chairman of the Mediaset broadcaster and a confidant. "He's a bit of a braggart, though."

On a recent television show, Mr. Berlusconi said "only Napoleon has done more" than he has as prime minister. Two days later, as newspapers poked fun at his hubris, he corrected himself: "I'm the Jesus Christ of politics, a victim, patient. I put up with everything. I sacrifice myself for all."

Mr. Berlusconi dismisses the potential conflicts of interest that outrage his critics by noting that he has relinquished day-to-day control of his media empire to two of his children. The prime minister owns Mondadori SpA, Italy's largest book and magazine publisher. Mediaset is by far the dominant force in commercial television, controlling 63% of the advertising market. Mr. Berlusconi's brother, Paolo, controls one influential daily newspaper and his wife controls another.

Since entering politics, Mr. Berlusconi has accumulated a long list of criminal indictments, any one of which might have forced a lesser man into retirement. The charges have included bribing tax police and judges, false accounting and illegal donations to political parties. On some he was acquitted or the statute of limitations expired before a trial was completed. On others, he was initially convicted and even sentenced to prison, but the convictions were overturned on appeal.

Judges had to throw out charges against him alleging false accounting after Mr. Berlusconi's government pushed through a law decriminalizing the offense. Parliament also approved a law that granted the prime minister and other top state officials immunity from prosecution, even for crimes committed before taking office. The law was later deemed unconstitutional.

Mr. Berlusconi has boldly turned his weaknesses into advantages. He claims to be the victim of communist prosecutors and a left-wing media conspiracy. Many in Italy believe him. These themes are echoed frequently in some of his magazines and on some of the news shows on his television network.

On the campaign trail, he often stages show-stealing moments that turn the tables on his adversaries. Earlier this month, he arrived unexpectedly at the annual conference of Italy's powerful business lobby, strutted onto the stage and took the microphone to deliver a blistering attack on the nation's leading newspapers. "Don't believe the newspapers that speak of decline," he shouted, traversing the stage and pumping his fists. "Where is this crisis? It exists only on the left and in their newspapers."

He boasts of building a strong alliance with the U.S. during the war on terror, in contrast to France and Germany. The Italian military has been a key component of allied forces in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Winning Over Skeptics

Mr. Berlusconi's charisma often wins over skeptics. Before meetings, he studies up on the personal details of someone he's scheduled to meet. He is generous with friends and allies. Last Christmas, he gave digital cameras to the 72 male senators in his Forza Italia party and bracelets to the five female senators. The 166 Forza Italia members of the lower house received hand-held computers.

Emilio Fede, a former top anchor with state broadcaster RAI, joined one of Mr. Berlusconi's television stations in 1989 after a visit to the tycoon's 145-room estate in Arcore, just outside Milan. Mr. Berlusconi acquired the villa after its previous owner, a marquis, shot his wife and her lover before turning the gun on himself there in 1970.

Mr. Berlusconi gave Mr. Fede and his wife a tour and sang them a song from the piano. They traveled by helicopter to Milan's soccer stadium to watch Mr. Berlusconi's A.C. Milan beat A.S. Roma. Later, in his office, Mr. Berlusconi slipped Mr. Fede a piece of paper with a handwritten salary figure. Mr. Fede accepted and has been one of the prime minister's most loyal fans ever since, earning him the nickname "Fido" in the media. On his office wall are pictures of himself with Mr. Berlusconi. Mr. Fede points to one: "In this one, we're dressed alike."

Mr. Berlusconi sums up his own life story in "Una Storia Italiana," a 129-page photo-filled booklet sent to every voter before the last elections in 2001. There, he describes himself as a typical Italian born to a family of modest means in Milan before World War II. But he says he had big dreams and the good fortune to have been born under a lucky star. The book includes his horoscope.

His talents emerged at an early age, he says. In high school, he would always finish his work first, then help his classmates -- for a fee, according to the book. He earned extra money during university by singing and playing guitar in bands and on cruise ships with Mr. Confalonieri, who accompanied him on piano. In 1961, during university, Mr. Berlusconi forged another lasting friendship. Though he usually sold copies of his lecture notes, he lent a copy free to fellow student Marcello Dell'Utri, who had come to Milan from Sicily, Mr. Dell'Utri recalls.

For many years, Mr. Dell'Utri served his friend as chief executive of Publitalia 80, the advertising arm of Mediaset, and later became a senator in the Forza Italia party. In December 2004 he was convicted of having contacts with elements of the Mafia. Prosecutors accused him of acting as a go-between in alleged dealings between Sicilian organized crime and Mr. Berlusconi's business empire. Mr. Dell'Utri has also been convicted of tax fraud stemming from his role as an executive in Mr. Berlusconi's companies. He has appealed the conviction on Mafia association and calls the accusations politically motivated.

In 2004, Mr. Berlusconi appointed Mr. Dell'Utri to the Council of Europe, an international body, based in Strasbourg, France, that promotes peace and democracy. The post gives Mr. Dell'Utri protection from arrest and from serving prison time.

Mr. Dell'Utri describes his friend as "a person who does not have limits." One day, 40 years ago, Mr. Berlusconi took Mr. Dell'Utri to a foggy field outside Milan. "I'm going to build a city here," he recalls Mr. Berlusconi saying. "You're crazy," answered Mr. Dell'Utri. That field became the site of Milano 2, a revolutionary housing project in Italy that replicated an American suburb. The Milanese middle class snapped up the apartments, which were built around a duck pond, restaurants and boutiques.

Shortly after the Milano 2 project, Mr. Berlusconi sensed that television could be his next big moneymaker. In the 1970s, Italian television was dominated by the stodgy state broadcaster, RAI, which didn't start broadcasting until the afternoon, kept tight limits on how many commercials aired and handpicked which companies could advertise. Mr. Berlusconi believed there was a fortune to be made if he could find a way break RAI's monopoly.

He devised a clever strategy to sidestep a law that blocked the creation of private national TV networks. He bought up local broadcast rights around the country, and then had all his local stations broadcast the same program at the same time. This allowed advertisers that had been shut out of RAI to reach a nationwide audience.

Mr. Berlusconi's programming was geared toward the masses, with soap operas for stay-at-home mothers and cartoons for children. But in 1984, judges in Turin and Rome, calling the national network illegal, ordered Mr. Berlusconi's network to broadcast only local content. Mr. Berlusconi responded by pulling all his programming off the air in those cities in protest.

'Revolt of the Smurfs'

That sparked what came to be called the "Revolt of the Smurfs," named after the cartoon show broadcast on his network. Many children complained to their parents when the station suddenly went dark. Angry families demanded that the broadcasts be resumed. Mr. Berlusconi appealed to the prime minister, Mr. Craxi. The leader, who would later serve as best man at Mr. Berlusconi's wedding to his second wife, signed a government decree that allowed the stations back on the air.

Mr. Berlusconi's network soon stole audience share from RAI, while dominating its nascent private competitors. One struggling rival private station, Rete 4, tried to gain an audience by spending heavily on the rights for the miniseries "Winds of War," starring Robert Mitchum. For much less money, Mr. Berlusconi's station aired "The Thorn Birds," a miniseries in which Richard Chamberlain plays a priest who frolics with a young woman. "The Thorn Birds" destroyed "Winds of War" in the ratings, almost driving Rete 4 out of business until Mr. Berlusconi bought it.

As a businessman, say associates, Mr. Berlusconi could obsess over the look of a new show, while paying little attention to the financial details of his business empire. "I could never get him to look at more than a page of figures," says Franco Tatò, who has served as chief executive of Fininvest, Mr. Berlusconi's holding company. "But he can follow the rollout of a new product in minute detail."

During the Gulf War in 1991, Mr. Berlusconi called up Mr. Fede, the anchorman, at 5 a.m. one day. He complained that the marker used on the previous evening's newscast to highlight newspaper headlines was the wrong color. "He told me, 'Don't use a yellow highlighter, use a green one,' " Mr. Fede says.

Though Mr. Berlusconi's television venture was popular with viewers, it ran up debt equivalent to more than $2.4 billion by 1993. The entire business empire was at risk, recalls Mr. Tatò. He says he tried to warn his boss about the risk of banks closing their credit lines, to no avail. "Having so much debt is a good thing. It means that the banks trust me," retorted Mr. Berlusconi, according to Mr. Tatò, adding, "Besides, I'm lucky."

Around the same time, Italy's political order was collapsing under a bribery scandal in which Mr. Berlusconi would later be implicated. Mr. Craxi became one of the chief targets and later fled to Tunisia to avoid prosecution. Mr. Berlusconi had relied heavily on Mr. Craxi's support to keep his television network running smoothly and feared repercussions if a left-wing coalition dominated by Italy's former communist party took power.

In late 1993 and early 1994, Mr. Berlusconi summoned top executives and editors from his television stations and print publications to his Milan estate to discuss strategy. His idea: create a new political party with himself at the helm. "It seemed absurd to us," says Federico Orlando, who was deputy editor of the Milan daily Il Giornale, which Mr. Berlusconi owned at the time. But Mr. Berlusconi's understanding of the market proved to be spot-on. "The voters were exactly as he understood them to be, not as we thought they were," Mr. Orlando says.

Mr. Berlusconi came up with the name Forza Italia, after the popular soccer chant, "Go Italy." He wrote the lyrics to the party anthem, say several colleagues. He also designed an intensive training course for prospective Forza Italia candidates, many of whom were sales executives in Publitalia. Known as "the kit," it included a necktie, videos and a manual with advice on politics and grooming.

Just as the bribery scandal had decimated Italy's traditional governing parties, Mr. Berlusconi set out to create a new movement that appealed to a consumer-savvy middle class. "It was as if all the products on the shelf that people had used for years suddenly disappeared," says Mr. Dell'Utri, his old friend. "He invented the political equivalent of the formula for Coca-Cola."

On Jan. 26, 1994, in an address from his Milan estate broadcast on his television stations, Mr. Berlusconi announced his candidacy, promising "a new Italian miracle." He was voted into office two months later.

Fading Fortune

His good fortune didn't last long. In November, while presiding over a conference on international crime in Naples, Mr. Berlusconi received his first formal notice from prosecutors that he was under criminal investigation for alleged corruption. One of the parties in his governing alliance jumped ship, and his government collapsed after only seven months in office.

Many assumed that Mr. Berlusconi, who had promised to bring a new, clean type of politics to scandal-tarred Italy, was finished. But they underestimated his resilience. "He's an incredible fighter. He's the only politician capable of completely reversing his fortunes with one grand coup de théâtre," says Stefano Folli, a political commentator for the business daily Il Sole/24 Ore.

Indictments against Mr. Berlusconi continued to roll in during the 1990s, but each time he would describe it as fresh evidence that he was the victim of a political witch hunt. His battle against prosecutors became a central plank of his campaign in 2001 parliamentary elections, along with lowering taxes and creating new jobs. He won convincingly and once again became prime minister.

To date, Mr. Berlusconi has been the target of more than 90 investigations and he has been indicted more than 10 times. This month, prosecutors asked that he be indicted for allegedly bribing a British lawyer, David Mills, to make favorable testimony in a case. Mr. Berlusconi said the timing of the prosecutors' request, on the eve of elections, was further proof that they were out to get him.

At his annual year-end news conference in December, Mr. Berlusconi summed up his last term. "I'm convinced that no one in the history of the republic has ever done what we did," he said, "and that no one could have done better."

The Morning Update

In Cancun, Mexico, President Bush will meet with both President Vicente Fox of Mexico and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada. The leaders will discuss the Security and Prosperity Partnership (SPP), begun in March 2005 to strengthen North American security and competitiveness in the global economy. The leaders will also meet bilaterally.

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Discusses Freedom's Progress In Iraq. "President Bush yesterday blamed sectarian violence in Iraq on Saddam Hussein and his legacy of oppression, but said freedom and democracy will win if all the opposing political factions can put aside their differences and form a government. ... 'Today, some Americans ask whether removing Saddam caused the divisions and instability we're now seeing. In fact, much of the animosity and violence we now see is the legacy of instability we're now seeing. In fact, much of the animosity and violence we now see is the legacy of Saddam Hussein,' <http://www.washingtontimes.com/national/20060329-104958-7953r.htm> Mr. Bush said. Iraq, he added, is 'a nation that is physically and emotionally scarred by three decades of Saddam's tyranny, and these wounds will take time to heal.'" Secretary Rice Says The United Nations Is Sending An Important Message To Iran. "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said a U.N. demand for curbs on Iran's nuclear work showed Tehran's isolation and said Thursday's big-power talks should also cover 'broader concerns' over its behavior. Speaking to reporters en route to Berlin, where the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany will discuss what to do next about Iran, Rice said the U.N. statement agreed on Wednesday sent an important message to Tehran. 'The presidential statement is an international voice to the Iranians that they need to suspend their (uranium enrichment) activities, return to negotiations and that they continue to be isolated, <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060330/pl_nm/nuclear_iran_usa _dc;_ylt=Ao87 DK7qOhjRy.wN8c5fv6Gs0NUE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3OXIzMDMzBHNlYwM3MDM-> ' said Rice." Nasdaq Hits Highest Close In More Than Five Years. "The Nasdaq composite has been strangely absent from the rally the past few weeks as the Dow Jones industrials and Standard & Poor's 500 set multiple 2006 highs. But that changed Wednesday, when the tech-packed Nasdaq powered up 33.32 points, or 1.4%, to 2337.78 for its highest close in more than five years <http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/m oney/20060330/1b_nasdaq30.art.htm > . Not only did the percentage gain Wednesday trounce the Dow's 0.5% gain and the Standard &

Poor's 500's 0.7% rise, but it put the Nasdaq up 6% this year with two days left in the first quarter." (Matt Krantz, "Nasdaq Ready To Rumble Ahead," USA Today, 3/30/06)

To Help Ensure American Competitiveness, The President Is Urging Greater Accountability In Teaching Science. "President Bush, quietly floating a plan with big implications, wants schools to face consequences for falling short in science, just as they do in reading and math. The president's proposal would require schools to make yearly progress in science, adding a third high-stakes subject to a No Child Left Behind law that has thousands of schools scrambling to meet federal goals. ...
'Given our philosophy that what gets measured gets done, this would be a natural way to emphasize the importance of science <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060329/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush_science_1&printer=1;_ylt=An39dbAv7ty01b8y5w2.H6QGw_IE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE-> ,' said Assistant Education Secretary Tom Luce." (Ben Feller, "Bush Wants Schools To Progress In Science," The Associated Press, 3/29/06)

President Bush Meets With Nigerian President Obasanjo. "President Bush said Wednesday he's confident that Charles Taylor, a former warlord charged with brutal crimes during Sierra Leone's civil war, will be tried in an international tribunal. 'I think he is headed for where he belongs, which is trial,' Bush said. ... 'The fact that Charles Taylor will be brought to justice in a court of law will help Liberia and is a signal, Mr. President, of your deep desire for there to be peace in your neighborhood,' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060329/ap_on_go_pr_wh/us_nigeria&printer=1;_ylt=Al1pv4q8KeFW0vPba7iVKCIGw_IE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE>

Appeal to block release of Abu Ghraib photos dropped: Pentagon

WASHINGTON, March 29, 2006 (AFP) - The US government has dropped an appeal of a court's order to release a set of 74 digital images and three videos that documented prisoner abuse at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison, a Pentagon spokesman said Wednesday.

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) had sued the government seeking the official release of Abu Ghraib images and videos collected by Sergeant Joseph Darby, many of which were recently posted by Salom.com, an Internet news site.

"The government's attempts to shield evidence of its own misconduct from public scrutiny ultimately proved to be futile," said Amrit Singh, an ACLU\l "l" attorney, said in a statement.

"These images speak volumes about the responsibility borne by high-ranking officials for the widespread abuse of detainees held in United States custody abroad," Singh said.

The release of graphic photos in 2004 showing US military guards abusing detainees at the Iraqi prison sparked a public relations disaster for the US government.

Under an agreement reached Tuesday with the ACLU\l "l", the Pentagon will authenticate the images already posted by Salom.com that were from the Darby collection, said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

It also will release in redacted form any images that were not posted on Salom.com, but which were among the 74 Darby still images and three videos whose release was sought by the ACLU\l "l", Whitman said.

"The government ... dropped their appeal yesterday and stipulated that some of the photos on the website were from the Darby collection," Whitman said.

He said the US attorney's office in New York will send a letter to the ACLU\l "l" identifying those images posted on the Salom.com website that are from the Darby collection which were the subject of the ACLU's\l "l" Freedom of Information Act law suit\l "l".

"I expect the letter to be delivered soon," Whitman said.

He said he did not know when any additional photographs would be released.

The ACLU\l "l" said they were to be released within a week of the court's formal dismissal of the appeal.

The remaining photographs will be released after they have been redacted to protect the identity of US military servicemembers depicted in them, Whitman said.

The Pentagon spokesman said the government had opposed the release of the images on the grounds that "they could reasonably be expected to endanger the lives and physical safety of military personnel and civilians.

"Clearly a number of these images had made it to the public domain even before this particular online news organization put additional photographs up," he said.

"So there is a degree of exposure with some of these photographs -- I'm talking about these 74 -- and I would expect the position of the Department (of Defense) with respect to additional photographs would remain the same," he said.

Military trial hope for Hicks

Nick Papps

ACCUSED terrorist David Hicks may be closer to escaping a military trial after the US Supreme Court expressed concerns about their legality.

In a fiery hearing yesterday, one judge said that if President George W. Bush had the power to hold the trials, there was nothing to stop him from going to a US town and arresting any foreigner and denying him a trial in a US civil court.

Justice Stephen Breyer said: ``If the President can do this, well, then he can set up commissions to go to Toledo, and in Toledo pick up an alien and not have any trial at all except before that special commission."

Osama bin Laden's former driver, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, who is imprisoned in Guantanamo Bay with Hicks and has been charged with conspiracy, is appealing against the legality of the military commissions, arguing they breach the Geneva Convention.

If his appeal is upheld, it would mean none of the 490 suspected terrorists held at Guantanamo Bay could be tried before military commissions.

Their cases would likely be sent to civilian courts.

Yesterday, government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" argued that Mr Bush had the power to convene military commissions, which have been held in the past at times of war as war crimes tribunals.

But Justice Breyer questioned the argument by Solicitor-General Paul Clement.

``You want to try a war crime. You want to say this is a war crimes tribunal,'' Justice Breyer said.

``One, this is not a war -- at least not an ordinary war.

``Two, it's not a war crime, because that doesn't fall under international law.

``And three, it's not a war crime tribunal or commission, because (there is) no emergency.''

US government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" also argued that the recently passed Detainee Treatment Act, which severely restricts detainees' access to US courts, also prevented Hamdan from mounting a legal challenge to the commissions in the Supreme Court.

That argument was contested by several Supreme Court judges.

The Supreme Court is expected to make its ruling in June or July.

Bill Would Speed Challenge to Surveillance

By THE NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON, March 29 — Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, introduced a bill Wednesday that would put lawsuits challenging the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program on a fast track to the Supreme Court.

With Congress and the Bush administration at odds over the legality of eavesdropping on Americans without court warrants, the legislation could produce a timely ruling by the court on the program's constitutionality, Mr. Schumer said.

"We have a system of checks and balances," he said, "and, in this case, when the stakes are so high, the Supreme Court should be the ultimate check."

The bill would permit lawsuits by scholars, journalists and others who assert that they have refrained from calls or e-mail messages to Iraq, Afghanistan and other countries because of "a reasonable fear" of N.S.A. eavesdropping.

Such suits would be heard by a panel of three federal judges, whose decision could be appealed immediately to the Supreme Court.

EBay patent dispute heard; SUPREME COURT WEIGHS AUCTION GIANT'S REQUEST TO LIMIT INJUNCTIONS

By Jim Puzzanghera
Mercury News Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON - The U.S. Supreme Court waded into the complex world of high-tech patents Wednesday, hearing oral arguments in a closely watched dispute between eBay and a small Virginia company over the ability to instantly purchase items online.

The court's ruling, expected later this year, could have major implications for Silicon Valley by clarifying rules in the exploding arena of patent lawsuits. Both sides in the case warned that U.S. competitiveness and innovation would be endangered if they lost.

EBay, backed by much of the tech industry, argued that courts should not be imposing near-automatic injunctions in cases that are increasingly brought by companies often described as ``patent trolls.'' Those companies have no intention of developing products, tech executives say, but simply try to use overly broad patents and the threat of a court injunction on an existing product to extract large monetary settlements.

``What we're asking the court to say is, `No, enough is enough,' '' eBay's attorney, Carter Phillips, told the justices. He argued that financial damages should be enough in many patent cases.

The Supreme Court will not rule on the patent dispute between the two companies, but whether an injunction is warranted. Still, it could be a landmark decision by setting new guidelines on injunctions in patent cases.

Seth Waxman, the attorney for MercExchange, a Great Falls, Va., company that successfully sued eBay for patent infringement, said injunctions are vital to prevent big companies from violating the rights of smaller ones. Some small inventors have countered the ``patent troll'' charge by branding large companies ``patent pirates'' that swipe inventions with little impunity.

``EBay stole the technology,'' Waxman said of eBay's ``Buy it Now'' feature on its online auction site. The threat of a near-automatic injunction is the only way of forcing companies to think twice about such actions, he said.

The justices gave little indication of how they might rule and appeared at times to be struggling to grasp the complexities of the dispute.

``What exactly is the invention here?'' Chief Justice John Roberts asked Waxman. ``It's not like an internal combustion engine. It's very vague.''

Waxman noted he was not a software developer and had reason to believe Roberts wasn't either. Roberts readily admitted that, but said MercExchange's invention of displaying pictures of products on a computer network and allowing people to buy the ones they want didn't sound so novel.

``I might have been have been able to do that,'' Roberts said.

But earlier in the hearing, Roberts appeared sympathetic to the small ``inventor in a garage'' who doesn't have the financial resources to develop and market his invention and can only make money by selling the rights to a ``patent speculator.''

Justice Antonin Scalia echoed that view, saying of patents: `We're talking about property.''

Making injunctions more difficult to receive would force patent-holders to license their inventions to bigger companies, a practice known as ``compulsory licensing'' that Congress rejected in passing the Patent Act of 1952, said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg. But eBay's attorney also noted that the law says that courts ``may'' impose injunctions when someone is found guilty of patent infringement, not that they ``must'' impose them.

Justice Stephen Breyer seemed sympathetic to eBay's argument. He questioned the fairness of a patent-holder who doesn't try to develop an invention and waits until it is ``embedded'' in some other company's product before filing suit. Such a move enhances the likelihood of a financial settlement because the company fears an injunction that will force its product off the market, Breyer said.

Breyer also questioned whether the federal government has issued too many vague patents in recent years. EBay and other tech companies have made that charge as the number of patent applications have nearly tripled since 1985 with the advent of the personal computer and Internet industries.

But Waxman said MercExchange did not have an overly broad patent and tried to market the idea of a fixed-price online marketplace that it created in 1994. He noted the company now actively sells high-tech products on its Web site, www.mercexchange.com.

``This is no patent troll,'' Waxman said. ``This is a real inventor. This is somebody who really did try to put it in place.''

Justice Department Subpoenas Reach Far Beyond Google

In its effort to uphold the 1998 Child Online Protection Act (COPA), the U.S. Department of Justice is leaving no stone unturned. Its widely reported issuance of subpoenas to Internet search companies AOL, MSN, Google, and Yahoo is just the tip of the iceberg: The government has demanded information from at least 34 Internet service providers, search companies, and security software firms.

Responding to a Freedom of Information Act request filed by InformationWeek, the Department of Justice disclosed that it has issued to subpoenas to a broad range of companies that includes AT&T, Comcast Cable, Cox Communications, EarthLink, LookSmart, SBC Communications (then separate from AT&T), Symantec, and Verizon.

Asked which companies objected to, or sought to limit, these subpoenas, Department of Justice spokesperson Charles Miller declined to comment because the litigation is ongoing. He also declined to comment on the utility of the information gathered by the government.

The documents presented to InformationWeek reveal that some companies did object to the government's demands. In an E-mail sent to the Department of Justice last July, Fernando Laguarda, an attorney representing Cablevision Systems Corp., characterized some of what the government was asking for as "overly broad, vague, ambitious, and unduly burdensome."

In a letter sent to the Department of Justice in August, Joseph Serino Jr., an attorney representing Verizon, voiced similar objections. However, he clearly states that his objections are routine and intended protect the company.

The one exceptional objection he cites has to do with the sensitivity of the information sought. Serino said Verizon Online is concerned that documents might be forwarded to people working for entities hostile to Verizon Online, or suing the company, including the Justice Department itself, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Verizon did not respond to requests for comment.

The subpoenas were issued between June and September, 2005. Beyond AOL, MSN, Google, and Yahoo, the only other search engine subpoenaed was LookSmart.

It's likely, however, that the government's interest in LookSmart stems not from the company's search engine but from its ownership of Internet content filtering software company Net Nanny.

LookSmart declined to comment about the information it was asked for and the information it provided. EarthLink likewise declined to comment.

The bulk of the subpoenas were directed at Internet service providers and makers of content filtering software. The effectiveness of filtering technology is a critical issue in the COPA case. If the Department of Justice can prove that filters fail to shield minors from explicit material online, COPA may well be reinstated.

The full list of companies subpoenaed by the Department of Justice includes: 711Net (Mayberry USA), American Family Online, AOL, ATT, Authentium, Bell South, Cable Vision, Charter Communications, Comcast Cable Company, Computer Associates, ContentWatch, Cox Communications, EarthLink, Google, Internet4Families, LookSmart, McAfee, MSN, Qwest, RuleSpace, S4F (Advance Internet Management), SafeBrowse, SBC Communications, Secure Computing Corp., Security Software Systems, SoftForYou, Solid Oak Software, Surf Control, Symantec, Time Warner, Tucows (Mayberry USA), United Online, Verizon, and Yahoo.

The subpoenas directed at security software companies asked for a substantial amount of information: any and all documents that fall into 29 separate categories including the kinds of content filtering products or services offered, the number of customers using those products or services, how users configure their filters, how filters get updated, R&D spending on such products, the methodology used to generate blacklisted or filtered sites, and pretty much any data gathered that relates to the use of filters.

"What they are doing, from our perspective, is engaging in a massive fishing expedition, in an attempt to find some shred of evidence that they think can change a result they didn't like, which is that COPA violates the First Amendment," says Aden Fine, an attorney for the ACLU.

While the government's demands for information from Internet search engines have privacy implications for individuals, its interest in corporate information raises questions about the rights of businesses.

Stephen Ryan, a partner at Manatt Phelps & Phillips in Washington D.C., considers the scope of the government's discovery efforts unusual. "I'm not surprised that the Google piece looks like the tip of an iceberg," he says. "But it is sort of surprising that they're using their authority this broadly."

Ryan acknowledges that government subpoenas place undue burdens on companies every day, noting that there are probably scores of attorneys at large ISPs who do nothing but process subpoenas. He suggests that as information technology produces more information, that the government will want greater access to that data.

With regard to the financial impact of subpoenas, Ryan notes, "If you look at the Office of Regulatory Affairs at Office of Management and Budget, there's something called the Paperwork Reduction Act. And there's supposed to be an evaluation of the burden that a government law or regulation will make on the public. I'll bet there's never been a burden analysis of what they're doing."

Justice Department spokesman Miller said he would inquire about this but did not have an immediate answer.

DOJ_NMG_0024311

Dan Jude, however, did. Jude, president of filtering software company Security Software Systems, confirms that the subpoena his 12-person firm received was a burden. "It was a pain," he says. "I don't have exact figures but it took 40-plus hours to put stuff together."

Jude says the Department of Justice asked for proprietary information about his company's content filtering software. Despite assurances the information would remain confidential, he says he refused that particular demand, fearing that it might be revealed by a Freedom of Information Act request.

Jude contends the government's efforts to prop up COPA are misguided. "It's a waste of time," he says, noting that he testified before the COPA Commission about the prevalence of explicit material online in August, 2000. The problem, he says, is that U.S. legislation has no teeth because half of the Web servers with explicit content are located in other countries.

If COPA were to be reinstated, Jude suggests that the Department of Justice would have to turn ISPs into content police in order to deal with offshore offenders.

As someone who sells a technical solution, it's perhaps no surprise that Jude has faith in filtering. "The great thing about the technology is that it allows parents to make the determination of what they want their kids to be able to do and not to do," he says. "And isn't that what we're supposed to be doing in this country?"

Boy was truly - now legally - a firefighter; He died "in the line of duty," a judge declared.

By Jeff Price, Inquirer Staff Writer

"He was a firefighter!"

Christopher Kangas' mother can say that now and have it mean something - legally.

Until this week, the U.S. Justice Department had denied the 14-year-old junior firefighter that proud title, literally devaluing the life of the Brookhaven boy who was struck and killed four years ago by a car while riding his bicycle to answer a fire alarm.

Without the title, he was not eligible for federal death benefits, and, most important to his mother and his fellow firefighters, not eligible to have his name inscribed on the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial.

But Monday, after years of hearings and appeals, U.S. Court\l "I" of\l "I" Federal\l "I" Claims\l "I" Judge Marian Blank Horn said, in effect, he deserved to be treated better.

"Christopher Kangas died 'in the line of duty' and was a 'firefighter' authorized to be at a fire scene and perform duties as part of a team engaged in the 'suppression of fires' at the time of his death," she wrote in Washington.

Kangas' mother, Julie Amber-Messick, did not try to hide her joy.

"I'm in shock," she said yesterday, reading again the judge's decision. "I keep looking at that paragraph, that he was a firefighter, that he was a member of a team - we were right!

"Me and Chris, versus the United States," she laughed, trying to put it all in perspective. "That's funny."

The Justice Department had maintained that because Kangas, an eighth grader at Northley Middle School, was a junior firefighter, he was only a trainee and did not qualify as a public safety officer.

Justice has 60 days to file a challenge, but Amber-Messick said Brookhaven fire officials and her attorney, Frank W. Daly, of Media, were optimistic no appeal would be pursued.

Linda Eschbach, a paralegal with Daly's firm, concurred, saying Judge Horn's finding was strong.

Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.), who has championed Kangas' cause from the beginning, immediately took steps to buttress the outcome. Yesterday, Weldon said he was introducing a congressional resolution to "urge the Justice Department not to appeal."

Weldon has also introduced a bill "to expand the definition of a firefighter to include apprentices and trainees, regardless of age or duty limitations."

A call to the Justice Department was not returned.

"The future of America's fire service is in young people like Christopher Kangas," Weldon said in a statement, "and we cannot let them be forgotten."

Philip C. Stittleburg, chairman of the National Volunteer Fire Council, seconded Weldon: "When Christopher Kangas responded to a fire call and died tragically as a result, he was no different than any of the more than 100 firefighters who die each year risking their lives to protect lives and property of others."

And that is what particularly angered members of Brookhaven Fire Company No. 52 about the Justice Department's denial of the family's claim. The department's logic left the bitter impression that because Kangas, as a junior firefighter, could not go into burning buildings, his contribution and, therefore, his death were somehow worth something less.

"It's been such a long haul for us," said Brookhaven Fire Chief Rob Montella. "We're so excited.

"The ruling said he was part of a team in fighting fires, and that is so true."

The fire company wasted no time in putting up its own memorial. Just days after Kangas' death on May 4, 2002, firefighters mounted a 5-foot-wide, 8-foot-tall wooden case in the firehouse. On exhibit were pictures of Kangas in his gear at the station and in parades. His helmet and fire coat are there, as well as some youthful icons - the cans of Pepsi and packs of chewing gum he loved.

Now, the nation can honor Kangas, too.

If the Justice Department does not appeal, or if the ruling is upheld, Kangas' name will go up on the fallen firefighters monument in Emmitsburg, Md., and his family will qualify for a $250,000 benefit.

"Money is great," Amber-Messick said, "but it is not the point. The point is to let these dedicated kids know what they are doing is worthwhile and that they are just as important as they feel."

Sri Lankan woman held in U.S. freed after 4 years

A Sri Lankan woman fleeing persecution in her native country has been released after spending more than four years in federal detention on allegations that she entered the country illegally.

Saluja Thangaraja, 26, was freed from the Otay Mesa detention center late Monday after the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the release of a Sri Lankan man who spent more than four years in the same facility.

The court ordered the release of Ahilan Nadarajah on March 17, saying the government was violating federal law by holding him even though he wasn't criminally charged and couldn't be deported in the foreseeable future.

Nadarajah and Thangaraja both fled Sri Lanka, stopped at the U.S.-Mexico border in October 2001 and were charged with being in the United States without a valid visa. Both were granted political asylum, but the government refused to release them.

The Sri Lankan army suspected each of being a member of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a separatist group listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. State Department. The U.S. government alleged Nadarajah was a Tiger member, but did not make that claim against Thangaraja.

Nadarajah denied the U.S. allegation, and Thangaraja's attorneys said in a U.S. District Court filing last summer that the Sri Lankan government's allegations against her were false and typical of arbitrary army actions against the Tamil minority.

In August 2004, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that Thangaraja's testimony about being abducted, beaten and tortured by government forces in Sri Lanka was credible and ruled that she couldn't be returned to the South Asian country because her life would be in jeopardy. In June 2005, an immigration\l "l" judge\l "l" granted asylum, but the government kept her in jail while it appealed her case, Thangaraja's attorney said.

"She did nothing wrong. She just came to this country seeking asylum from persecution," said Ranjana Natarajan, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California.

"Like the Nadarajah case, her release shows that the government cannot detain people for years without very good reason," she said.

Lauren Mack, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in San Diego, said the government was "still litigating" Nadarajah's case, adding that any legal decision on his case will impact Thangaraja.

Meanwhile, both were free and staying with members of the Sri Lankan community in the Los Angeles area, Natarajan said.

"She was pretty excited and obviously relieved that the whole order was over," the lawyer said.

Woman describes legal fight for funds; Blackfeet Indian nation member sues the U.S. over trust money

After Elouise Cobell filed the nation's largest class-action lawsuit in June 1996 in Washington, D.C., she fled to her hotel room and called a friend.

Knowing her suit, Cobell vs. Norton, claimed the U.S. government had mismanaged American Indian trust money for the past hundred years, Cobell conceded she felt scared.

"I said, 'I don't think I can do this.' And my friend said, 'If you don't do this, who will?' " Cobell said.

Speaking to an audience of about 300 people at Moorpark College on Wednesday, Cobell, a member of the Blackfeet Indian nation living in Montana, said from that moment on, she never looked back at her decision.

"People are getting very wealthy off of this system," said Cobell. "What's wrong with this picture?"

Cobell's speech was the first in the college's newly formed Distinguished Speaker Series.
Cobell's case began years ago when she tried to get an accounting from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, a division of the U.S. Department of Interior, on lease payments to be made to individual members of the Blackfeet tribe.

In 1887, the government passed the Dawse Act, which divided American Indian land into parcels that were then given to individual American Indians.

The parceled land was then held in trust by the DOI, which controlled the leases made to oil, mineral, timber and ranching companies using the land's resources for their businesses.
In turn, the DOI was to make payments to the landholders — the American Indians — for the use of the land.

"There was money paid and nobody knew where it was going. No one ever held the government accountable," she claims.

Cobell claims there has never been a government accounting given to the landholders on the leases. Also, she claims, payments made to the landowners, who represent some of the poorest people in the country, were spotty at best. Currently, the DOI oversees about 10 million acres of American Indian land.

After years of demanding information from the DOI, she filed the lawsuit on behalf of 500,000 American Indians.

"When it came to Indian money ¿ nobody would do anything," she said. "These people are poor. How would they be able to go out and seek individual justice? The U.S. government knew this."
Phone calls to the Bureau of Indian Affairs seeking comment for this story were not returned.

But in the past, Interior Department officials have defended their current management procedures.

In an audit report, former Interior Secretary Gale Norton wrote that there is "no evidence of fraud or widespread systemic error in the U.S. government's handling of the individual Indian monies accounts, and the few errors that have been found are generally small in monetary value."

To fight the government, Cobell has raised millions of dollars from private grant money to cover costs.

In return, Cobell said the courts have ruled in her favor on every point decided so far in the case.
Based on investigations made by a team of accountants reviewing government documents, Cobell estimates the government owes $176 billion to the landowners. She told the government she would settle for $27.5 billion. She also wants the land trusts to be out of the DOI's hands.

The case is still working its way through the U.S. Court of Appeals, and Congress is currently debating a settlement with Cobell.

After Cobell's speech at Moorpark College, students waited for an opportunity to speak with her.
Jerry Caplan, a philosophy teacher at Moorpark College who helped organize the event, said he was pleased to see the students' interested in Cobell's case.

"I hope the spark will continue," he said.

Engineering student Daniel Seidner said he would definitely write to his politicians in support of her case.

"Too many people let things go," he said. "This affects everyone here because it challenges the ideals of our country."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Trial Said To Contrast Nimble Al Qaeda With FBI "Lumbering Bureaucracy."

Under the headline "At Sept. 11 Trial, Tale Of Missteps And Management," The New York Times (3/31, Shane, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Three weeks of testimony and dozens of documents released in the sentencing of Zacarias Moussaoui have offered an eerie parallel view of two organizations, Al Qaeda and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and how they pursued their missions before" 9/11. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed's trial statement revealed that "Al Qaeda…took its time in choosing targets," whereas, "at the F.B.I., a few agents pursued clues that would later prove tantalizingly close to the mark, but they could not draw attention from top counterterrorism officials." 9/11 commissioner Timothy Roemer said that "the picture of a large and lumbering bureaucracy trying to defend against a small and flexible enemy is striking." He added that "the court testimony…has reinforced his belief that 'Moussaoui was an Al Qaeda mistake and a missed opportunity for the F.B.I.'"

Jurors Ask Judge About WMD Definition, Conclude First Day Of Deliberations. The Washington Post (3/31, A9, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) reports Moussaoui trial jurors "completed their first full day of deliberations yesterday, with no indication of how they would resolve the question of whether" he "is eligible for execution." Jurors "paused only to ask the judge a brief question concerning the definition of weapons of mass destruction." US District Judge Leonie Brinkema told them "that the term meant using an airplane as a missile or bomb. And with that, jurors disappeared again into their deliberation room." The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Serrano, 958K) notes the use of WMD "charge is a component of one of the key allegations against" Moussaoui.

The AP (3/31, Sniffen) also reports on the jury deliberations and adds, "meanwhile, federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are investigating a government lawyer who nearly derailed Moussaoui's sentencing trial by what Brinkema ruled was improper coaching of witnesses and lying to defense attorneys. … Unlike Brinkema's finding of civil violations, a criminal inquiry will address" TSA lawyer Carla Martin's "motivation or intent."

Federal Prosecutor Probes TSA Attorney In Moussaoui Case. The AP (3/31, Barakat) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are investigating the conduct of a government lawyer who nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui by coaching witnesses on their testimony." The AP continues, "The criminal investigation of Carla J. Martin, a lawyer with the federal Transportation Security Administration, was revealed in recently unsealed transcripts of a closed March 21 hearing in the Moussaoui case." The ap adds, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in the hearing that she had been 'advised by the U.S. Attorney's Office that there may very well be a prosecution of her, at least they're looking at the possibility.' … Rob Spencer, the lead prosecutor in the Moussaoui case, responded that 'the matter has been referred to a prosecutor in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and I believe they are handling the matter.' … Prosecutors in Alexandria recused themselves from the investigation. … Moussaoui's defense lawyers have said Martin should face criminal charges for witness tampering."

WPost Concerned Moussaoui Confession Will Overshadow Truth Of His Involvement. In an editorial, the Washington Post (3/31, 744K) recounts Moussaoui's "boasting" confession at trial this week and notes, "The government and Mr. Moussaoui, at this point, are both pushing for his execution," though "their motives differ. The government is prosecuting his crime, while Mr. Moussaoui appears to be attempting to martyr himself. The danger is that in such a confluence of interests the truth falls by the wayside. That would be dangerous, in part because the government's theory under which Mr. Moussaoui is eligible for death is an expansive one that could open the door for executions of low-level conspirators in a range of criminal enterprises."

USA Today Says FBI Agent's Testimony Raises Questions About Readiness. USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) says in an editorial that the "most chilling testimony at the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui" came "from a government witness who attested in heart-rending detail to the stubborn resistance and monumental missteps that kept the FBI from capitalizing on Moussaoui's arrest four weeks before 9/11." FBI agent Harry Samit's testimony "raised questions about the nation's preparedness for the next terror attack."

UN Investigator Claims He Has "Proof" Of Secret US Prisons. The AP (3/31, Klapper) reports Manfred Nowak, the United Nations' "special investigator on torture said Thursday he was certain that there are secret U.S. prisons in Europe and he wants access to them." In an interview with the AP, Nowak said he "had proof that secret U.S. prisons continue to operate in Europe." Nowak said, "I am 100 percent sure. I have evidence." The AP adds Nowak "cited a U.S. refusal to provide details or records of interrogations later used in terrorism trials in Germany. He did not explain how that was proof of the ongoing existence of U.S. prisons in Europe, and he did not offer other examples."

Judge Criticizes Intelligence Agency Reorganization. The Washington Post (3/31, A17, Pincus, 744K) reports US Court of Appeals Judge Richard A. Posner "sharply criticized the restructuring of U.S. intelligence agencies last week, telling CIA lawyers that the overhaul has done nothing to rectify flaws exposed by al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and that the changes 'in the end . . . will amount to rather little.'" Posner said Congress' 2004 intelligence overhaul "was based on 'a deep misunderstanding of the limitations of national security intelligence'" that "came from a naive belief that intelligence agencies can somehow be made infallible." In Posner's analysis, "the director of national intelligence (DNI), created by Congress to be the president's top intelligence adviser, was given too much to do. DNI John D. Negroponte oversees the CIA and 15 other intelligence agencies, including those at the Pentagon. Negroponte's staff, which has grown to about 1,000, 'has become a new bureaucracy layered on top of the intelligence community,' Posner said."

Redmond Withdraws From Consideration For Counter-Spy Post. The Washington Times (3/31, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Former CIA spy hunter Paul Redmond, who helped catch notorious Moscow mole Aldrich Ames, has withdrawn from consideration to become the Bush administration's top counterspy." US intelligence officials said Redmond had "been selected to be national counterintelligence executive, but backed out after the FBI held up his formal appointment by conducting a lengthy background investigation, said officials speaking on the condition of anonymity."

House Panel Votes To Withhold Funds From DNI. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Miller, 958K) reports the House Intelligence Committee "voted Thursday to withhold funding from the nation's intelligence director over concerns that his office, which was created to streamline operations in the nation's spy community, is instead becoming bloated and bureaucratic." Panel Republicans also "defeated a Democratic push to suspend hundreds of millions of dollars in spy agency funding until the Bush administration provided more information about a controversial domestic espionage program being conducted by the National Security Agency." The "move to withhold funding still must be approved by the full House as well as the Senate. But it reflects rising frustration among House lawmakers with" the DNI office. However, the Washington Post (3/31, 744K) reports the committee "rejected yesterday a proposal to withhold money from the National Security Agency if the White House did not reveal information about the cost of the agency's warrantless surveillance program." Only Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), "who heads a subcommittee that oversees the NSA, voted with the Democrats to support the measure to withhold one-fifth of the agency's budget."

Hayat Prosecutors Say No Evidence Supports Informant Claim About Al Qaeda. In a widely-distributed story headlined "Prosecutors Can't Prove Informant's Claims," the AP (3/31, Thompson) reports, "In a potential blow to their terrorism case against" Umer and Hamid Hayat, "federal prosecutors on Thursday said there is no evidence to support statements by their key witness," FBI informant Naseem Khan, "that a top aide to Osama bin Laden attended a Lodi mosque in the late 1990s. The surprise move was designed to dissuade the defense from calling witnesses who would challenge the story's credibility." Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III "told reporters outside court that the government's statement about Khan 'shows that he is a liar.'" The Sacramento Bee (3/31, Walsh, 301K) also reports on the prosecution stipulation that "the government has no information indicating that Ayman al-Zawahri was in Lodi…aside from the information supplied by Naseem Khan," and notes "Sacramento FBI Special Agent Rachel Pifer, who was Khan's 'handler' from November 2001 to September 2002, testified Thursday" that she concluded Hayat's report about al-Zawahri "was 'probably not true' before she 'opened Khan up as an informant' on Nov. 14, 2001. … Questioned by prosecutor David Deitch, Pifer said the FBI 'received a lot of reports of mistaken identity' in the wake of the bureau's release of a list of its 22 most wanted terrorists."

The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/31, Bohm) reports, "Hamid Hayat didn't know it at the time, but when a new Muslim convert helped him purchase and set up a computer, that man was actually an undercover FBI agent." Special Agent Terry Rankhorn, "spoke to Hamid Hayat about four times and testified…Thursday that he was 'very cordial' and also bragged about his relatives." When Hamid Hayat's lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi asked Rankhorn whether he believed Hayat when he said that "his uncle was a highly placed politician in Pakistan who could get him rare cigars, among other things," Rankhorn said, "It seemed to be more boasting than actual fact."

Lodi Police, FBI Investigating Threat Letter Sent To Newspaper. The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/31) reports, "Lodi police and the FBI are looking into a letter sent to the News-Sentinel stating that it is among several targets of al-Qaida. … 'There is clearly a possibility this is a prank, but we have to take this seriously,' Capt. David Main said. A spokeswoman for the FBI, Special Agent Karen Ernst, said her agency is aware of the letter and is working with local police to track down its origin."

Smith Still Employed By State Department, Despite Detroit Terror Trial Charges. The AP (3/31) reports State Department security agent Harry Smith, accused of conspiring with Assistant US Attorney Richard Convertino and lying under oath in the Detroit terror trial, "remains employed by the department, an official said Thursday. … The official could not say what Smith's assignment is."

U.S. News and World Report (3/31) reports on the indictment of Convertino and Smith, noting they allegedly "conspired to mislead the jury about evidence during the 2003 trial of the case, United States v. Koubriti, in which three Middle Eastern men were accused of operating a 'sleeper cell' and convicted on a variety of terrorism and fraud charges. Theirs were the first and only jury convictions stemming from the FBI's investigation into the 9/11 terrorist attacks. But the federal judge handling the trial, Gerald Rosen, threw out the convictions after the Justice Department issued a scathing report accusing Convertino of withholding evidence that could have been beneficial to the defense."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Bill Would Drop Color-Coded Terror Alert System. The Washington Times (3/31, Hudson, 90K) reports a "bipartisan push on Capitol Hill to strip the hue from the government's color-coded terrorist alert system is gaining momentum." A bill under consideration in the House "eliminates the Department of Homeland Security's use of colors to change the threat level, and calls for more specific threat information to be shared with the private sector and local governments." The "current system, implemented by former Homeland Security chief Tom Ridge, has frustrated governors and local officials nationwide who say they are forced to spend millions responding to threat level rises without information as to whether it directly affects their region."

DHS IG Report Says $1 Billion Contract Has Done Little To Benefit TSA. The AP (3/31, Miller) reports on the release of a report by DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner yesterday, which found that Unisys, a company that received a $1 billion contract for airport security equipment from the TSA, had "performed so poorly" that the agency should put the project out for bid again. According to the report, "The original funding is almost exhausted but many airports still do not have basic information technology and a telecommunications infrastructure." The agency agreed to "put the contract out to bid again once the $1 billion is exhausted," adding that "it has strengthened its procurement oversight."

Senate, House Advance Bills To Improve Infrastructure Security. The Washington Times (3/31, Fagan, 90K) reports both the House and Senate yesterday advanced bills "that aim to improve the security of the nation's ports and other key infrastructure advanced in both the House and Senate yesterday." The Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee "approved 20-0 a bill that would reform the interagency panel charged with approving such foreign deals -- forcing more thorough investigations and congressional involvement." Meanwhile, a House Homeland Security subcommittee "approved by voice vote legislation that would boost funding for the nation's ports and improve port-security programs."

The New York Times/AP (3/31, Press) reports the congressional panels took action on the bills "to stem the furor over the attempted takeover of significant terminal operations at some large American ports by a company owned by the United Arab Emirates."

CQ (3/30, Starks) reports a House Homeland Security subcommittee "approved legislation Thursday that would authorize $821 million annually to defend the nation's seaports against terrorist attacks." The bill (HR 4954), "approved by voice vote by the Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection and Cybersecurity Subcommittee, is the first on port security to move since the DP World deal to take over management of facilities at six U.S. port collapsed."

Senate Bill Would Extend CFIUS Review Of Foreign Acquisitions. The Financial Times (3/31, Kirchgaessner) reports on the Senate Banking Committee bill, submitted by Chairman Richard Shelby, noting that "foreign takeovers of sensitive US assets could face a national security review of up to 120 days." The bill "aims to make reviews conducted by the Treasury-led interagency panel that investigations foreign acquisitions, or CFIUS, more onerous and will give Congress more oversight over the confidential vetting process." Lobbyists "expressed satisfaction that, despite the extended review period permitted in certain circumstances, the draft legislation was far weaker than proposals first put forward by Mr Shelby last week. That initial draft would have subjected nearly every foreign deal to an automatic 75-day investigation."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, King, 2.11M) also reports on the Shelby bill, saying that "US business interests, with some Senate support, have fought back, arguing that lawmakers risk scaring off crucial investors and making life harder on U.S. companies overseas." Bowing to "business concerns, the committee adopted an amendment by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.) to limit the range of cases that would require a full 45-day investigation on top of a preliminary 30-day review."

The Washington Post (3/31, D2, Blustein, 744K) reports Chairman Shelby "led a chorus of panel members who cited the ports case as evidence that CFIUS needs fixing. Noting that the heads of the agencies represented on the foreign investment committee, such as the secretaries of the Homeland Security, Defense and Treasury departments, didn't know about the deal until it made headlines, he said that 'demonstrates that the system is woefully short of transparency and has no recognizable requirements for accountability.'"

DOJ Official Stresses Survivability Of Communications Systems. Federal Computer Week (3/31, Arnone) reports, "If Hurricane Katrina taught first responders anything, it's that communications systems must survive a natural disaster before they can be used to coordinate response efforts. … That's what officials from the Defense and Justice departments told Congress today as they explained some of the steps they are taking to improve information sharing before the 2006 hurricane season starts June 1. … 'The survivability of our systems is critical,' Vance Hitch, DOJ's chief information officer, told the House Government Reform Committee." FCW continues, "The federal government must work with industry to create self-powered communications technology that can operate without traditional infrastructure, said Linton Wells, principal deputy assistant secretary of Defense for networks and information integration. … 'The federal government must continue to expand its capability to rapidly deploy commercial off-the-shelf networks, making use of satellite links, wireless local-area networks, laptop computers and 'plug-and-play' equipment to bridge the gap created by a devastated civil infrastructure,' Wells said in a statement." FCW notes, "Common operating standards and equipment are the long-term solution to interoperable communications in disaster response, Hitch said. The Justice, Homeland Security and Treasury departments are making progress toward implementing such standards through the Integrated Wireless Network (IWN), he said."

Ground Zero Redevelopment Talks Break Down. The New York Times (3/31, Bagli, 1.19M) reports Gov. George E. Pataki's "last-ditch effort to strike a deal with the developer Larry A. Silverstein to speed up the rebuilding at ground zero crashed yesterday, when he was unable to convince New Jersey or City Hall officials that it made financial sense." Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and "representatives of Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey vowed to work with Mr. Pataki to put together a new framework for rebuilding at the World Trade Center site, one that would be likely to diminish Mr. Silverstein's role."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Frangos, 2.11M) reports "talks are continuing nonetheless." Govs. Pataki and Corzine and Mayor Bloomberg "couldn't settle upon a position to take with real-estate developer Larry Silverstein, who owns the legal right to rebuild the office space there, several people involved in the negotiations say."

Emergency Calls From 9/11 Released. CBS and NBC last night both ran segments on the release of audio from 911 calls from people trapped in the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001. The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 5, 1:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It is hard to imagine the horror of the people trapped in the World Trade Center after the September 11th attacks. Now, four and a half years later, New York City is releasing recordings of some of the 911 calls." CBS excerpted the 911 call made by 34-year-old Christopher Hanley.

NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 6, 2:15, Fratangelo, 9.87M) reported, "New York City officials notified 27 families of 911 recordings. They'll be released tomorrow but only with the voices of dispatchers. The voices of victims will be erased. Hanley's family released the entire recording to the 'New York Times.'"

Powell Says Areas Of New Orleans May Not Receive Required Levee Protection. The Washington Post (3/31, A1, Whoriskey, Hsu, 744K) reports in a front page article that Donald E. Powell, the Bush Administration's Gulf Coast rebuilding coordinator, said yesterday that parts of New Orleans "may be left without the protection of levees strong enough to meet requirements of the national flood insurance program" The Post reports Powell's announcement as "a shift for the administration," which "had pledged in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina to rebuild New Orleans 'higher and better.'" Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco called the news an "outrage" that "is totally unacceptable." Earlier, the Army Corps of Engineers had announced "that the levee reconstruction project, most recently estimated at $3.5 billion, would now cost $9.5 billion if insurance-certified levees were extended throughout the region."

ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 7, 1:30, Osunsami, 8.78M) reported, "Louisiana's Governor says she has no idea where the extra money will come from." Osunsami: "Homeowners, businesses trying to secure insurance and mortgages might be delayed until the additional money is found."

The New York Times (3/31, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "Powell said in a news briefing yesterday that the $2 billion that the Army Corps of Engineers is currently spending and the $1.4 billion in additional funds it has requested will make the system stronger and better than it has ever been. Asked if he would feel comfortable living in the area despite the government's inability to certify the levees, he responded, 'after the Corps completes its work, yes.'" The Times adds, "Although people can rebuild without the federal flood maps today, many homeowners may well decide that the risks of rebuilding are too great."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Vartabedian, 958K) reports the additional cost "could be a significant setback to rebuilding New Orleans." The Times adds, "The problem evolved in recent weeks when disparate federal agencies began grappling with complex rules and regulations that affect federal flood insurance, the technology of predicting hurricanes and certifications of levee safety standards. As a result, Powell found himself this week having to disclose to senior Bush administration officials and congressional leaders that what looked like a price tag of $3.5 billion to upgrade and repair levees in and around New Orleans had exploded almost threefold, to $9 billion."

Powell Says Full Recovery In New Orleans Could Take 25 Years. Meanwhile, in an interview with the AP (3/31, Jordan) yesterday, Powell said that New Orleans' full recovery "could take 25 years as homeowners, businesses and tourists are coaxed back." He added "that much of the city's rebirth will hinge on factors he said were 'out of our control,' including restoring housing, ensuring safety and encouraging robust investment by the private sector." NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 5, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Bush Administration's point man for the Gulf Coast recovery effort told the Associated Press today that a full recovery in New Orleans could take as long as 25 years. Don Powell said much of the city's fate depends on factors outside the government's control. He also said it may cost another $6 billion or more to repair the levees just so they'll be strong enough to clear the way for widespread building there."

WAR NEWS:

US Journalist Freed After 82 Days Of Captivity. Jill Carroll, the freelance writer for the Christian Science Monitor who was kidnapped 82 days ago, was freed from captivity yesterday. US and Iraqi authorities did not disclose whether any concessions had been made to her captors. The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, Murphy, Peterson, 61K) reports that yesterday "Carroll's captors simply drove her to Amariyah, stopped the car, pointed her in the direction of the Iraqi Islamic Party (IPP) office at about 12:20 p.m. local time and then drove off." Carroll, who "was on assignment for the Monitor when she was kidnapped, gave a short interview to Baghdad TV, which is owned by the IIP, before being transported to the Green Zone by the US military." She "was told the interview was for internal party uses only, and didn't realize it would be broadcast. In that interview Carrroll said that for most of her ordeal she was kept in a darkened room which she later described as a 'cave.'" The Washington Post (3/31, A1, Knickmeyer, 744K) says "party leader Tariq al-Hashimi presented her with an embossed Koran in a plush box. The Koran was for the true followers of Islam, Hashimi said, and he mentioned the Iraqi people. Accepting it, Carroll said her suffering was nothing compared with theirs."

The story was the lead on each of the networks, which devoted a total of nearly 14 minutes to Carroll's release, and an additional three minutes to the problem of kidnapping in Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, lead story, 3:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush may have summed it up best, when upon hearing the news, he said simply, 'Thank God.'" US and Iraqi authorities "will not say what, if anything, they may have done to lead to her release." ABC (Harris) added, "Despite this wrenching hostage video, despite her captors' repeated threats to kill her, and despite the fact that they did kill her translator, today Jill Carroll had nothing bad to say about the people who held her for 82 days."

The CBS Evening News (3/30, lead story, 3:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "For a change, the headline from Iraq is not about death but about someone who alive, well, and free." The US Ambassador to Iraq "says none of the kidnappers was captured and no ransom was paid by the US Embassy." CBS (Logan) added, "A senior Pentagon official told CBS News tonight that Jill has declined the use of military transport to get her out of Iraq, and she has also not agreed to be interrogated or debriefed by the US military here." In a separate segment, the CBS Evening News (3/30, story 2, 2:10, Bowers, 7.66M) reported, "Whatever the reason for Carroll's release, this is a day her family will forever celebrate."

NBC Nightly News (3/30, lead story, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "For Jill Carroll, her family, and her friends, it's been an awful ordeal. And it ended with her safe release today. We'll begin here tonight." NBC (Hattori) added, "After appearing in videos as a hostage held at gunpoint, today Jill Carroll went on Baghdad TV as a free woman." In Boston, "the 'Christian Science Monitor's' editor insisted no ransom was paid." Richard Bergenheim, Editor, The Christian Science Monitor: "There is absolutely no negotiations that took place for her release." Hattori: "The US Ambassador to Iraq chose his words carefully." Zalmay Khalilzad, US Ambassador to Iraq: "No US person has made any arrangements with the kidnappers. By US person, I mean the United States mission."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Daragahi, 958K) says that "by Thursday evening, Carroll was inside the Green Zone, Baghdad's US-protected fortress-like administrative headquarters, getting unspecified medical attention while awaiting departure from the country." The New York Times (3/31, Semple, Filkins, 1.19M), Washington Post (3/31, A14, Finer, 744K), USA Today (3/31, 2.31M), Washington Times/AP (3/31, Fam) and Knight Ridder (3/31, Youssef, Awsy) run similar reports. In a Washington Post column, David Ignatius (3/31, A19, Ignatius) comments on Carrol's release, saying "Americans should be grateful that reporters such as Jill Carroll are risking their lives to chronicle this agonizing story -- and tell Americans not what they want to hear, but what they need to know."

Carroll's Employer, Family Used Careful Campaign To Seek Her Release. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 2, 2:05, Karl, 8.78M) reported Carroll's family and employer undertook a "carefully coordinated campaign" to seek her release "that began with days of the public learning that Jill Carroll had been taken hostage." The message "that Jill Carroll is a sympathetic person attuned to the plight of the Iraqi people -- was central to her release," and her "family and her newspaper editors were coached by FBI agents who specialize in the art of hostage rescue and helped craft the message. Hostage crisis experts believe constant, consistent appeals like this are directly heard by the hostage takers."

Seven Americans Remain In Captivity. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 3, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Jill Carroll and her family have pointed out that there are many hostages whose fates remain unknown. One US soldier and six American civilians are held against their will. And for Iraqis, kidnapping is an epidemic. The Iraqi government estimates 5,000 Iraqis have been kidnapped since the war began. There's no on how many of them have been released."

USA Today (3/31, Bazar, 2.31M) runs a story on the missing soldier, Sgt. Keith "Matt" Maupin, and reports that shortly "after Maupin disappeared, his parents founded the Yellow Ribbon Support Center. Keith Maupin says he even left his job to spend more time there." The non-profit, which "operates out of a strip mall, is a bustling hub of patriotism. In the past two years, the center has shipped more than 4,500 packages to troops in Afghanistan and Iraq."

Kidnapping Is Major Problem For Iraqis. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 2, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "While a case like Jill Carroll's is very high-profile and gets a lot of attention, the fact is that in Iraq right now, the most vulnerable targets for kidnappers are Iraqis themselves. Kidnapping has become big business in Iraq and often the kidnappers are a different kind of criminal these days." NBC (Miklaszewski) added kidnapping is "lucrative for insurgents and criminals alike: Since the US invasion in 2003, 280 foreigners have been kidnapped, 46 killed, 151 freed, 83 unaccounted for. But a much larger number of Iraqi civilians are kidnapped, not for political reasons, but for ransoms as high as $100,000." USA Today (3/31, Memmott, Brook, 2.31M) runs a similar report, noting that "in Baghdad, four or five organized criminal gangs control the streets, prowling for anybody who looks non-Iraqi, says Steven Casteel, a senior vice president at the security firm Vance International." Kidnappers "want somebody who works for a company or government willing to pay for his or her release, he says." If gangs "can't get a ransom quickly, they sometimes 'sell' foreign hostages to terrorist groups. About 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since April 2003, Colton said."

Sistani Ignores Bush Letter. The AP (3/31, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "A letter from President Bush to Iraq's supreme Shiite spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, was hand-delivered earlier this week but sits unread and untranslated in the top religious figure's office, a key al-Sistani aide told The Associated Press on Thursday." The aide, "who has never allowed use of his name in news reports, citing al-Sistani's refusal to make any public statements himself -- said the ayatollah had laid the letter aside and did not ask for a translation because of increasing 'unhappiness' over what senior Shiite leaders see as American meddling in Iraqi attempts to form their first, permanent post-invasion government." The aide "said the person who delivered the Bush letter…said it carried Bush's thanks to al-Sistani for calling for calm among his followers in preventing the outbreak of civil war after a Shiite shrine was bombed late last month."

Friedman Says War Has Entered "Dangerous New Phase." Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) that the war in Iraq has "entered a dangerous new phase. It is the phase of barbaric identity-card violence between Sunnis and Shiites. … Once this kind of venom gets unleashed — with members of each community literally beheading each other on the basis of their religious identities — it poisons everything." Friedman adds, "There is only one hope for halting this slide and that is the formation…of a national unity government in Iraq, with Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds sharing power, and the deployment on the streets…of massive numbers of troops and police, both Iraqi and American, to prevent more of these tribal killings."

McCain Says Things Are Getting Better In Iraq. Sen. John McCain said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/30) that "things are getting better" in Iraq, adding, "I think they are progressing. I think that the Iraqi military is improving. I think the Iraqi police training is improving, but much more slowly. … Our ambassador is doing a great job urging that. And the president is personally involved. But these Iraqi leaders have to understand they have to form a government because they had an election. And the people of Iraq have the right to do that. Long, hard, tough. Can we do it? Yes. Will we do it? I'm confident we will. But it's -- the risks of failure are immense."

War Veterans Form Group To Back Bush On Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "War vets organize to back Bush on Iraq. VetsforFreedom.org3, a nonprofit group of recently returned soldiers, cites a 'disconnect' between what soldiers and veterans think about the war and what's portrayed in the media."

Wisconsin Towns To Vote On Referendums Asking For US Pullout From Iraq. USA Today (3/31, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "People in 32 communities across Wisconsin…will vote on referendums calling for the 'orderly and rapid' withdrawal of US troops from Iraq." Evansville, WI "is the only place where residents also will vote on a separate referendum stating that US forces should remain until 'unquestioned victory is clearly won.'" USA Today adds, "The outcome won't carry any legal weight here or in Washington." But "if all the anti-war measures pass, politicians might not be able to ignore the results, says Kenneth Mayer, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin-Madison."

Stephens Says Promoting Democracy Requires Patience. Columnist Phillip Stephens writes in the Financial Times (3/31) that there is a "spat raging in Washington between neo-conservatives past and present. Francis Fukuyama, once a celebrated cheerleader for the muscular interventionism that led the US into war with Iraq, has recanted. The invasion was a mistake. The US cannot remake the tyrannies of the world in its own democratic image. … Quiz the administration officials charged with striking these balances and they will tell you that there are never easy trade-offs. Promoting democracy, in the words of one senior official, was always going to be 'messy.'" Stephens concludes that "the frequent talk in this administration about legacy raises the suspicion that it has become a substitute for hard policy choices now. Wilsonian realism, liberal internationalism, call it what you will, requires consistency and patience. These are hard to find in a weakened presidency."

Documents Said To Reveal Saddam's Contact With Terrorists. The Washington Times (3/31, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The more documents that emerge from Saddam Hussein's reign of terror, the more evidence stacks up that his regime was in lockstep with international terrorists. Newly released papers seized after the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion reveal contacts made between Saddam's top aides and Osama bin Laden, particularly during the al Qaeda leader's stay in Sudan. … The documents show the fanatical Fedayeen operated bustling terror training camps for recruits from all over the Middle East."

Six Oil Workers Killed In Iraq As Insurgents Continue Attacks. The Washington Post (3/31, A14, Anderson, 744K) reports, "A bus ferrying oil workers to their job was forced to the side of a road in northern Iraq by masked gunmen, who ordered the workers to get off, accused them of being 'agents of the occupation' and then shot them, killing eight, police said." The workers "were all employees of one of Iraq's largest oil refineries, in Baiji, a town about 120 miles north of Baghdad." In the capital, meanwhile," one person was killed and 11 were injured in two roadside bombings; two were killed and seven injured in a car bombing; and five people were injured when a suicide car bomber detonated explosives near a police convoy."

Rahman Thanks Pope For Intervening On His Behalf. The AP (3/31, Sanminiatelli) reports, "An Afghan who faced the death penalty in his homeland for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday he was certain he would have been killed had he stayed there, and he thanked Pope Benedict XVI for intervening on his behalf. 'In Kabul, they would have killed me, I'm sure of it,' said Abdul Rahman, who was spirited out of Afghanistan to a secret location in Italy. 'If you are not a Muslim in an Islamic country like mine, they kill you. There are no doubts.'"

Woodruff Given Bloom Award For Reporting Excellence. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 11, 1:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Two months ago, Bob Woodruff was injured by a roadside bomb in Baghdad. Last night, at a dinner in Washington, DC, Bob was honored with the David Bloom award for excellence in reporting. The award is named after NBC correspondent David Bloom who died while covering the Iraq invasion three years ago. Bob and David were close friends as well as competitors and David's twin daughters, Christine and Nicole, aged 12, presented the award." Bob was "honored for his reporting from North Korea, Iran and from New Orleans. ABC News chief White House correspondent Martha Raddatz accepted the award and read a statement written by Bob."

Pentagon Developing Bombs To Destroy Underground Targets. The Pentagon is researching the development of weapons that can destroy deeply buried military targets. As part of that research, officials say they will detonate a 700 ton explosive in the Navada desert this June. The Washington Post (3/31, A9, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The test, code-named 'Divine Strake,' will occur on June 2 about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas in a high desert valley bounded by mountains, according to Pentagon and Energy Department officials. … The test is aimed at determining how well a massive conventional bomb would perform against fortified underground targets -- such as military headquarters, biological or chemical weapons stockpiles, and long-range missiles -- that the Pentagon says are proliferating among potential adversaries around the world."

DOJ:

On Western Swing, Gonzales Warns Youths About Online Thievery. The AP (3/31) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales brought a simple message to middle school students (in San Jose, CA) on Thursday: Don't steal. … 'I'm the top cop in the U.S. and I want you to know that if you illegally download a game or music or a video it's stealing, just as if you went into a store and stole blue jeans,' Gonzales told 7th and 8th graders at Windmill Springs School in the heart of California's Silicon Valley." The AP continues, "The lesson culminated an unusual four-day lesson on intellectual property and copyright infringement during which the nation's top law enforcement official became a classroom teacher. … Most children these days are exposed to Internet safety messages, both in television and in the classroom, but curriculum has only recently been developed about software piracy, copyright laws and intellectual property." The AP adds, "Entertainment software corporate leaders have repeatedly said the public simply doesn't understand that there are rules when it comes to usage of the Internet and computers. … But Windmill Springs students said Thursday that they got the message. … 'Most kids know it's wrong to download some movies or songs or copy games and CDs but they figure that if they can do it on a computer then they will,' said Andrew Lopez, 13. 'But not me. You can get a fine. You can go to jail.' … Gonzales said the consequences of intellectual property theft are just starting to be understood. … 'I'm not kidding myself that we have a lot of work to do, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't try,' he said."

Security Still Top Gonzales Concern. The Portland Oregonian (3/31) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave the Portland Business Alliance a quick review Thursday of the Bush administration's priorities, saying, 'Every day, I ask myself: Are we doing all that we can to prevent another attack? Are our neighborhoods safer? Are things safe in Portland?'" The Oregonian adds, "Making his first trip to Portland, Gonzales spoke to the city business group at a breakfast meeting, then he said he planned to "review the troops" in the U.S. attorney's office in Portland."

Gonzales Discusses Google Case. TheStreet.com (3/31, Wolverton) reports, "In town to talk with kids about respecting intellectual property, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez found himself addressing questions about the government's respect for online privacy." TheStreet continues, "In the middle of a legal dispute with Google over access to search records, the government has come under criticism from consumer privacy advocates. Gonzalez sought to assure critics that the government was trying to strike a 'good faith' balance between privacy interests and protecting the public. … Even though a federal judge recently restricted the amount of data the government will potentially have access to in the Google case, Gonzalez appeared unabashed by the government's request. Indeed, in determining the balance between privacy protection and how much information the government will request from private information keepers, the Department of Justice, instead of setting its own limits, will take its lead from Congress and the courts, he said. … 'Sometimes the courts will agree, and sometimes they will disagree,' he said."

Dow Jones (3/31) reports, "Gonzales said he was pleased with a federal judge's decision in the Google Inc. case two weeks ago, but that it showed there are limits to the kind of information the government can get from Internet companies." Dow Jones continues, "During an appearance here at the Windmill Springs Middle School, Gonzales reiterated that the government had not sought personal information on people using Google's Internet search engine when it subpoenaed the company in August. … 'We're not interested in any kind of user information,' he said." Dow Jones adds, "Gonzales said the judge's decision recognized that the information the government sought was relevant to its defense of the embattled Child Online Protection Act. … 'We're happy with the judge's decision,' Gonzales said, but 'there are limits to what kind of information the government can get.' … Separately, Gonzales said he pressed Chinese officials on intellectual property protection when he was in that country several months ago."

Gonzales Says Islamic Case Files To Remain Sealed. The AP (3/30, Frazier) reports, "Evidence in a dismissed case against an Ashland (OR) branch of an Islamic charity will remain confidential, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday." The AP continues, "Gonzales was in Portland to meet with the U.S. attorney's office in Oregon and to address a breakfast meeting of the Portland Business Alliance. … He said 'certain kinds of information can be and should be withheld.' … He declined further comment on the case, saying it is in litigation." The AP adds, "A federal lawsuit seeks to shut down electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency, claiming the government illegally wiretapped conversations between the director of the Islamic charity Al-Haramain and two of the charity's attorneys. … The charity had been indicted on tax charges related to money laundering in 2004, but the charges were dismissed." The AP notes, "Gonzales did not elaborate on the broader NSA wiretapping controversy beyond repeating President Bush's position that it is legal. … 'I can only talk about what the president has disclosed to the American public in December of last year,' he said. … 'We have been very, very forthcoming about his authorities,' he said. He said members of Congress continue to get briefings."

Gonzales Address Immigration Reform. KOIN-TV, CBS 6, Portland (3/31, Huston) reports, "It could be winter before Congress passes an immigration bill. That's because there is a growing split among Republicans over what to do about it. … One of President Bush's point men on the issue was in Portland Thursday morning. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales certainly has been one of the president's must trusted advisors on the issue, but he stuck with what has been the White House script." KOIN-TV adds, "Speaking to a morning breakfast for the Portland Business Alliance, Gonzales praised the local U.S. Attorney's Office for a recent meth bust which was the largest in state history. He also pledged to continue to pursue sexual predators who use the Internet, corruption in government and gang violence. … After his speech, Gonzales restated his support for immigration reform, including a guest worker program. But he offered no opinion on the legal definition of amnesty for illegal immigrants. … 'The president says he will not support a program that provides amnesty to those who have broken the law and come into our country unlawfully. But as to how you define it, that's part of the ongoing debate within the Congress,' Gonzales said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Orders Former Broker In Enron Case Released On Bail. The New York Times (3/31, Creswell, Thomas) reports, "In a surprise move, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Houston late yesterday ordered that a former Merrill Lynch executive, William Fuhs, be immediately released on bail awaiting final decision on his appeal." The Times continues, "Mr. Fuhs was one of four former Merrill employees convicted in 2004 on fraud and conspiracy charges involving a 1999 sale by Enron of power generators mounted on barges in Nigeria. Prosecutors argued during the trial that the Merrill executives were guilty of conspiring to defraud investors in an effort to win future banking business from Enron. … The appellate court said the conditions of Mr. Fuhs's release will be established today in a hearing before a federal magistrate judge." The Times adds, "Last May, Judge Ewing Werlein Jr. of the United States District Court in Houston sentenced Mr. Fuhs to three years and one month in prison. In most white-collar criminal cases, the defendants are generally allowed to remain free on bail while their appeals are heard. But Mr. Fuhs and the other former Merrill executives who were convicted were ordered to prison immediately."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Emshwiller) reports that "the federal government has been dealt a possible setback" by the ruling. " a related case involving the 2004 conviction of four former executives of Merrill Lynch & Co." In the 2004 criminal trial, involving the four former Merrill officials and two former Enron officials, the government alleged that Enron had falsely reported income from a bogus sale to Merrill of some electricity-producing barges off the coast of Nigeria. Prosecutors argued that Enron had secretly promised Merrill that it would be quickly taken out of the deal at a profit, which meant a "true sale" never took place because the brokerage giant assumed no risk. The jury also convicted one Enron official and acquitted the other. … The four Merrill officials appealed their convictions and unsuccessfully sought to stay out of prison pending those appeals. All four are currently incarcerated. Only Mr. Fuhs recently reapplied for bail pending the appeal. Attorneys for the other three Merrill officials declined to comment or couldn't be reached." The Journal notes, "People familiar with the barge case say that even if Mr. Fuhs's conviction were overturned, it wouldn't necessarily mean the others would be, too."

Skilling's Attorney Seen As Potential Key For Lay Defense. The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Johnson) reports, "Daniel M. Petrocelli is no stranger to the national stage. But he's more at home representing entertainers such as Lisa Marie Presley and John Travolta than defending former corporate executives trying to stay out of prison." The Post continues, "The California attorney is acting as a criminal defense lawyer for the first time, on behalf of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, accused of leading one of the most complicated white-collar conspiracies in history. … And as the defense prepares to begin its case Monday, Petrocelli has emerged as perhaps the most potent factor on behalf of both his client and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay. Both men face multiple fraud charges that could send them to prison for decades." The Post adds, "There are two teams of defense lawyers, but during the prosecution's case, Petrocelli dominated the cross-examination of the government's witnesses, in part because Lay's top lawyer had health problems. … Defense lawyers are engaging in careful choreography in a trial where their clients' interests sometimes converge and sometimes conflict. In the course of the nine-week-old trial, the defendants have displayed a few subtle disruptions in their alliance. But to the surprise of some legal experts, Skilling and Lay have stuck together for the most part, despite acute differences in their personal styles and in the evidence against them. … The critical question is whether they will point fingers at each other when they each take the witness stand in coming weeks. Of the approximately two dozen witnesses the defense expects to call, the defendants are far and away the most important. In a real sense, their lives are in their own hands."

New Method For Reporting Pension Obligations Could Cause Problems. The New York Times (3/31, Walsh) reports, "The board that writes accounting rules for American business is proposing a new method of reporting pension obligations that is likely to show that many companies have a lot more debt than was obvious before. … In some cases, particularly at old industrial companies like automakers, the newly disclosed obligations are likely to be so large that they will wipe out the net worth of the company." The Times continues, "The panel, the Financial Accounting Standards Board, said the new method, which it plans to issue today for public comment, would address a widespread complaint about the current pension accounting method: that it exposes shareholders and employees to billions of dollars in risks that they cannot easily see or evaluate. The new accounting rule would also apply to retirees' health plans and other benefits." The times adds, "The board is moving ahead with the proposed pension changes even as Congress remains bogged down on much broader revisions of the law that governs company pension plans. In fact, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the new House majority leader, who has been a driving force behind pension changes in Congress, said yesterday that he saw little chance of a finished bill before a deadline for corporate pension contributions in mid-April."

Columnist Sees New Sympathy For Corporate Executives. In his column for the New York Times (3/31), Floyd Norris writes, "Suddenly there is a wave of sympathy for overregulated corporate executives. Not only are some going to jail, but the Securities and Exchange Commission is making them pay large fines. … The S.E.C. also wants to force more disclosure of executive compensation. The commission denies that the purpose is to hold down pay, but few bosses believe that." Norris continues, "To hear some people tell it, corporate officials are being victimized in ways that can only inspire sympathy. … The United States Chamber of Commerce is calling on the S.E.C. to stop penalizing companies for refusing to cooperate in investigations and to give companies a break if they can show that some lawyer or accountant blessed the activity the S.E.C. deems illegal." Norris adds, "Just four years ago, as WorldCom was collapsing, President Bush endorsed 'corporate responsibility' and signed the Sarbanes-Oxley act with vigor. One poll then found that about two-thirds of both Democrats and Republicans thought business leaders had low standards of honesty and ethics. Politicians and even journalists received better marks. … But now many people hope to push aside the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms. … An S.E.C. advisory committee thinks bosses of companies traded on the over-the-counter bulletin board should not be asked to say whether their internal controls are adequate."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Retired FBI Agent Indicted On Mob-Related Murder Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/31, Hays) reports retired FBI Special Agent R. Lindley DeVecchio "was indicted on murder charges Thursday for allegedly taking bribes from a mobster to supply him with inside information that led to four underworld slayings in Brooklyn." He "was arrested in a case of 'confidential leaks, payoffs and death' dating back two decades, District Attorney Charles Hynes said. DeVecchio pleaded not guilty and was released on $1 million bail." The AP notes, "Colleagues of the FBI veteran were quick to defend him against the charges." The New York Times (3/31, Rashbaum, 1.19M) adds that when DeVecchio rose in court "to face charges that he had helped his prized Mafia informant commit four murders, the tension was clear. On one side of the gallery…were nearly four dozen mostly gray-haired men in dark-colored suits. Retired F.B.I. agents who had once been Mr. DeVecchio's colleagues, they were now his supporters." The Times notes DA's office chief investigator Michael Vecchione's "contention that the former agents would help Mr. DeVecchio flee prompted groans, angry grumbling and some laughter from retired agents in the gallery."

Newsday (3/31, DeStephano) reports, "Calling the case the most 'stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen,' …Hynes outlined at a news conference how DeVecchio allegedly provided Colombo crime family member Greg Scarpa with information about rivals and informants who were murdered between September 1984 and May 1992. 'Each of the informants and rivals exposed by DeVecchio posed an imminent threat to Scarpa, Scarpa's family and Scarpa's crew,' said Hynes." The New York Daily News (3/31, Katz, 729K) notes, "Sources told The Daily News yesterday that DeVecchio could face charges in as many as three other gangland murders, two of them on Long Island. The slayings are believed to be tied to a intra-clan conflict that decimated the Colombo family in the early 1990s, the source said. 'This is only one little piece in Brooklyn,' a source said. 'There are murders involved in Nassau County. There were murders in other areas.'"

Under the headline "'Mafia' G-Man's Job Power Trip," The New York Post (3/31, Weiss, 624K) reports, "He didn't just do it for the money. FBI hotshot Lindley DeVecchio was indicted yesterday on charges he traded secrets with a murderous Mafia chieftain for more than a decade -- a relationship he built primarily so he could burnish his own rising star within the Justice Department, investigators revealed." Vecchione said, "He received a weekly stipend, but there was also his desire to feather his own nest within the FBI to rise to greater prominence." The Post notes, DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas Grover, blasted the DA's 'new evidence as old evidence - and it is false evidence.'" UPI (3/31) also briefly reports on DeVecchio's arraignment.

Alleged Mob Hitmen Also Charged. The New York Daily News (3/31, Sherman, 729K) reports, "One of the alleged hit men is a 39-year-old Las Vegas limousine dispatcher who is on antidepressants and suffers from high cholesterol. The other is a 41-year-old Florida charter fishing-boat captain." Craig Sobel and John Sinagra "were young men involved with Brooklyn Mafia capo Greg Scarpa and his sons in the drugs and murder business, prosecutors say. The two alleged hit men are embroiled in the case charging retired FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio with helping Scarpa murder mob rivals and informants." Sinagra was in the Brooklyn courtroom yesterday for his arraignment, but Sobel remains in Florida, fighting extradition.

Former Hockey Player Denied Transfer To Canadian Prison. The AP (3/31, Suhr) reports, "The U.S. government rejected the request by former NHL player Mike Danton to be transferred to his native Canada to serve a prison sentence for his foiled attempt to have his agent killed. … The move 'would not serve the ends of justice,' said the Justice Department." The AP continues, "The decision was made last week by the Justice Department's prisoner-transfer unit and revealed on Wednesday in federal court filings. It assures that Danton will for now remain inmate No. 10096-111 at a prison in Fort Dix, New Jersey. … A lawyer for the 25-year-old former St. Louis Blues player promised to continue appealing." The AP adds, "When Danton was sentenced in 2004 to 7 1/2 years after pleading guilty to murder conspiracy charges, prosecutors agreed not to oppose Danton's deportation to Canada, where he said he wanted to get behind-bars surgical treatment for a shoulder injury and therapy for what his sentencing request called his 'grave mental disorders.' … Danton sued the U.S. government last November, contending that he unfairly has not been transferred to Canada. He asked to be resentenced. … The Justice Department countered that Danton waived his right to appeal by pleading guilty in July 2004 to orchestrating a conspiracy to commit an interstate killing targeting his agent, David Frost. The government also has insisted no regulations require action on international transfers within a specified time, and that Danton's deal did not require a transfer, only that he be considered for one."

New Orleans FBI To Investigate Alleged Red Cross Katrina Relief Fraud. The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 4, 2:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "After Hurricane Katrina, Americans donated more than $2 billion to the Red Cross to help victims. But after reports that some of its volunteer workers stole relief money and supplies, the Red Cross investigated and today it passed on its findings to the FBI." CBS (Attkisson) added, "The Red Cross sent allegations of wrongdoing with food distribution and warehouses to the FBI. Red Cross leaders were also here on Capitol Hill meeting with Senator Charles Grassley in his ongoing investigation of the charity."

The New York Times (3/31, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports New Orleans FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said yesterday that the bureau "will look into possible improprieties in the distribution of millions of dollars' worth of Red Cross relief supplies" in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. Interim Red Cross President John McGuire "pledged to prosecute any 'wrongdoers'" and "urged any volunteers 'who may have information' to come forward."

The Washington Post (3/31, A8, Salmon, 744K) reports the Red Cross is turning over its internal report on the allegations to the FBI, but Red Cross volunteers Jerome Nickerson and Michael Wolters, "who wrote a detailed report in December accusing New Orleans relief workers of operating a 'rogue' operation using donated goods and equipment, said yesterday that they have already reported their findings to the FBI. And they expressed bitterness that the charity has not contacted them."

Bloomberg (3/31, Zee) reports, "The American Red Cross was part of the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force after the storm struck the U.S. Gulf Coast at the end of August. The charity said it is working with law enforcement groups to seek out and prosecute fraud, waste and abuse."

11th Circuit Mulls Federal Death Penalty Request. The AP (3/31, Yee) reports, "Lawyers for a man accused of killing a Florida deputy asked the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals Thursday to throw out the government's request for the death penalty, saying they were not given sufficient notice." The AP continues, "Jeffrey Lamken, an attorney for Kenneth Wilk, asked a three-judge panel to throw out the request because the government informed Wilk and his defense team it would seek the death penalty less than two months before Wilk's scheduled trial date last April. … 'An indictment was released six months before the trial date, yet the Justice Department did not sign off on the death penalty,' Lamken said." The AP adds, "Wilk, 43, is charged with killing Broward County sheriff's Deputy Todd Fatta, 33, by using a high-powered hunting rifle with a bullet that pierced the officer's protective vest when deputies raided Wilk's home in August 2004. A second deputy, Angelo Cedeno, was shot in the hand and lost a finger. … Federal law requires the government to inform defendants of its intent to seek the death penalty 'a reasonable time before trial.' In previous cases, the government has provided notice about 11 months before trial, Lamken said. … Assistant U.S. Attorney E.J. Yera told the panel the 58-day notice was sufficient. The government filed the request on Feb. 18, 2005. The trial had been set to open April 18, 2005. The trial is expected to be held after the panel issues its opinion."

Failed Engagement Split DeLay Aides, Fed Abramoff Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, A1, Mullins, 2.11M) reports in a front page story about the estrangement of Michael Scanlon and his former fiancé, Emily Miller, both former aides to Rep. Tom DeLay. Scanlon and Miller "were among a tight-knit group of aides who helped Mr. DeLay rise to the pinnacle of Capitol Hill in the 1990s and cement his power as House majority leader. Some of those aides provided a link between their boss and Jack Abramoff, a Republican lobbyist." The "end of the engagement was part of that group's unraveling -- which has had significant consequences for official Washington. The aides have since turned on one another, feeding the ethics scandal surrounding Mr. Abramoff that now roils the capital." Prosecutors "came to Ms. Miller to help them build a case that drove her ex-fiancé to plead guilty, according to a person familiar with the situation."

The New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) runs a poem by Hart Seely that mocks the Abramoff lobbying scandals as the "Congress that Jack built." Seely writes, "This is the Jack/Jack Abramoff/Who bought the souls/Then sold them off."

Letters To Judge Sought Leniency For Abramoff. The Washington Post (3/31, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column on the "extraordinary outpouring of letters on behalf of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff," which "must have played a part in persuading U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck to give Abramoff the minimum possible sentence." The Post notes, "The sheer volume -- 262 letters were ginned up by Abramoff's lawyers -- was impressive. So was the range -- from family members to old friends to religious folks to a member of Congress (Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.). All asked for leniency for a great guy who lost his way."

Six Jefferson Aides Subpoenaed In Bribery Case. The AP (3/31) reports a US District Court "has issued grand jury subpoenas to six aides to Rep. William Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who has been implicated in a bribery case." In statements "read on the House floor Thursday, the aides notified House Speaker Dennis Hastert that they had been served with grand jury subpoenas for testimony issued by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia." The Washington Post (3/31, 744K) also runs the AP story.

Illinois Man Flees After Mistakenly Released From Federal Jail. CBS 2 Chicago (3/31) reports, "A North Side (Chicago) man was on the lam after a communication glitch caused him to be accidentally released from the downtown federal jail, authorities said Wednesday." CBS 2 continues, "U.S. marshals were searching for Amar Abu Siessi, 36, a Jordanian national, after they inadvertently let him out of the Metropolitan Correctional Center Monday. … U.S. District Judge Matthew F. Kennelly issued a warrant for the Siessi's arrest Wednesday when he did not show up to court." CBS 2 adds, "The U.S. Marshals Service mistakenly believed the court had released Siessi on bond. They released him without his bond discharge papers, a violation of protocol, according to Deputy U.S. Marshal Michael Prout. … 'At the time we had transmitted incorrect information that he was to be released on bond, when in fact he was to appear in court today for a bond hearing,' Prout said. … Siessi, a grocery store owner, had been held since March 7 when he was arrested by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on fraud charges, the second fraud case brought against him since December. He is accused of defrauding the Link card program, which provides taxpayer money to the poor so they can buy food."

US Attorney Snafu Blamed For Chicago Conman's Release From Prison. WBBM-TV Chicago (3/30, Zekman) reports, "A conman who pulled off elaborate scams while he was supposed to be monitored by federal agencies has done it again." Michael Anthony Nelson "is now pictured on an FBI 'wanted' poster. It includes mug shots of how he looked for his past scams, posing as a banker, lawyer, and business consultant, to pull off one con after another. It is a history that amazes even Chicago FBI Special Agent-In-Charge Robert Grant." Grant said, "He is a professional conman. He is very smooth. He is very articulate. He can con the socks off of you." WBBM notes, "Federal officials promised the Chicago victims" that, after he served his time for a Florida scam, "Nelson would be brought back to Chicago to face new charges." But he "was released from an Atlanta prison on Dec. 23 of last year…apparently because the U.S. Attorney's Office in Chicago did not get around to returning a bank fraud indictment against Nelson until about a week after his release."

US Charges Two In Pennsylvania Contract Killing. The Beaver County (PA) Times (3/31, Vidonic) reports, "More than two years ago, Beaver County District Attorney Dale Fouse made a promise to the family of Frank J. Helisek Jr. that his office would find out why the New Brighton man was gunned down in the doorway of his home. … Fouse fulfilled a good portion of that promise Wednesday with the announcement that federal murder charges - a first in Beaver County - had been handed down against two men, accusing them of a contract killing scheme wrapped into a large-scale cocaine ring that operated from 1999 to November." The Times continues, "Jelani Solomon, 27, of 1917 Fourth Ave., Beaver Falls, is accused of paying Claron Hanner, 28, formerly of Pittsburgh, to shoot Helisek on Feb. 19, 2004. One of Helisek's sons, Shawn Helisek, was scheduled to testify against Solomon in a drug trial that was to begin Feb. 20, 2004. Solomon instead pleaded guilty to cocaine possession and was sentenced to between 2½ and five years in state prison. .. . Solomon and Hanner could face the death penalty, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Wednesday, as they are accused of using a gun to cause a death while trafficking in drugs." The Times adds, "Buchanan must make a recommendation to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has the final say on whether prosecutors seek the death penalty. Buchanan would not say Wednesday what her recommendation will be, though Fouse said he supports death penalty prosecutions in this case."

Attorneys At Law Firm In Pellicano Probe May Depart. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Philips, Christensen, Weinstein) reports, "Two top attorneys with a Century City law firm at the center of a federal racketeering investigation into alleged wrongdoing by Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano will soon leave to establish a new practice." The Times continues, "Dale F. Kinsella and Howard L. Weitzman are expected to take seven attorneys with them when they exit Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger & Kinsella in mid-April, according to sources within the firm. … 'If we do, it is because we want to go back to practicing in a smaller environment,' Weitzman said in a statement, adding that the decision has nothing to do with the federal probe. 'As I've said publicly before, I do not believe any Greenberg Glusker lawyer has acted inappropriately, nor do I think anyone from the firm will be so charged.'" The Times adds, "Greenberg Glusker was thrust into the spotlight amid allegations that Pellicano and others committed wiretapping and other illegal acts while working on a number of cases, some of which involved the firm's clients. … A 110-count federal indictment last month accused Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in what prosecutors have described as a conspiracy to gain tactical advantage in litigation. … So far, 13 people have been charged, including an entertainment lawyer, a record company executive, two former police officers and several telephone company employees. Four have admitted to charges stemming from hiring Pellicano or helping him conduct illegal investigations."

Convicted Sniper Muhammad To Defend Himself In Maryland Court. The Washington Times (3/31, Ward) reports, "Maryland's public defender said this afternoon that he will abandon the case of convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad, leaving him to defend his own case in Montgomery County without legal advice." The Times continues, "Muhammad, 45, relegated Paul B. DeWolfe, a lawyer with the state's Office of the Public Defender, to standby status yesterday, after a judge rejected Mr. DeWolfe's argument that Muhammad is insane and not mentally competent to present his own case. … 'We have a policy of not serving as standby counsel,' Mr. DeWolfe said. 'It's been a policy we will enforce in this case. We will not be standby counsel.'" The Times notes, "Muhammad, an Army veteran, asked Circuit Judge James L. Ryan earlier this week for permission to present his own defense because Mr. DeWolfe planned to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. … Muhammad maintains he is innocent and has portrayed himself as a victim of racism. … The trial is scheduled to begin May 1, with prosecutors seeking life in prison without parole in connection with the fatal shootings of six persons in Montgomery County over three weeks in October 2002."

Judge Delays Cuban Spying Trial Over Challenge Of FBI Surveillance Warrants. The AP (3/31) reports US District Judge K. Michael Moore yesterday postponed the trial of alleged Cuban agents Carlos Alvarez and Elsa Alvarez "until sometime in January 2007. One key reason for the delay is that defense attorneys are challenging whether the FBI lawfully obtained warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to eavesdrop on the pair. Prosecutors said it will take months for federal officials to produce the information about those thousands of intercepts being sought by the Alvarez lawyers. The defense lawyers are also appealing a previous decision to keep the couple in detention prior to trial.

New York Court Rules Against Gabelli In Investor Suit. The New York Times (3/31, Sorkin) reports, "Mario J. Gabelli's first investor won a crucial ruling yesterday in a long-running, bitter legal battle over whether Mr. Gabelli bilked him and another backer out of more than $100 million." The Times continues "A judge in New York State Supreme Court in White Plains granted a summary judgment against Mr. Gabelli, the famed money manager. The judge, Linda S. Jamieson, determined that he unfairly prevented the two investors from selling their shares in his private company, Gabelli Group Capital Partners, the controlling shareholder of Gamco Investors, Mr. Gabelli's publicly traded mutual fund company." The Times adds, "Judge Jamieson also agreed to grant the two investors a trial to determine if Mr. Gabelli's company should be dissolved — refusing Mr. Gabelli's efforts to have the case thrown out — and said, 'There are allegations made against Mr. Gabelli that trouble this court.' … The decision, handed down late yesterday, comes as Mr. Gabelli is facing other, and potentially more serious, legal trouble. The Justice Department said this month that it would pursue civil fraud claims against Mr. Gabelli, contending that he orchestrated a scheme to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in its auctions of wireless spectrum licenses several years ago. … That case argues that he used friends and associates to create sham companies that bid for F.C.C. licenses at a discount under a program that favored minorities and small businesses."

California Woman Charged In University Of Washington ELF Arson. The Seattle Times (3/31, Green) reports Briana Waters of Berkeley, Calif., "has become the first person to face charges for the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Center for Urban Horticulture, the latest in a series of charges against suspected members of the Earth Liberation Front." She "was indicted by a federal grand jury and has been charged in U.S. District Court in Seattle with arson and using or carrying a destructive device during a crime of violence, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle." The Times notes, "While the FBI has called ELF and the similar Animal Liberation Front (ALF) the nation's top domestic terror threat, the groups say they are careful not to hurt people." The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (3/31, Castro) adds, "If convicted…Waters faces a minimum sentence of 35 years. She was released after the brief hearing" yesterday "and will be electronically monitored." The AP (3/31) notes Waters "is the 14th person to be charged in Oregon and Washington with conspiracy to commit a series of ecoterrorist attacks in the West in recent years."

Computer Glitches Plague DC Criminal Court. The Legal Times (3/31, Broida) reports, "Criminal defense lawyers say a new computer system in Washington, D.C., Superior Court is wreaking havoc with their cases and in some instances violating their clients' rights." The Times continues, "The attorneys say that since the criminal division of the court moved to a paperless computer system at the beginning of the year, bad information has led to their clients being arrested after warrants have been dismissed, and in some cases the opposite is occurring: Defendants with bail violations are walking because warrants haven't been entered into the system. … In other cases, motions and paperwork are getting lost. And some lawyers say they can no longer trust what the court record is telling them." The Times adds, "The problems have mainly centered on proceedings in arraignment court and in preliminary hearings -- courtrooms with a high volume of cases that are heard in quick succession. In addition, a lag time in scanning documents has meant that some information isn't being entered in a timely fashion or, in some cases, at all. … The new case management system was part of a multiyear, $20 million project to upgrade the court's entire computer framework. The new system integrates 18 databases with the aim of giving court personnel, attorneys and the public easy access to complete, real-time information about cases. … In January all new criminal cases in the court were being housed entirely in the new system, eliminating the need for paper case jackets and allowing multiple users to access the file from any computer in the courthouse. The system is now considered to be the official court docket and official court jacket. … Court officials downplay the trouble. Judge Brook Hedge, chair of the court's technology and automation committee and co-chair of the committee that oversaw the implementation of the new system, says the problems are small glitches common with a startup."

Lawyers Question Constitutionality Of Espionage Act. US District Judge T.S. Ellis III, who is overseeing the prosecution of former AIPAC lobbyists Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman for receiving classified information, has given the government until today to respond to defense claims that the ACT is unconstitutionally vague and may violate the First Amendment. The Washington Post (3/31, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports that Ellis "directed a series of questions to Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin DiGregory expressing concern that the government had not dealt with constitutional issues raised by the defense. … Ellis also said he had thought there would be well-established precedent he could follow, since the statute had been around for so long. But it has turned out that Rosen and Weissman are the first nongovernment employees to be indicted under the act for receiving classified information orally and not through documents or other tangible items."

Former Nevada County Commissioner Testifies Colleagues Took Bribes. The AP (3/31) reports that in the bribery trial of former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey yesterday, former Commissioner Erin Kenny "testified…that she accepted money from a former striptease club owner and his lobbyist, and knew it was wrong." Kenny "told jurors that it was 'understood' that Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey also were being paid off by" Michael Galardi. "She said Malone and Galardi often referred to the two colleagues as 'on board' or 'being taken care of.'" The AP adds, "In his cross examination, Herrera's defense attorney Jerry Bernstein tried to undermine Kenny's credibility," saying that she "had changed her story from when she was first interviewed by FBI agents. 'The FBI didn't seem happy with the answers she was giving, (agents) took a break, came back and the story was different,' he told KLAS-TV outside the courtroom."

Ryan Jury Recesses For Weekend. The Chicago Tribune (3/31, O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "The revamped jury in former Gov. George Ryan's trial recessed deliberations for the week Thursday without reaching a verdict. … Deliberations are scheduled to resume Monday morning."

FBI Requests Houston City Councilwoman's Bank Records. KPRC-TV Houston (3/30) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation asked for the bank records of Houston City Councilwoman Carol Alvarado as it entered the investigation into improper bonuses at City Hall," and "it's the first indication that the federal government is involved in the probe. The FBI request is for all of Alvarado's bank accounts, open or closed. … The FBI would not comment on the investigation. But Harris County District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal confirmed for KPRC that the federal request was made."

Top Aide Says Street's Style Is Problem, Not FBI Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/31, Gelbart, 423K) reports, "Forget FBI bugs, a corrupt city treasurer, crooked contracts. Mayor Street's problem is what it's always been -- John F. Street. Or so says George Burrell, the mayor's closest adviser. Burrell, who today toils out his last day at Street's side," said that "Street's true successes had not been obscured by the federal corruption probe. Rather, he said, the problem is Street's inability to shed his prickly image."

In Call To Defense Lawyers, Jailed Mob Boss Says "Mafia Cops" Innocent. The New York Times (3/31, Feuer, 1.19M) reports that at the trial of alleged "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa yesterday, "the day prosecutors planned to rest their case and at the very moment when it seemed the trial could not get any more complex, there came, in a 1 p.m. conference call from a maximum security federal prison in Florence, Colo., the voice of Anthony Casso, former underboss of the Luchese crime family." Defense lawyers "said he referred them to a letter he wrote this month to" US Attorneys office Mark Feldman, "in which he claimed responsibility for two murders and a kidnapping that the defendants have been charged." The Times notes, "Today, at roughly 10 a.m., the defense will announce its plan: to call, or not to call, Mr. Casso to the stand." Newsday (3/31, DeStefano) adds that Eppolito and Caracappa defense lawyers will move for a mistrial, in light of Casso's letter, in which he "claimed the defendants were being falsely accused of three of the homicides charged in the case: that of Edward Lino, James Hydell and Israel Greenwald. 'I, Anthony Casso, hereby confess to have personally participated, as part of a three-man team, that shot and killed Eddie Lino in Brooklyn's Gravesend section. Detective's Eppolito and Caracappa are falsely being accused of this crime,' said Casso in the letter." The New York Daily News (3/31, Marzulli, 729K) also reports on the Casso letter, under the headline "'Mob Cops' Innocent – Casso."

FBI Art Crime Team Has Leads On Stolen Rockwell Painting. The AP (3/31, Douglas) reports, "FBI officials said Thursday the agency's Art Crime Team…has several leads in the theft of Rockwell's 'Russian Schoolroom,' stolen in June 1973 from a suburban St. Louis exhibit and believed to be worth as much as $200,000 today. … It is believed the painting was advertised for sale in 1989 at a Rockwell exhibit in New York, but nobody made the connection until recently, officials said. 'The experts have said there are no other copies of this oil painting,' FBI Assistant Special Agent Steven Gomez said." The AP notes, "Earlier this month, the Art Crime Team recovered a Marion Greenwood painting valued at $99,000 that was stolen in 1968. Frank Brostrom, with the Regional Art Crime Team in St. Louis, said the Rockwell case should be solved in a similar manner. On Thursday, the FBI also returned a drawing by Susan Rothenberg to its rightful owner, the Webster University art department. Worth about $20,000, the piece was among more than 100 works of art stolen from a St. Louis art storage facility in 2002."

Pentagon IG Finds Convicted Official Broke Rules To Benefit Lockheed. A Pentagon IG report says former Air Force procurement official Darleen Cruyun, who was convicted of showing favoritism to Boeing Co. while negotiating for job, also manipulated Pentagon rules to benefit Lockheed Martin Corp. and another contractor. The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Babcock, 744K) reports, "The audits, part of an IG review of eight contracts that the Air Force requested last year after Druyun pleaded guilty, found that she helped Lockheed Martin on two airplane contracts between 1998 and 2001 while serving as a top civilian contracting official. … The inspector general focused its criticism on the Air Force, recommending that the service tighten its control of the contracting process."

Former Naval Intel Officer Convicted Of Kidnapping, Murder. Jay E. Lentz, a former naval intelligence officer, was found guilty yesterday by a federal jury in the kidnapping and death of his ex-wife. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/31, A1, Smith) reports that when the jury delivered its verdict, Lentz "screamed out, 'No, no! Reconsider!'" The charge "carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole. Lentz is scheduled to be sentenced June 23. … Defense attorney Frank Salvato said Lentz, 46, who has spent five years in jail, will appeal the verdict."

New York Court Rules Judge Can Face Charges. The New York Law Journal (3/31, Caher) reports, "The Court of Appeals in Albany, N.Y., Thursday reinstated six felony counts against former New York Supreme Court Justice Gerald P. Garson with a precedential ruling that judges can face criminal prosecution for acts that started with a violation of the Rules of Judicial Conduct." The Journal continues, "Thursday's 6-1 opinion means the former judge accused of accepting bribes and kickbacks from a divorce lawyer is once again confronted with the full panoply of felony charges lodged against him following a sting operation initiated by Brooklyn District Attorney Charles J. Hynes' office. … Garson now faces trial on a total of seven felonies -- one count of receiving a bribe and six of receiving reward for official misconduct. All of the charges stem from an illicit attorney-judge relationship involving Garson and attorney Paul Siminovsky." The Journal adds, "Garson's attorney, Diarmuid White of Manhattan, had argued -- successfully, in the lower courts -- that the Rules of Judicial Conduct could not be used to criminally prosecute a judge. The preamble to the rules makes plain that they are not designed or intended to support a criminal prosecution, and the Court of Appeals accepted that proposition in People v. La Carrubba, 46 NY2d 658 (1979). But Thursday the court clarified La Carrubba, holding that while a violation of the rules alone cannot sustain a criminal prosecution, judges are not immune from indictment when an ethics violation escalates into criminality."

California Prisons Ordered To Pay Doctors. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Warren) reports, "Managers of California's beleaguered prison system received a double dose of bad news today as a federal judge ordered them to pay tens of millions of dollars owed to doctors who treat inmates, and the state launched an audit of their agency." The Times continues, "Some of the doctors have not been paid in four years. Some of their contracts have lapsed. And some who deliver cardiology, radiology and a wide range of other services to prisoners are no longer responding when called." The Times adds, "U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson, who recently put the state prisons' healthcare system in the hands of a federal receiver, ordered that outstanding doctor bills --- which total more than $58 million --- be paid within two months. … Henderson also had harsh words for corrections leaders, saying they have stuck 'heir collective heads in the sand'instead of resolving the contracting mess."

States Creating Crime Lab Oversight Commissions. USA Today (3/31, Willing) reports, "State legislators, troubled by reports of botched DNA tests and other mistakes by forensic analysts, have begun to establish oversight commissions to improve local crime labs and coroner's offices." USA continues, "Virginia and Texas, where a lab technician mistakenly implicated the wrong man in a rape case, passed laws last year that set up such commissions. Legislators in New Hampshire, Vermont and Minnesota are considering similar plans this spring." USA adds, "In Illinois, legislators are considering a plan that would require state and private labs to be accredited by a professional crime lab group. Oklahoma has had such a measure in place for three years. In Massachusetts, Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, revived the state's dormant oversight panel after a pair of eyes critical to a murder investigation were reported missing from a lab in 2002." USA notes, "Beginning today, the American Judicature Society, a non-partisan policy research group of judges, attorneys and academics, begins a three-day conference in Greensboro, N.C., to establish recommendations for crime lab practices. The conference's co-chairs include former U.S. attorney general Janet Reno and former federal judge and CIA and FBI director William Webster."

FBI Busts Canadian For International Fraud Scam Targeting Mosques. The AP (3/31, Mitchell) reports, "An international wire fraud scheme targeting Islamic institutions with a phony stranded-traveler plea, netting only small sums but hitting multiple victims over many years, has been disrupted by the arrest of its mastermind, the FBI says. Islamic advocates say Mohammed Mustafa Agbareia, who was arrested in Canada and pleaded guilty March 1 in Alabama to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, may have scammed more than $1 million from mosques and Islamic groups over nearly two decades. He will be sentenced July 10 by U.S. District Judge Charles Butler in Mobile, where he is in the custody of federal marshals." The AP notes Mobile FBI Special Agent Craig Dahle "said it's unknown how much money the scheme collected. He said there could be victims worldwide."

Faith, Family Seen As Key To Curbing DC Gang Violence. The Washington Times (3/31, Doolittle) reports, "Faith and family must figure large in solving the region's growing gang violence problem, which also will require mentors who understand street culture, a panel of forum speakers and audience members said yesterday. … 'Regardless of the message, one of the things I've found is that the message must be modeled by the messenger,' said former Washington Redskins cornerback Darrell Green, who now operates several youth organizations. 'I believe the best defense is a great offense.'" The Times continues, "Mr. Green was one of several panelists who participated in the Citizens Forum Project on Gang Violence, held at the Arbor Ballroom in The Washington Times building in Northeast. … Other panelists included Robert Woodson, founder of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise; the Rev. Fred Shuttersworth, a civil rights leader; Luis Cardona, a former gang member who works with at-risk area youth; and Robert Goodwin, president of the Points of Light Foundation." The Times adds, "About 200 students and residents attended the forum, the fifth in a monthly series, said Brian Bauman, director of The Washington Times Corp.'s Citizens Forum Project. … The Times reported yesterday that D.C. officials say there are more than 270 girl gangs alone in the District. … In addition, the number of D.C. Superior Court cases involving female juveniles increased from 445 in 2003 to 571 in 2004. The number of girls brought before the court for violent offenses jumped from 225 in 2003 to 322 in 2004, a 43 percent increase."

States Move To Combat Predatory Lending. More than half of the states have moved to protect risky borrowers from predatory lenders, as Congress remains divided over legislation to combat the practice. According to the Wall Street Journal (3/31, Conkey, 2.11M), "At least 10 states -- including New York, West Virginia and New Mexico -- have adopted comprehensive laws in the past few years crafted to curtail tactics commonly used by unscrupulous lenders, including excessive penalties for paying off a loan early, inflated interest rates and frequent refinancing of a mortgage that does little to improve a buyer's finances but generates fees for lenders and brokers. Other states are taking it one issue at a time: Maryland has restricted prepayment penalties, for instance. And still others are considering proposals to subject lenders to greater liability if they are found to have duped home buyers."

NYTimes Praises Cities' Efforts To Help Law-Abiding Ex-Offenders. An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) says, "Locked out of the mainstream, ex-felons become burdens to their families, their communities and the nation as a whole. Three cities -- Boston, Chicago and San Francisco -- have taken groundbreaking steps aimed at de-emphasizing criminal histories for qualified applicants for city jobs, except in law enforcement, education and other sensitive areas where people with convictions are specifically barred by statute. … Taken together, the recent developments in Boston, Chicago and San Francisco symbolize a step forward in terms of fairness for law-abiding ex-offenders, who are often barred from entire occupations because of youthful mistakes and minor crimes committed in the distant past. It should be clear to all of us by now that confining those people to the ranks of the unemployed makes it more likely that they will commit new crimes, return to prison and become a permanent burden to society."

DOJ Seeks Files From Dozens Of Internet Service Providers, Tech Firms. The AP (3/31, Dale) reports, "The Justice Department is demanding internal files from dozens of Internet service providers and other technology firms as it seeks to defend a controversial Internet child protection law." The AP continues, "The subpoenas are similar to one given to Google Inc., which waged a partially successful battle over the government's request for millions of pieces of information about search engine requests and Web site domains." The AP adds, "InformationWeek magazine unearthed subpoenas that show the government also demanded information from at least 34 other companies, including Internet service providers such as Comcast Corp. and EarthLink Inc., security software firms and other technology companies. … The subpoenas, which the magazine obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests, show the Justice Department preparing for an October trial in Philadelphia over the 1996 Child Online Protection Act. It is not clear which companies are complying, and to what extent. … 'That money could be spent so much more wisely on giving software away to parents that are having these problems,' Dan Jude, president of Security Software Systems, said of the litigation costs. … The 12-person firm, which makes filtering software, spent more than 40 hours trying to comply with the subpoena, he said. The company refused to provide some information on proprietary grounds, fearing it could make its way into the court file."

CNET News (3/31) reports, "Google made headlines in January when it was disclosed that the search company had refused to hand over random search terms and Web address data that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online had provided the government when asked. Google challenged the subpoena in court, arguing that it was overreaching. Earlier this month a judge ruled that Google didn't have to provide any search queries but did have to provide a much smaller number of Web sites in its index than the government had sought. … The government is seeking information on Web user behavior and filtering software and other tools in an effort to justify COPA, which faces a trial later this year. That law restricts the posting on commercial Web sites of sexually explicit material deemed 'harmful to minors,' unless it's made unavailable to the youngsters. The ACLU argues that Web sites cannot realistically comply with such requirements and that the law violates the right to freedom of speech mandated by the First Amendment."

The New York Times (3/31, Hansell) reports, "Both the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union confirmed yesterday that they had requested and received information from Internet service providers and software makers in connection with an A.C.L.U. lawsuit challenging an anti-pornography law." The Times continues, "Earlier this year it was revealed that the Justice Department, which is defending the law, had subpoenaed information from four search engine companies about keyword requests by users. Google challenged its subpoena. This month a judge ordered the company to provide some information to the Justice Department but not information on individual searches, saying that had the potential to violate the privacy of users." The times adds, "Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the agency had issued the subpoenas 'to see the effectiveness of Internet filters.' He said he was not able to say which of the companies had responded to the subpoenas and to what extent they had complied. … The A.C.L.U. also subpoenaed many of the same companies, said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer for the organization. 'We have asked for information that is relevant to the lawsuit, such as information to show that filters are effective,' he said. Mr. Fine declined to say how many companies were subpoenaed and what questions they were asked."

Republicans Taking Aim At 527 Groups. The New York Times (3/31, Hulse, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports that "to many Republicans, the liberal activist organization MoveOn.org is a political boogeyman that they hope to chase off with new restrictions on so-called 527 groups. But the pursuit may turn out to be fruitless." MoveOn.org has "already figured out what it thinks is a better, and less controversial, way to spend its millions. Its 527 — named for a section of the tax code — is being put on ice." Still, "two years after 527's burst onto the political scene, gaining notoriety by raising unlimited amounts from private donors, Congressional Republicans are moving to rein in the groups — just in time for the November midterm elections. Leading Democrats are threatening a fight." House GOP leaders intend "to bring a plan to impose new restrictions on 527 groups to the floor next week to spur action in the Senate, where Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a champion of the campaign finance bill that bears his name, is offering similar legislation."

The AP (3/31, Abrams) reports the bill "to require groups known as 527s to register as political committees and abide by contribution limits is likely to meet resistance from Democrats, who in 2004 relied on 527s as a key source of financing." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said, "I will strongly oppose it."

Judge Rules FEC Failed To Rationalize Decision Not To Regulate 527 Groups. The AP (3/31, Locy) reports the Federal Election Commission "failed to give a good reason for refusing to rein in nonprofit political groups that spent huge sums in the 2004 presidential elections, a judge has ruled in a case brought by President Bush's campaign and lawmakers." In a 34-page opinion, US District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan "said the FEC failed to give 'a reasoned explanation' for its decision not to issues rules to require so-called '527' groups to register as federal political action committees and face the same strict fundraising, spending and disclosure rules PACs do." Sullivan "stopped short of saying the FEC had abused its discretion. Nor did he order it to develop rules to crack down on the groups' fundraising and spending." Rather, the judge "in his ruling Wednesday sent the issue back to the FEC and ordered the commission to 'articulate its reasoning,' or come up with a rule for the groups 'if necessary.'"

The Washington Post (3/31, A5, Edsall, 744K) reports Judge Sullivan "rejected requests by the Bush-Cheney campaign and by two advocates of campaign finance legislation to order the Federal Election Commission to impose tough regulations on "527" political committees that put more than $400 million into the 2004 elections. Instead, in a ruling issued late Wednesday evening, the judge gave the FEC a choice: Either explain in detail why regulations are not needed or begin proceedings to develop such rules."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Alabama House, Senate Cannot Agree On Voting Bill. The AP (3/30) reports, "The Alabama Senate and House can't agree on how to make sure military serving overseas get to vote in the primary runoff election this summer. … But the U.S. Justice Department is pressuring both to find a solution. It is suing the state, claiming there is not enough time between the primary election June 6 and the runoff June 27 for military personnel overseas to get and return absentee ballots." The AP continues, "The Senate voted 20-5 Thursday for a bill that would delay primary runoff by three weeks from June 27 to July 18 to make sure the military have time to get and return absentee ballots for the runoff. … On March 16, the House voted 100-1 for a bill that would keep the runoff on June 27, but would allow soldiers overseas to use special ballots. The ballots, which would be delivered with the primary ballots, would allow soldiers to mark their runoff preferences in races with three or more candidates. … Now, either the Senate must agree with the House-passed bill, or the House must agree with the Senate-passed bill."

DOJ Officials Set Record Straight On Milwaukee Police Shooting Case. In a letter to the editor of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/30), Wan J. Kim, Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, and Steven M. Biskupic, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, write, "A recent article and an editorial in your paper reported that the Civil Rights Division 'overruled' a decision by the U.S. attorney's office to prosecute an officer in the tragic fatal shooting of Justin Fields. … That is not true. Prosecutors from both of our offices, with more than a half-century of combined experience, carefully investigated and reviewed this matter and ultimately concluded that federal prosecution simply was not viable." Kim and Biskupic continue, "Their consensus is plain from the letter that closed this case, which stated that 'this (United States Attorney's) Office and the Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division . . . have concluded that there is not a federally prosecutable criminal case here.'" Kim and Biskupic add, "Your editorial also erroneously claims that civil rights prosecutions have declined by 40%. To the contrary, the Justice Department has brought more criminal civil rights cases - and convicted 40% more law enforcement officials for misconduct - in the past five years than the preceding five." Kim and Biskupic conclude, "What happened to Justin Fields is indeed a tragedy and we express our deep sympathies to his family. They deserve to know that our decision not to prosecute was made after a thorough and searching analysis of our comprehensive investigation. … Neither the family nor the community are served by any suggestion that our decision was based on something other than the facts and the law."

Court Monitor Says Violations Persist At Mississippi Training Schools. The AP (3/31) reports, "A federal court monitor says violations continue at Oakley and Columbia juvenile training schools." The AP continues, "In a report covering Aug. 1 to Dec. 15, 2005, the monitor says most of the conditions of the agreement that ended a Department of Justice lawsuit against the state over conditions at the two training schools were not met. A report that covered May and June last year, also was critical of the state's progress." The AP adds, "The schools serve 550 youths combined - boys ages 10 to 17 at Oakley in Hinds County and girls 10 to 18 at Columbia. … The current report cites, among other things, student complaints about staff cursing them and using inconsistent disciplinary practices and continued fights between students. … Court monitor Joyce Burrell said she was aware that the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has impacted the Mississippi Department of Human Services. … 'But the needs of this population and those rights that were determined to have been violated must be corrected as quickly as possible,' Burrell wrote in the report filed in U.S. District Court in Jackson. … State officials entered a four-year consent decree with the Justice Department last May."

Massachusetts High Court Rules Nonresident Gay Couples Can't Marry In State. CNN's The Situation Room (3/30, Blitzer) reported, "The Massachusetts high court ruled today same sex couples from other states cannot legally marry in the Bay State. A ruling by that same court three years ago made Massachusetts the first state to legalize gay marriage." Republican Governor Mitt Romney "ordered local officials to uphold a century-old state law barring non-residents from Massachusetts. Eight gay couples challenged the law accusing Romney of discriminating against same-sex couples but the state high court ruled in favor of the possible presidential contender." The New York Times (3/31, Belluck, Zezima, 1.19M) says "the decision by Mr. Romney…was backed by the state's attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, a Democrat."

The Washington Post (3/31, A8, Powell, García, 744K) notes Romney "called the decision a victory for 'traditional marriage.' … 'We don't want Massachusetts to become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage,' Romney told reporters. 'It's important that other states have the right to make their own determination of marriage and not follow the wrong course that our Supreme Judicial Court put us on.'"

The Washington Times (3/31, Wetzstein, 90K) reports, "To date, 44 states have laws or amendments that uphold traditional marriage and ban same-sex "marriage," said the Massachusetts Family Institute, which supports traditional marriage." This year, "voters in at least seven states -- Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- will have constitutional marriage amendments on their ballots."

Alabama Bill Would Pardon Segregation Law Breakers. The Alabama House yesterday unanimously passed a bill to pardon Rosa Parks and hundreds of others who were arrested for violating the state's segregation-era laws. The New York Times/AP (3/31), "The original bill was amended to say that the arrest records would not be expunged or sealed from public view, but would be turned over to the State Department of Archives and History. That way, backers said, the records will provide a permanent record of civil disobedience that, in many cases, helped lead to desegregation."

Schiavo's Family Creates Foundation To Combat Euthanasia. To mark the anniversary of her death, Terri Schiavo's family announced the creation of a foundation in her name to combat euthanasia. The Washington Times (3/31, Debose, 90K) reports, "The foundation's mission will be to eliminate the persistent vegetative state, the condition that doctors said Mrs. Schiavo was in, as a diagnosis for patients, said her brother Bobby Schindler. But the foundation, which also will have a separate lobbying organization, will seek to have feeding tubes classified as ordinary care for hospital patients and to make people aware of the need to have advance directives or living wills in case they cannot communicate their wishes late in life."

Georgia Attorney Challenges Courtroom Pledge. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (3/31, Land) reports, "Attorney Donald A. Weissman won't have to stand for the Pledge of Allegiance when he goes to court in Gwinnett, Ga., today, but he's still concerned that others will feel compelled to declare their loyalty to the U.S. government in order to get a fair hearing from Magistrate Judge Mark A. Lewis." The Report continues, "Lewis, hearing civil cases for a Gwinnett Superior Court judge tied up with a criminal trial, begins each day in court by turning to face the U.S. flag and reciting the pledge. … Lewis said he started the practice after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." The Report adds, "Weissman recently complained about the practice in a letter to Lewis and the court administrator. … According to Gwinnett County Court Administrator Philip M. Boudewyns, Lewis said that he would forego the pledge when Weissman is present, but will continue the practice on other days. … Thursday, the judge responded officially, entering an order chiding Weissman for passing the complaint letter -- which had been marked 'confidential to be opened by recipient only' -- to the Daily Report. … Lewis also defended his actions by citing a 2003 Georgia Supreme Court decision that said a judge's request that jurors stand for the pledge 'shows no bias, either for the State, or for one who is charged by the State with a crime.'"

Blacks Steadily Closing "Digital Divide." In what the New York Times (3/31, Marriott, 1.19M) calls a "remarkable closing of the 'digital divide' that many experts had worried would be a crippling disadvantage in achieving success," African Americans are "steadily gaining access to and ease with the Internet." While civil rights leaders, educators and national policy makers "warned for years that the Internet was bypassing blacks and some Hispanics as whites and Asian-Americans were rapidly increasing their use of it," the "falling price of laptops, more computers in public schools and libraries and the newest generation of cellphones and hand-held devices that connect to the Internet have all contributed to closing the divide, Internet experts say."

Indiana Firm Admits Role In Concrete Price-Fixing Scheme. The AP (3/31, Wilson) reports, "A second central Indiana company and its president have agreed to pay millions of dollars in fines after admitting they conspired to fix the price of ready-mix concrete paid by homeowners, building contractors and the government." The AP continues, "The U.S. Department of Justice announced the guilty plea by Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. Inc. of Fishers on Thursday. The company was charged in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis with violating the federal antitrust Sherman Act, which prohibits restraint of trade." The AP adds, "Government attorneys allege that Builder's President Gus B. 'Butch' Nuckols III hosted at least two price-fixing meetings of central Indiana concrete executives at a horse barn next to his house in Fishers, a northern suburb of Indianapolis. … 'Price fixing threatens our free market system and robs consumers of the benefit of competitive prices,' Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, said in a statement. 'We vigorously investigate and prosecute companies and individuals involved in these conspiracies.' … The company issued a statement Thursday saying it 'remains committed to its central Indiana employees, customers and local communities.' … Four former executives of another company, Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield, were sentenced to prison for their role in the scheme in December, and IMI was fined $29.2 million, the largest fine ever in a domestic antitrust investigation. … The investigation is continuing, the Justice Department said."

DOJ Probing McClatchy Purchase Of Knight Ridder Newspapers. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/31, Said, Writer) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators have begun looking at McClatchy Co.'s $4.5 billion purchase of Knight Ridder, an investigation that is legally required for any transaction of that size. Regulators may also be looking at what the pending sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times would mean for competition in the Bay Area." The Chronicle continues, "A U.S. Department of Justice spokeswoman confirmed that the department is looking at the deal, announced earlier this month, which would make McClatchy the nation's No. 2 newspaper company. 'We will review it carefully,' she said." The Chronicle adds, "McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers and promptly said it will sell 12 of them. Those papers include the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, which have a combined daily circulation of 495,000. … One potential buyer is MediaNews Group of Denver, which already owns nine Bay Area dailies with a combined circulation of just over 300,000." The Chronicle notes, "The director of a local media consumer watchdog group said he was interviewed by the Justice Department on Wednesday about the ramifications of MediaNews buying the Bay Area papers. … John McManus, director of GradetheNews.org, which is based at San Jose State University, said he had a 45-minute interview with a Justice Department attorney about his concerns if MediaNews bought the Mercury and Contra Costa Times."

The AP (3/31, Sherman) reports that the DOJ attorney "asked about the impact of a MediaNews buyout on advertisers, rather than on consumer prices or news quality. But he was willing to listen to concerns about concentration of ownership on the news product," according to McManus. "Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed that antitrust lawyers are examining the proposed McClatchy-Knight Ridder deal, but she would not comment on specifics about the inquiry."

DOJ Questions EU Case Against Microsoft.

Dow Jones (3/31) reports, "The U.S. government says it has 'substantial concerns' about European regulators' antitrust case against Microsoft Corp., according to a person who has seen a letter sent to regulators." Dow Jones continues, "Relations between Brussels and the software giant have 'hit a new low,' the letter said. … The U.S. letter could re-ignite transatlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Commission, the regulatory arm of the European Union, notoriously blocked General Electric Co.'s planned merger with Honeywell International Inc.. Since then, Neelie Kroes has succeeded Mario Monti as the commission's top antitrust official." Dow Jones adds, "The letter is particularly delicate, since Kroes is seen as a more 'pro- American' commissioner than Monti, a U.S. diplomat said. The diplomat said ' Washington ordered (its) E.U. mission to send the letter,' noting that Microsoft has been pressuring U.S. officials and politicians to intervene on its behalf." Dow Jones notes, "The commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said the regulator received the letter via email Monday and also met with a U.S. diplomat to discuss its contents. … The U.S. has questioned Brussels' treatment of Microsoft before. The March 2004 decision was described as 'unfortunate' by R. Hewitt Pate, then the head of the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division."

Bloomberg (3/31, Rega) reports, "The U.S. said it wanted to ensure that the commission treated the company fairly, according to a copy of the two-paragraph letter seen by Bloomberg News. … The EU ruled in March 2004 that Microsoft illegally abused the dominance of its software, which runs on more than 90 percent of the world's personal computers, and fined it a record 497 million euros ($601 million). The regulator is threatening an additional 2 million euros in daily fines unless the company provides 'complete and accurate' information to competitors on how the Windows operating system communicates on networks. … In February, Microsoft demanded 'full access' to the case file, accusing the commission of violating its rights of defense. The commission refused to release letters between the regulator and two experts it hired to help on the case, arguing that the correspondence is 'internal.'"

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Cohen) reports, "U.S. intervention, in an email to EU regulators and European capitals, comes at a delicate time. The case could reignite trans-Atlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Union notoriously blocked U.S.-based General Electric Co.'s planned merger with Honeywell International Inc. More recently, the U.S. and EU have worked to harmonize how they deal with business regulation, but Microsoft and the EU have been escalating their public battle. … Separately Wednesday, a U.S. district court in California quashed a Microsoft bid to move the fight into the U.S. legal system. The company asked the court to help it obtain documents related to its European antitrust case from U.S.-based rivals Oracle Corp. and Sun Microsystems Inc., which participated in the case. Microsoft had complained that European regulators weren't giving it enough information to prepare its challenge."

The New York Times (3/31, Meller) reports, "United States diplomats visited the offices of three European commissioners earlier this week. Jonathan Todd, the spokesman for the competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, confirmed that her close aides met American diplomats this week and received the memo. He declined to comment on its content. … The diplomats also visited the offices of the internal market commissioner, Charlie McCreevy, and Gunter Verheugen, vice president of the commission, according to the person close to the commission." The Times notes, "A United States official denied that the American government was coming to Microsoft's aid in the antitrust dispute. 'Our interest is less that than wanting to see that everything is done properly,' said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the tenuous nature of the matter."

Whirlpool Attorneys Were Right About DOJ Review Focus. Dow Jones (3/31) reports, "Whirlpool Corp.'s antitrust attorneys had it pegged right all along. … They had predicted that the Justice Department wasn't going to decide the merits of a Whirlpool acquisition of Maytag Corp. on the basis of market share but rather on whether the bulked-up company, which already is the world's largest appliance maker, could change industry dynamics and raise prices, to the detriment of consumers." Dow Jones continues, "Indeed, in giving its stamp of approval to the $1.7 billion acquisition Wednesday the government's antitrust watchdogs focused on pricing power. … 'Market shares are not always likely to be the best predictor' of how his agency would rule, new antitrust unit chief Thomas Barnett said at a news conference Wednesday." Dow Jones adds, "Last July Mark C. Schechter, a onetime Justice Department official who now specializes in antitrust issues at the Washington law firm of Howrey Simon Arnold & White LLP, and was among those advancing Whirlpool's case, had told Dow Jones Newswires that the merger would pass DOJ muster. … He said the regulators would consider whether the acquisition could give Whirlpool enough power to profitably raise prices at least 5%, an outcome Schechter considered 'implausible.' … That analysis ran counter to what became a mini-groundswell of misplaced opinion, on Wall Street and in the financial press, on how the government would rule in what some saw as a barometer of the Bush administration's views on business competition."

Judge Sanctions Gateway For Missing Evidence In Patent Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Lawton) reports, "A federal judge in Utah harshly reprimanded Gateway Inc. for destroying or losing evidence 'in bad faith' in a patent-infringement case brought by an inventor against the computer maker." The Journal continues, "The plaintiff, Phillip M. Adams, a former International Business Machines Corp. engineer, filed the suit in 2002 after talks fell through with Gateway in 2001 over licensing his patented technologies that address a defect in circuitry used to control floppy-disk drives. Mr. Adams asserts in the lawsuit that Gateway violated a nondisclosure agreement signed between the parties, and that the company infringed on his patents. He later added allegations that Gateway lost or destroyed documents needed to help prove his case, which is scheduled to go to trial Monday." The Journal adds, "U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart sided with Mr. Adams, in a ruling that was issued March 6 and unsealed March 22. He chastised Gateway for failing to disclose information that a magistrate judge had found central to the case. Although he found no 'direct' evidence about Gateway's intentions, he cited 'ample circumstantial evidence' that Gateway acted in bad faith.'"

Apple Defends iTunes Logo In London Court. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Patrick) reports, "To the classical strains of Antonio Vivaldi's 'Gloria,' a lawyer for Apple Computer Inc. yesterday argued in a high-profile United Kingdom court case that the company's iTunes service simply distributes music and isn't in the music-production business." The Journal continues, "The classical soundtrack contrasted with the first day of the hearing Wednesday when a lawyer for Apple Corps, the Beatles record company, demonstrated his points with the 1970s disco hit 'Le Freak.' … Behind the courtroom demonstrations in England's High Court, however, is a serious legal case: The Beatles' company claims Apple Computer is in breach of a 15-year-old agreement designed to end years of fighting between the companies over use of the Apple name and logo." The Journal adds, "Apple Corps wants the Cupertino, Calif., computer company to stop using the Apple logo on the iTunes service and in advertisements for it. But Anthony Grabiner, the Apple Computer lawyer, said the company's iTunes music store was no more than a 'data-transmission service'" and that using the Apple logo on iTunes is to tell visitors that the iTunes software was created by Apple and has nothing to do with the music being sold. … The outcome of the case could affect Apple's thriving digital music business, which has helped transform the company into an electronics and entertainment powerhouse from a maker of personal computers. While selling music through iTunes isn't a huge money-maker for the company, it is an important companion business for Apple's iPod, the digital music player that accounted for $2.91 billion, or more than half of the company's $5.75 billion, in revenue in the holiday quarter."

NRC Has Yet To Approve FPL, Constellation Merger. In its coverage of the $11 billion merger between FPL Group Inc. and Constellation Energy Group of Baltimore, the Palm Beach Post (3/31, Swartz) reports that "an explosion" happened Thursday in the Maryland Legislature. "That state's lawmakers voted to create a special counsel that would review utility mergers, thus delaying the deal" and while the bid "by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly still has to be approved by Gov. Robert Ehrlich, a Republican who is up for reelection" Ehrlich "hasn't said whether he'd veto the bill." The Post notes that the headaches in Maryland seem to be driven by deregulation and adds that the merger has yet to be approved by "shareholders of both companies as well as state and federal regulators, including the Federal Regulatory Energy Commission and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission."

Colony Capital Makes Rival Bid For Aztar. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Sanders) reports, "Colony Capital LLC offered about $1.5 billion for casino operator Aztar Corp. three weeks after Aztar entered an agreement to be acquired by rival casino operator Pinnacle Entertainment Inc. The move sets off a possible bidding war for the Phoenix company best known for its Tropicana properties in Las Vegas and Atlantic City." The Journal continues, "Colony will offer $41 a share and would seek to refinance the $723 million in debt that Aztar carries, the company said. On March 14, Pinnacle of Las Vegas offered $38 a share for Aztar, or about $1.45 billion, not including the debt. … Colony, a closely held real-estate firm, owns the Las Vegas and Atlantic City Hilton hotel-casinos. … Colony's unsolicited offer may be the first salvo in what could be a heated bidding war for a small casino company that has underperformed. Aztar's $1.52 billion in market value is significantly lower than industry rivals like MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc."

JP Morgan In Talks To Buy Bank Of New York Branches. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Sidel, Riley) reports, "Many of the nation's financial institutions favor one of two strategies when it comes to retail branches: build it or buy it. … J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. is aggressively pursuing both." The Journal continues, "The nation's third-largest bank based on market value is in discussions to acquire about 300 branches from Bank of New York Co., according to people familiar with the matter. The deal would take the form of an asset swap in which J.P. Morgan would transfer a portion of its corporate-trust business to the bank that was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784." The Journal adds, "Representatives of both banks declined to comment on any possible deal, which was reported yesterday by CNBC. It wasn't immediately clear if any cash would change hands as part of a transaction. Wall Street analysts, who have long speculated that Bank of New York would jettison the bulk of its retail business, have estimated the branch network's value at about $4 billion. … People familiar with the situation said a transaction wasn't imminent, noting that the deal's structure is complex. Bank of New York is seeking the asset swap over an outright sale, these people said, because the retail business represents a hefty 15% of its total profits -- an amount that can't be easily replaced on the bottom line. Such a structure also would help Bank of New York avoid paying the higher taxes that usually accompany a big cash or stock deal."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DOJ To Enter Virginia Landfill Negotiation. The Suffolk (VA) News-Herald (3/29, Williams) reports, "The Southeastern Public Service Authority has asked the U.S. Justice Department to review a private landfill owner's proposal to put construction rubble and debris in SPSA's landfill." The News-Herald continues, "On March 13, days after a Suffolk Circuit Court judge dismissed his $20-million lawsuit against the public regional waste authority, landfill owner John C. Holland proposed an arrangement between his business and SPSA." The News-Herald adds, "Under the proposed contact, John C. Holland Enterprises Inc. would dispose of four to eight 20-ton trailers of construction debris every day at SPSA's landfill on U.S. 58. SPSA would be paid $630 n the same rate that the agency receives from Bay Transport, the other company that hauls for SPSA, based on Holland's proposal. … The authority's board of directors and legal counsel are concerned about potential state and federal anti-trust violations, said John S. Hadfield, SPSA's executive director. … On March 22, SPSA's board of directors indicated it would issue the Holland Enterprises a contract that would expire June 30, 2006, as soon as the proposed contract is approved by the U.S. Justice Department, according to a letter to Holland's lawyer Gary H. Baise. Receiving that approval is expected to take 30 to 60 days, said SPSA's lawyer Michael R. Katchmark."

Interior Department Officials Report Net Increase Of Wetlands. The New York Times (3/31, Barringer, 1.19M) reports that because the Interior Department's definition of a wetland includes golf course water hazards and other man-made ponds, "at a time of continued marsh depletion, pond inflation permitted Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton and Agriculture Secretary Mike

Johanns to announce proudly on Thursday the first net increase in wetlands since the Fish and Wildlife Service started measuring them in 1954. Wetlands acreage, measured largely by aerial surveys, totaled 107.7 million acres at the end of 2004, up by 191,800 acres from 1998. The two cabinet secretaries hailed the apparent reversal in the long trend of wetland losses. … A net total of 523,500 acres of swamps and tidal marshes had been lost, but the Fish and Wildlife Service measured gains of 715,300 acres of shallow-water wetlands, or ponds. According to the report's author, Tom Dahl, those can be 20 to 30 feet deep."

Report: Meth Sweeping Through Indian Country. From Arizona's San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation, USA Today (3/31, Wagner) reports meth "is sweeping through Indian country, tearing families apart and leaving a trail of violence and tears. … Native American leaders nationwide — but especially in the West — report a meth-induced surge of domestic violence, juvenile sex and meth-addicted babies, while federal authorities say foreign drug cartels are targeting tribal lands as distribution beachheads. … At Wyoming's Wind River Reservation, 25 tribal members were arrested by Bureau of Indian Affairs and Drug Enforcement Administration agents last May in connection with a drug ring."

Judge Clarifies Ruling Suggesting FBI Link To Oklahoma City Bombing. The AP (3/31, Foy) reports, "A federal judge on Thursday rewrote a sentence to clarify a ruling that had suggested Timothy McVeigh received help from paramilitary militias in the Oklahoma City bombing and that the government had an informant in the bombing conspiracy." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball had issued a decision that called those two claims 'fact.' Asked if he was endorsing the conspiracy theories, Kimball issued a new decision late Thursday to attribute both claims to a Salt Lake City lawyer." The AP adds, "The lawyer, Jesse Trentadue, is trying to expose FBI evidence he contends will show the bureau was tipped to McVeigh's plans but failed to stop the Oklahoma City bombing. FBI officials have repeatedly refused to address Trentadue's claims. … Trentadue is also trying to prove that his brother - a bank robber who died in federal custody after being picked up on a parole violation - was mistaken for an associate of McVeigh's in the frantic search for conspirators after the bombing, and was killed by federal agents during an interrogation gone awry." The AP notes, "In his original 23-page decision, released late Wednesday, Kimball singled out one FBI teletype already released to Trentadue, but in heavily edited form. … The judge, who has inspected the unedited version of the memo, first wrote: 'The plaintiff (Trentadue) points out the fact that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh.' … The judge rewrote the sentence to eliminate the word 'fact' and substitute: 'The plaintiff claims that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh.'"

DEA: Drug Ring Used Tombstones To Smuggle Cocaine. The AP (3/30, Barrett) reports, "Federal agents on Thursday said they had broken up a ring of drug smugglers who used tombstones featuring the Virgin Mary to move hundreds of pounds of cocaine into New York from Mexico. The Drug Enforcement Agency announced arrests of 12 people as part of the conspiracy. … 'Like grave robbers who have no respect for the dead, this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City,' said John Gilbride, the special agent in charge of the New York DEA office." The drug bust received wide media coverage, with news outlets making more than 90 references to it. The AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of ABC News, FOX News, CNN, Canada's CBC News, the San Diego Union Tribune, Tampa Tribune, Houston Chronicle, and the Knoxville Tennessee News Sentinel.

UPI (3/30) reports the DEA "said the investigation, called Operation Omni Presence, resulted in the arrests of 11 people and the seizure of more than 425 pounds of cocaine and $474,000 in cash."

WABC-TV, New York (3/30) reports on its Web site, "Eyewitness News has obtained photographs that show the lengths some drug organizations will go through to smuggle cocaine into the country, and more specifically New York. Sources tell us at least 10 suspects have been arrested in New York as part of an international drug ring that used tombstones with the image of the Virgin Mary on them to smuggle drugs."

DOJ_NMG_0024347

New York Daily News (3/31) reports, "The New York angle began to emerge last May when the NYPD, the DEA and Nassau County narcotics cops tailed a dealer running drugs between Houston, Washington Heights and Atlanta."

Two "Major" Drug Rings Broken Up, At Least 15 Arrested. The New York Times (3/31, Lambert) reports two major drug-trafficking rings that "smuggled huge amounts of cocaine from Mexico — some of it concealed in tombstones engraved with the image of the Virgin Mary — and shipped it to the East Coast were broken up yesterday in multiple raids by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies nationwide. … The tombstones were tracked from Mexico to a warehouse in Brooklyn, where investigators found broken pieces of those that had already been opened." The Times says according to the DEA, some intact tombstones remained, and officers found cocaine bricks inside of them. That raid "found 196 kilograms of cocaine with a retail value estimated at $8 million to $12 million." The Times adds that at least 15 people have been arrested.

State Police Announce Cocaine Bust. WCBS-TV, New York (3/30) reports on its Web site, "New York State Police announced a major bust of a multi-million dollar cocaine distribution network. … Police executed eight search warrants throughout Suffolk County that resulted in the seizures of 210 kilograms of powder cocaine with an approximate street value of $40 million. … The DEA Long Island District Office, Suffolk County Police Department, the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office and the Nassau County Police assisted the New York State Police."

Local TV Coverage. KTRK-TV , Houston (3/30, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Ten people were arrested, and agents say those drugs were smuggled into the country by a trafficking organization."

KOAT-TV, Albuquerque-Santa Fe, New Mexico (3/30, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Drug smugglers are apparently using the Virgin Mary to bring cocaine into the US. The Drug Enforcement Agency issued the pictures today. They show just how the drugs are hidden."

WBAY-TV, Green Bay-Appleton, Wisconsin (3/30, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "You might be surprised at the latest path illegal drugs are taking to get to the US. The DEA just released these pictures of a recent bust where hundreds of pounds of cocaine were found hidden inside statues of the Virgin Mary. Police say the method is similar to what was shown in an episode of the hit show 'Lost.' Officials confiscated nearly 500 thousand dollars and arrested 11 people in connection with the statues."

WXYZ-TV, Detroit (3/30, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Tombstones of the Virgin Mary were used to smuggle cocaine into the US. In addition, they also smuggled cash, and ten people [were arrested].

Federal Agents Arrest Reputed Philly Drug Kingpin, Seven Others. The Philadelphia Daily News (3/31, Caparella, Gambacorta) reports, "A reputed drug kingpin who sells hip-hop clothing and music out of a South Street-area business has been arrested with seven others in four states in a major sting involving a 210-kilogram shipment of Mexican cocaine, $5 million in cash and 14 weapons. … The FBI, the DEA, the IRS, New York and Pennsylvania State Police, and Philadelphia police raided at least 15 locations in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland in the past two days in the ongoing federal drug investigation. At roughly 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, armed agents in flak jackets hit the Teagle Co….owned by Omar Teagle, 33, a reputed Philadelphia drug kingpin, according to authorities." The Daily News adds, "Yesterday, Teagle and two other suspects, George Rodgers and Donnell Ball, appeared briefly for a federal hearing that was postponed until today while Assistant U.S. Attorney Curtis Douglas prepared their criminal complaints."

MLB To Investigate Players' Steroid Use. The networks last night each reported on the baseball steroid investigation last night in a full segment. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 6, 2:25, Berman, 8.78M) reported, "With slugger Barry Bonds poised to break the game's most revered records, baseball vowed to determine once and for all if he broke the rules." The investigation, "led by former Senator George Mitchell, will focus on allegations published in the new book, 'Game of Shadows, that Balco Labs in California provided a slew of steroids for bonds and other Major Leaguers. But Mitchell promised to go beyond Bonds and follow whatever leads he may find into the game's steroid-laden past."

The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 7, 2:15, Mason, 7.66M) reported, "Selig said accusations in the new book, 'Game of Shadows,' that home run champion Barry Bonds used steroids as early as 1998 triggered the inquiry, and he tapped former Senator George Mitchell to lead it." Selig: "He has my permission to expand the investigation and to follow the evidence wherever it may lead." The "scandal has made the game's national sponsors squeamish. Bank of America and Home Depot have refused to support any celebration of Bonds' quest for the all-time home run record unless he's cleared of steroid use."

NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 4, 2:30, Taibbi, 9.87M) reported, "Even in spring training Barry Bonds has heard lots of boos. Fans sick of hearing about steroids reacting to this book just out about steroid-provider Balco and about Bonds' five years of alleged use of steroids and other performance enhancers to fuel his late-career power surge: Now, baseball's official investigation."

Mitchell Has Power To Expand Steroid Probe. USA Today (3/31, Bodley, 2.31M) reports that Selig "emphasized that Mitchell has the authority to expand the scope of the probe if necessary. … 'Should Sen. Mitchell uncover material suggesting that the scope of the investigation needs to be broader, he has my permission to expand it,' Selig said.'

Arab Drug Traffickers Selling Cocaine From South America. The White House Bulletin will report later today that Arab drug trafficking gangs are moving cocaine from South America to Europe and the Middle East, where some profits are ending up with radical groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration. In response, DEA is zeroing in on the smugglers' base of operations in South America's notorious Tri-border area, a crime-ridden no-man's land where Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay meet. The lucrative drug trade could become "an unlimited source of cheap and easy revenue" for terrorist groups, DEA Chief of Operations Michael Braun warned Congress in testimony yesterday afternoon. A $6,000 kilo of Latin American cocaine, he noted, goes for $110,000 in Israel and $150,000 in Saudi Arabia. Key to the crackdown, officials say, will be going after the flow of money generated by the illicit trade.

Sentencing Expected For Three Charged In International Drug-Smuggling Investigation. The Vancouver Sun (3/30, Mulgrew) reports on the expected sentencing of three men charged for their involvement in a large, international cocaine smuggling ring. Their arrests in August 2001 "were part of the culmination of an incredibly complex, law-enforcement initiative that spanned the continent and targeted organized crime." The Sun continues, "The RCMP, the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, border security forces and other law-enforcement agencies would ultimately begin surveillance and wiretaps on dozens and dozens of individuals. Soon, they would be chasing people involved in supplying most of the marijuana consumed in Atlantic Canada, other individuals involved in shipping hundreds of kilograms of pot at a time to the U.S. and, of course, another parcel of people involved in importing massive amounts of cocaine from Mexico through the U.S. and into Canada."

Trial Continues For Former Massachusetts Narcotics Investigator. The Malden (MA) Observer (3/31, Keough) reports Jurors in Boston's U.S. District Court "are working their way through a wealth of witnesses and audio evidence to determine whether former Malden drug detective David Jordan did his best to single-handedly prevent a drug deal, or if he participated in a staged raid and used the cover of his officer's uniform to steal cocaine." Jordan "is being charged with conspiring to sell cocaine, cocaine possession, using a gun in the commission of a drug offense, witness intimidation and giving false information to Drug Enforcement Administration agents."

New Orleans Man Held Until Trial. The AP (3/30) reports that Brian Expose, who was "arrested last week with a cache of drugs and weapons, then set free without bond by New Orleans judge, will remain in federal detention pending trial on drug-dealing charges. … Expose was arrested March 21st by New Orleans police and Drug Enforcement Administration agents, after an investigation and surveillance of his home produced evidence he was selling drugs."

Five In New Jersey Indicted On Weapons Charges. The Asbury Park (NJ) Press (3/29, Jones) reported, "Five Monmouth County residents, including a former corrections officer, were indicted Tuesday on charges of selling a dozen guns and a bullet-proof vest — and trying to sell a live hand grenade — to a government witness, authorities said." John Velba, William Schreiber, Cheryl Britton, Harold Smith and Kevin Benn each are "charged with one count of conspiracy and one count of engaging in the business of dealing in firearms without a federal license to do so. … FBI agents arrested all five people on Nov. 1, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a prepared statement Tuesday."

Increasingly Popular Gun Shows Draw Supports, Critics. Knight Ridder (3/31, Thomas) reports that gun shows, "which gained popularity in the 1990s and now number in the thousands nationwide…are coming under increasing fire as critics claim they are contributing to the incidence of violent crime. … 'Gun shows are one of our main problems,' said Kansas City Mayor Pro Tem Alvin Brooks. 'These are the guns that end up on the streets of America.'" Knight Ridder continues, "Critics contend that the biggest problem is a legal loophole that allows criminals and others who are prohibited from buying a firearm to obtain guns from unlicensed sellers at guns shows. In most states, including Missouri and Kansas, no background checks are required to buy long guns - including assault rifles - from sellers who do not have a federal firearms license. … Gun-rights advocates maintain, however, that there is no 'gun show loophole.' … 'If anyone is involved in the trade of selling and buying firearms, they have to obtain a federal firearms license,' said Andrew Arulanandam, director of public affairs for the National Rifle Association. 'That is the law of the land today, so to say that there's a loophole is disingenuous.'" Knight Ridder notes, "Paul Marquardt, a spokesman for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Kansas City, said the agency is more concerned about 'the people who illegally sell firearms to criminals' such as felons, illegal aliens or drug traffickers. … 'The ATF does not target gun shows, we target criminals who are trying to acquire firearms from any source whether it's in a back alley or anywhere else,' Marquardt said."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Optimistic About Passage Of Immigration Reform Bill. In Cancun, Mexico today, President Bush met with Mexican President Vincente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Hunter. As the AP (3/31, Pickler) reports, "the immigration debate is receiving a lot of attention at the summit." USA Today (3/31, Jackson, 2.31M) reports Bush "told Mexican counterpart Vicente Fox on Thursday he supports a temporary 'guest worker' program, but said the final decision belongs to Congress -- where many of Bush's fellow Republicans oppose the idea. 'I told (Fox) there is a legislative process that's going forward,' Bush said."

According to the New York Times (3/31, Thompson, Sanger, 1.19M), "in an effort to reassure Mexicans and to defuse an intense debate in the United States," Bush told Vicente Fox "that he supported proposals to legalize undocumented workers as long as they were not given any advantages over immigrants who entered the United States legally." In fact, says Fox News' Special Report (3/30, Cameron), Bush "said he was optimistic about a deal in Congress and went out of his way to say that a guest worker program is not the same as amnesty."

NBC was the only network to cover the summit, highlighting the immigration debate as an introduction to its report on the Senate debate. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 3, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "They looked like good neighbors today, dressing down for a tour of Mexico's ancient Mayan ruins." Bush and Fox "were united calling for a process to put illegal immigrants on a path to legal status." President Bush: "We don't want people sneaking into our country who are going to do jobs Americans won't do. We want them coming in an orderly way." Gregory: "But in Congress today, the debate was still hot." Meanwhile, CNN's The Situation Room (3/30, Quijano) reported that Vicente Fox "acknowledged to reporters that the immigration issue was largely out of his and President Bush's hands, saying it was essentially up to the United States Congress." Despite Fox's comments, the AP (3/31, Pickler) says "both leaders were clearly trying to sway the debate," and Bush "gave Congress a long-distance push Thursday to open the United States to immigrant workers."

The Washington Times (3/31, Dinan, 90K) offers a different take on the story, under the headline "Fox Pledges More Border Control." The Times says Fox "yesterday promised President Bush that his country will do more to control the US-Mexico border and will strengthen its own southern border to reduce the number of aliens crossing into Mexico to reach the United States." The Times adds, "The emphasis on border security reflects the political climate in the United States on immigration, where the only point that nearly all voters agree on is that the borders leak and the U.S. government has failed to control them."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gaouette, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that "for Fox…the meeting brought the immigration debate full circle: He took office seeking to improve relations with the United States, particularly over immigration." But "that relationship was disrupted by the United States' attention to its campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11 attacks, and then by differences between Fox and Bush over the Iraq war, which Fox opposed."

The Washington Post (3/31, A13, Fletcher, 744K) focuses on the same issue, saying Bush came to the meeting is "hopes of repairing fissures that have developed in the relationship among the North American neighbors." The relationship "between the United States and both its neighbors has been characterized in recent years by creeping distrust over issues such as illegal immigration and the implementation of US trade policy."

Bush "Emerging Slowly" From "Touring Shell." Knight Ridder (3/31, Douglas), meanwhile, says Bush "traded in his business suit Thursday for a white tropical short-sleeve shirt and khaki slacks as he played tourist, something he rarely does on foreign trips." The President "was all smiles and business casual as he spent about an hour walking through the impressive ruins of Chichen-Itza, a Mayan archeological site about 127 miles west of Cancun." Bush "has earned a reputation for being an indifferent tourist at best on overseas trips, dashing through museums and exhibits or leaving social and cultural events early. He typically prefers to stick to business and not interrupt his routine. … The president seems to be emerging slowly from his touring shell. … On Thursday, Bush looked like a man having fun and in no hurry."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gerstenzang, 958K) runs a similar story, in which it says "Given a choice, President Bush is not a tourist. When he visited St. Petersburg, Russia, in 2002, he completed his tour of the Hermitage museum in two hours, 16 minutes. … As president, he has been to Rome. He skipped the Colosseum. Berlin? He drove past the Brandenburg Gate without stopping. He did the Great Wall of China in a half-hour flat, then turned to a reporter and said, 'Let's go home.' And four weeks ago, he caused a diplomatic row by refusing entreaties while in India to visit the Taj Mahal." The Times adds, "All of which make his activities Thursday morning that much more remarkable."

GOP Deeply Divided As Senate Debates Immigration. As the Senate debate on immigration reform continued yesterday, the Wall Street Journal (3/31, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that "in deference to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.), debate had been confined" to narrow "border-security bill favored by conservatives and the House." But yesterday, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "was allowed to bring out the broader Judiciary measure that will be the focus going forward." That bill includes guest worker and other provisions backed by the President. Democrats "believe they can deliver 42 votes for the bill, and Mr. McCain's office appeared confident that 18 Republicans can be found to bridge the difference and invoke cloture to cut off a filibuster." But Frist" said last night that 'cloture doesn't have the votes to pass now even if they had all 45 Democrats.'" The White House's "worst fear regarding the legislation is that it will collapse in the Senate, denying Mr. Bush the chance of getting the House to consider a more comprehensive approach to immigration."

The GOP split on immigration continued to dominate the coverage of the Senate debate. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 3, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Some Republicans are arguing that people don't want a guest worker program." Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado: "They want to secure the border and they want to go after the people who are hiring people here illegally." Gregory: "Others warn against isolationism." Sen. John McCain, Arizona: "But, by God, we have got to continue those traditions of freedom, democracy and hope for every person all over the Earth." Gregory: "Some Republicans fear this debate will hurt the party with Hispanics after President Bush successfully courted their votes."

Like NBC, many media outlets this morning highlight comments by Sens. Frist and McCain and GOP Rep. Tom Tancredo, a leading immigration. All three may run for president in 2008. Coverage of Tancredo's criticism of Bush (he said, for example, "I wish he'd think about the party, and of course, I also wish he'd think about the country") is particularly widespread. Tancredo is even profiled by the Washington Post (3/31, A1, Murray, Reid, 744K) in a front-page story this morning. Titled "Tuning In To Anger On Immigration," the piece recounts that "after Tancredo suggested in 2002 that President Bush's views on immigration amounted to a national security threat, White House political adviser Karl Rove told him, 'Don't ever darken the door of the White House' -- although Tancredo later was invited to the White House for a bill signing." Tancredo "has appeared more than 1,000 times on radio talk shows in recent years and has become a television news mainstay."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Koppell) reported that the Senate is "shaping up into two camps." On one side, "you have the Majority Leader, Bill Frist, who's saying that essentially to lay out a path to citizenship, to the 11 to 12 million illegal immigrants in this country, is tantamount to amnesty. On the other side, you have many Republicans and Democrats who are saying if you don't lay out that path, if you don't offer them a way out, what do you do?" CNN added, "Over in the House today -- as you know, the House already passed its legislation -- very tough border enforcement, but nothing to do with what many people refer to as a guest worker program. One of the leading proponents of the House legislation is Tom Tancredo, Republican of Colorado, who stood before an enormous banner with an X going through the word 'amnesty.' He said that according to recent polls, Americans are not in favor of legalizing those illegal aliens."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M), in its "Washington Wire" column, analyzes the immigration debate's impact on McCain and Frist's presidential prospects. McCain, says the Journal, "gains from improving odds for immigrant guest-worker program. House Speaker Hastert's openness to guest-worker compromise enhances Arizona senator's reputation for driving Hill action. Championing White House priorities, on immigration as well as Iraq, fuels his hopes for wooing Bush loyalists." Meanwhile, tough border-security talk by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "McCain's 2008 rival, could produce inroads among conservative Christians; by 64%-29%, evangelical Protestants call immigrants a burden rather than a benefit in new Pew Hispanic Center poll."

The debate over whether the bill would represent "amnesty" also took center stage yesterday. Dana Milbank writes in his Washington Post column (3/31, A2), "the use of the word 'amnesty' -- more than 50 times on the Senate floor yesterday -- says much about the immigration debate. Proponents of the 'guest-worker' path toward legalization appear to have gained the upper hand; Specter seems to have the votes in the Senate, and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is rethinking his chamber's hostility to a guest-worker plan. Opponents, therefore, need to escalate the rhetoric and invoke the A-word." Democrats, "who favor the guest-worker plan, called in a polling firm, Lake Research Partners, to provide talking points to counter the amnesty charge. 'Lead with an enforcement message,' the firm advised, and propose 'reasonable solutions' that are also 'tough and fair.' Lake continued: 'Immigrants have to pay taxes...and be learning English.'"

McCain took to the airwaves last night to make the case the a guest worker plan is not "amnesty." Sen. John McCain was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (3/30) about Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's criticism that his guest worker proposal is "amnesty" for immigrants in the US illegally. McCain said, "Let me just say that the definition of amnesty, as I read it in the dictionary, is forgiveness for crime, sin, et cetera. This is a tough, tough row to hoe for anyone who has violated our laws by coming to this country illegally. There's 11 or 12 million of them. We require them to pay back taxes, criminal background checks, $2,000 fine, work for six years before you're eligible for a green card. We're talking about 11 years or more in order to obtain citizenship. On the flip side of that is, they are here. They are here. And as George Will said, it would take 200,000 busses from San Diego to Alaska to transport them back. How would you possibly go about sending people back to the country that they came from? Our proposal is to make them earn citizenship, and through a very tough, rigorous procedure, which we don't believe is amnesty, nor by any definition of the word."

McCain said on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (3/30), "Everybody knows that we have to fix the problem of our broken borders and that we have 11 million to 12 million people in this country who are here illegally. So I want to make one early comment. That is the President's comments in Cancun today I thought were very helpful. He said we need a viable guest worker program and make people go to the end of the line, but give them a chance to earn championship."

The AP (3/31, Fournier) says polls "show the issue has the potential to divide Democrats as well as Republicans. Many working-class Democrats resent what they consider to be a constant flow of cheap labor. The hard-line House bill was backed by 36 Democrats, including those considered most in danger of losing their seats in November." Still," the fear is most palpable among GOP leaders. Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman said his party's challenge is to improve border security 'and do it in a way that is pro-immigrant.'" The AFP (3/31) says the debate sets Bush against "hard-line Republicans," while the Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gaouette, 958K) says it "pits the needs for post-9/11 border security against the economic and humanitarian concerns of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country." Another Los Angeles Times story (3/31, Gaouette, Gerstenzang) says the "competing visions" in Congress, "reflect attitudes among Americans, according to a poll by the nonpartisan Pew Hispanic Center. Like lawmakers, Americans are increasingly concerned about illegal immigration, with 52% seeing such immigrants as a burden to the country. And, like lawmakers, Americans are divided on how to deal with the issue."

House Conservatives Criticize Bush, Warn Leaders Not To Compromise With Senate. Under the headline "Conservatives Stand Firm On Immigration," the New York Times (3/31, Hulse, Swarns, 1.19M) reports "conservative House Republicans bluntly warned their leaders Thursday against any immigration compromise that would allow temporary foreign workers and assailed a Senate proposal that would open the way for illegal immigrants to earn citizenship." The "sharp divisions among Republicans illustrated the difficulty Congress would have in reaching agreement, particularly with midterm elections looming."

The Washington Times (3/31, Hurt, 90K) reports Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, said of voters, "They will remember in November," and "many of those who have stood with our Republican majority in the last decade are not only angry, many of them plan to be absent from the polls" this year when the entire House and one-third of the Senate is up for re-election." GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California "fired a warning shot specifically at Sen. John McCain. … 'Those elected officials who are insisting on a guest-worker program and diluting the efforts of border security and internal enforcement are telling the American people exactly whose side they are on,' Mr. Rohrabacher said. 'The American people now have that opportunity to make that determination, and they will. Senator McCain and others will find out about that, when they find their own career is short term.'" Rep. Tom Tancredo, who "leads the House immigration reform caucus, offered a simple explanation for why Mr. Bush is pushing a guest-worker program that voters don't want. 'He's not running for re-election,' Mr. Tancredo said yesterday. 'I wish that he would recognize the dangerous position he would place himself in and the rest of his agenda if the Republicans lose the House and Senate, which they could easily do on this issue. Although he's not running for re-election, I wish he would think about the party. And, of course, I wish he'd think about the country."

Rohrabacker Says "Prisoners," Not Illegals, Should Pick Up Crops. The AP (3/31, Espo) also reports House conservatives "criticized…Bush, accused the Senate of fouling the air, said prisoners rather than illegal farm workers should pick America's crops and denounced the use of Mexican flags by protesters Thursday in a vehement attack on legislation to liberalize US immigration laws." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher said, "I say let the prisoners pick the fruits."

Guest Worker Issue Also Divides Liberals, Organized Labor. The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Weisman, 744K) reports, "New economic research that pits native-born workers against low-skilled immigrants in a struggle for jobs and wages has fueled a rift between some of Washington's most liberal lawmakers and their allies in economics and labor, who fear that the Democratic Party is pushing an immigration policy that forsakes the party's working-class mainstay." The Post adds, "At issue is a guest-worker provision that would allow hundreds of thousands of foreign workers legal access to the U.S. labor market each year and the impact those new low-wage workers would have on stagnant wages. An unusual coalition of business groups, immigration advocates and labor unions with large immigrant memberships have come together to support the guest-worker program proposed by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.)." Kennedy, "the Senate's liberal lion and an unflagging ally of organized labor, says the legislation he co-wrote would help all low-wage workers by applying minimum-wage laws and other workplace protections to immigrants and undocumented workers, who are often exploited." The AFL-CIO "and many economists strongly disagree."

Senate Votes To Launch Study On Illegals' Deaths. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "The Senate today approved an amendment to launch a study of how many illegal immigrants die trying to cross US borders, which Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) described as 'an immense humanitarian tragedy.'" The 94-0 vote "provided little hint of the tumultuous votes to come."

Few Temporary Visas Available For Skilled Immigrant Workers. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 8, 2:20, Lewis, 9.87M) reported, "By law, only 65,000 people a year can get" temporary skilled workers visas, and "it's difficult for them to become permanent residents. The same is true for foreign students pursuing high-tech subjects at American universities. When they complete their education, many are forced to go home, taking their skills home with them." But "unions and other organizations representing high-tech workers oppose liberalizing the visa and green card regulations."

The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Kalita, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Most See Visa Program As Severely Flawed," and reports "opponents say the highly skilled foreign workers compete with and depress the wages of native-born Americans." Meanwhile, "supporters say foreign workers stimulate the economy, create more opportunities for their US counterparts and prevent jobs from being outsourced overseas. The problem, they say, is the cumbersome process: Immigrants often spend six years as guest workers and then wait for green card sponsorship and approval."

Protests Continue. The New York Times/AP (3/31) reports from Houston, "Dozens of students were arrested or cited on Thursday." The students who were arrested "were among thousands in Texas and elsewhere who left class this week to rally in support of immigrants." They "were arrested after 150 students left class and refused to get on buses to return, Lt. Robert Manzo of the Houston police said." The Washington Post (3/31, B1, Bahrampour, Stockwell, 744K) says "demonstrations among high schoolers and middle schoolers spread yesterday as 1,500 students in Northern Virginia and a smaller group in Maryland poured into the streets to protest proposed federal legislation that would crack down on illegal immigrants." The Post adds that protesters were "draped in flags of Latin American countries."

High School Principal Raises Mexican Flag On Campus Flagpole. The Washington Times (3/31, Richardson, 90K) reports, "A high-school principal who raised the Mexican flag on a campus flagpole as a show of support for Hispanic students was disciplined yesterday as the school district grappled with massive student walkouts." Robert Pambello, principal of John H. Reagan High School in Houston, "received 'appropriate disciplinary action,' said Terry Abbott, a spokesman for the Houston Independent School District, adding that no details would be released because it was a personnel matter."

Latino Immigrants Becoming Integral Part Of North Carolina's Economy. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 8, 3:00, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "Many of the jobs" taken by Latino immigrants in North Carolina "are off the books. By one estimate, employers and illegal immigrants are shortchanging the Federal Government by $35 billion in unpaid income taxes. According to one new study, each Latino resident is costing North Carolina taxpayers $102 a year. But the equation is complex." John Kasarda, Kenan Institute, University of North Carolina: "The economic output of this state is increasingly dependent upon Hispanics." Snow: "Farmers rely on the hard-working immigrants. … Without them, these small towns wouldn't survive."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) editorializes that "the most important political outcome" of the immigration debate "may turn out to be the message that Republicans send about the kind of the party they are and hope to be." Republicans face a choice between "Ronald Reagan's view of America as a 'shining city on a hill'" and "the chauvinist conservatism usually associated with the European right. How Republicans conduct and conclude their immigration debate will show the country which kind of 'conservative' party they want to be."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (3/31, 958K) argues that California's two senators, Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, "have not distinguished themselves in recent years on immigration issues, but this week it has been heartening to see them on the correct side of the momentous debate in the Senate. California is an iconic state of immigrants in this iconic nation of immigrants, and its representatives in Washington should be on the side of enlightened reform," referring to a "broad" guest-worker program.

In its "Opinionline," USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) surveys editorials from around the nation. The Parsons Sun from KS, in a signed editorial by Ann Charles says, "While a U.S. House-passed bill would make the presence of these laborers a felony and require fencing 700 miles of the border along Mexico, the reality of that would cause an earthquake in the US economy." The Middletown Journal from OJ, in an editorial: "The federal government's unwillingness to secure our borders and to stop the steady rush of people illegally coming into the United States threatens to overwhelm local communities' resources, services and employment opportunities. … It's time for Congress and the White House to do their jobs." Also, the Lufkin Daily News, in TX, editorialized: "It would be difficult to find even one American citizen who has not benefited in some way from the fruit of undocumented workers' labor. And with the exception of full-blooded Native Americans, every American is either descended from immigrants or is an immigrant himself."

Daniel Henninger, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M), "It's not a coincidence that the first push-back Immigration Act emerged in the Roaring Twenties, another period of abrupt social disruption and anxiety with heavy immigrant inflows from southern Europe. It may be too much to hope, but the purpose of political leadership in such times is to find a path toward our best lights rather than our darkest impulses. At the moment, Senator Frist of Tennessee isn't measuring up."

Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (3/31, A19, 744K), "It's frustrating. The three overlapping forces that have sent this country in so many wrong directions -- the conservative movement, the neoconservative movement and the Republican Party -- are warring among themselves, doing their best impression of crabs in a barrel, and sensible people can't even enjoy the spectacle. That's because it's hard to take pleasure in the havoc they've caused and the disarray they will someday leave behind."

In his New York Times column (3/31), Paul Krugman says he is "all in favor of…offering those already here a possible route to permanent residency and citizenship. Since we aren't going to deport more than 10 million people, we need to integrate those people into our society." But he is critical of "the plan to create a permanent guest-worker program."

TAX:

Judge Raises Questions About KPMG Tax-Shelter Prosecutions. The New York Times (3/31, Browning) reports, "A federal judge raised questions yesterday about the prosecution of 16 former KPMG employees over aggressive tax shelters, criticizing prosecutors for what he called murky definitions of fraud and evasion." The Times continues, "The judge, Lewis A. Kaplan of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was confused by what prosecutors said was a conspiracy by the defendants to make and sell aggressive shelters that allowed hundreds of wealthy investors to evade $2.5 billion in taxes from 1996 to 2002. … 'Was the fraud and evasion in the execution or the design' of the shelters, Judge Kaplan asked during a hearing held to consider defense motions to drop or alter some charges." The Times adds, "Judge Kaplan made no ruling yesterday; he is expected to issue orders on the motions in coming weeks."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Davies, Burns) reports, "Prosecutors contend the shelters were sham products designed, sold and implemented to improperly avoid paying taxes. The shelters were sold to about 600 wealthy individuals from 1996 to 2002 and generated about $2.5 billion in tax savings, prosecutors say. … Lawyers for the defendants argued that a separate settlement KPMG reached with prosecutors last year has hampered their clients' defense. The deferred-prosecution agreement required KPMG to admit to criminal wrongdoing and pay $456 million to avoid a criminal indictment that probably would have put the firm out of business. It makes it difficult to get current KPMG employees to testify freely about the case, say defense lawyers. … They also claim prosecutors pressured KPMG into not paying legal costs for those who were indicted. Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle said the government played no role in KPMG's decision."

Spitzer Rebuts WSJ On H&R Block Challenge. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (3/31), New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer writes, "In your March 24 editorial 'The Spitzer Savings Plan' you reported that I was upset at the H&R Block Co. … That much is true. … Compared with the array of frauds my office has uncovered -- including biased stock research, improper trading of mutual funds and bid-rigging in the insurance industry -- H&R Block's conduct was in certain ways particularly egregious. … That's because the company was preying on lower-income people, steering them into individual retirement accounts that were virtually guaranteed to lose money because of high fees and low interest rates. And H&R Block had the audacity to suggest that it was actually doing people a favor. Here are the facts to show why that claim is absurd:" Spitzer continues, "H&R Block told its tax preparation customers that its Express IRA 'paid great rates' and was a 'better way to save.' Some 500,000 people signed up. But instead of receiving 'great rates,' the Express IRA actually paid less than 1% interest at times. … Most importantly, and this is the core of our case, H&R Block failed to tell customers that the Express IRA had substantial fees …" Spitzer concludes, "No true champion of free enterprise, as the Journal purports to be, would defend the failure to properly disclose fees to customers. And no one truly interested in encouraging people to save would recommend H&R Block's Express IRA. After all, how does losing money encourage anyone to save? … Finally, contrary to your characterizations, this case could easily have been settled if the company had simply agreed to return the undisclosed fees. … And for the record, I always get upset when I see people being cheated."

GOP Believes It Can Save "Modest Tax Cut Victory." The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Republicans grow confident of salvaging modest tax-cut victory. Though hitting initial April tax-day target is unlikely, strategists at the White House and on Capitol Hill predict passage of temporary extension of the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains. … Other tax proposals seek election-year political points. Senate leader Frist plans May vote on abolishing estate tax, though Republicans lack the 60 votes needed to defeat potential Democratic filibuster."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow's Future At Treasury Uncertain. The AP (3/31, Aversa) reports the departure of Andrew Card as White House Chief of Staff "is renewing speculation about the fate of Treasury Secretary John Snow, the administration's lead economic salesman for three years." Asked about "a New York Times story which said that Joshua Bolten, Bush's incoming chief of staff, wanted to make changes to the economics team and wanted to replace Snow," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "The president appreciates the job his economic team is doing." McClellan "didn't rule out changes at the helm of Treasury, saying Bolten has the authority to recommend personnel changes throughout the Bush administration. But, McClellan added: 'Any speculation at this point is way premature.'" The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M) also reports in its "Washington Wire" column about "rumors swirl of changes at Treasury following Bolten's elevation. … Dubai ports controversy hurts Deputy Secretary Kimmitt's chance of moving up if Snow departs. To replace Bolten at budget office, current deputy Joel Kaplan is seen as more politically savvy but less connected than colleague Clay Johnson, Bush's one-time classmate."

Neuharth Says Bush Should Dump Cheney, Name Rice As VP. Al Neuharth writes in USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) that the resignation of White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card started the Oval Office shakeup many have been calling for, but "for Bush to bounce back from plunging ratings, he must make more drastic White House reorganization. Two moves that might do the trick: Lobby to get Vice President Cheney named NFL commissioner, succeeding Paul Tagliabue who resigned last week. Then name Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice vice president." Neuharth says Cheney "is the real albatross for Bush. … If Bush wants a say in picking his successor, and most presidents do, replacing Cheney is a necessary first step. … Replacing Cheney with Rice would make her the front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination."

Frist Faces Undercurrent Of Criticism Over 2008 Ambition. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Curtius, 958K) reports that as he "prepares to leave the Senate and position himself for a presidential bid," Majority Leader Bill Frist "faces mounting criticism that he has proved an ineffectual majority leader whose legislative agenda increasingly is dictated by his White House ambitions." The "complaints about the patrician Tennessean by fellow Republicans intensified this week, sparked by his decision to force a Senate debate on illegal immigration. Some GOP lawmakers say his move spotlighted a public squabble within the party over a hot-button issue in an election year." But the "grumbling about Frist and decisions he has made as majority leader were evident before the flap over immigration," reflecting the "growing discontent with his performance."

Censure Said To Have "Mixed Record" In Rebuking Presidents. The Senate Judiciary Committee meets today to consider Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for his National Security Agency domestic surveillance program. The Washington Post (3/31, A17, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "Old newspaper clippings and historical writings show that censure has a mixed record as an effective means for Congress to express disapproval of presidents." One reason censure "has not had much legitimacy as a tool for rebuke is that it is expressed by a congressional resolution without the force of law, and 'you can express a resolution that apple pie and motherhood are good for American life,' says professor William W. Van Alstyne of the College of William & Mary law school. Yet it has kept on coming up."

Senate Judiciary Committee Clears Way For Courtroom Cameras. CQ Today (3/30, Carter) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee approved two bills Thursday that would pave the way for televising proceedings at all federal courts, including the Supreme Court." CQ continues, "The committee approved, 10-6, a measure (S 829) by Charles E. Grassley that would give both district and appellate court judges the option of allowing their proceedings to be televised. The bill includes a three-year sunset on the district court provision. … Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., offered an amendment to remove district courts from the bill, but it was rejected by a 7-9 vote." CQ adds, "Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has long wanted to see Supreme Court proceedings televised. His bill (S 1768), which would require the court to permit television coverage of its public sessions, is cosponsored by several committee members of both parties. … The measure, approved 12-6, would require television cameras to be allowed in the high court unless a majority of the nine justices voted not to do so in a particular case for fear they would violate due process rights."

House Passes Education Bill. The New York Times (3/31, Schemo, 1.19M) reports, "The House voted largely along party lines on Thursday to approve the main measure governing colleges and universities, adding provisions to expand student grants based on need and pressing colleges to control tuition." But "the House rejected a Democratic proposal to halve the interest rate on student loans." The Times adds, "The $70 billion proposal, which would renew the law until 2012, sets the terms for loans and grants along with the limits for maximum aid. It was last renewed in 1998."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Hechinger, 2.11M) says "the College Access and Opportunity Act sparked complaints from Democrats and higher-education groups, though Republicans changed some measures at the last minute to mollify universities." The bill "passed the Republican-controlled House…221-199." It "reauthorizes the Higher Education Act, which governs billions of dollars of federal funding for colleges and universities. The Senate is expected to take up its own version of the reauthorization in coming months." The Washington Times (3/31, Bellantoni, 90K) headlines its story "House Passes Bill To Raise Pell Grant For Poor Students," and notes "there were 14 Democrats who sided with the chamber's majority to pass the measure," while "eighteen Republicans and one independent voted with the Democrats in protest."

FBI Check Said To Have Prompted Redmond Nomination Withdrawal. The Washington Times (3/31, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Former CIA spy hunter Paul Redmond, who helped catch notorious Moscow mole Aldrich Ames, has withdrawn from consideration to become the Bush administration's top counterspy." US intelligence officials said Redmond had "been selected to be national counterintelligence executive, but backed out after the FBI held up his formal appointment by conducting a lengthy background investigation, said officials speaking on the condition of anonymity." The Times notes, "Counterspy posts at the CIA and FBI also remain vacant or held by acting officials at a time when foreign spying continues to plague the administration. FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told a congressional committee earlier this week that Chinese spying is a 'major threat' to the United States."

Boozman Among GOP Representatives At Informal Bush Chat. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (3/31) reports Arkansas' Rep. John Boozman "was one of a dozen Republican congressmen who participated Wednesday in what he described as an 'informal' meeting with President Bush." The group "talked in the White House living quarters. Boozman has been on several Air Force One flights, but he said this was his first meeting with the president 'in this kind of setting.'"

Boehner Confirms Pension Overhaul Bill Stalled. CQ (3/30, Crittenden) reports House Majority Leader John A. Boehner "made clear Thursday what lobbyists and staff members recently have suggested: Conferees will be unable to complete negotiations on a pension overhaul bill before Congress leaves town April 7 for a two-week recess." Boehner said, "I'd like to, but I'm not sure that's realistic. It's very, very difficult." CQ adds Boehner's comments "were the latest signal that lawmakers have made little progress reconciling differences on pension overhaul legislation (HR 2830) since the conference convened March 8."

New NASA Policy Permits NASA Scientists To Discuss Opinions Freely. NASA Administrator Michael Griffin unveiled new rules yesterday governing the release of information to the media and public. The New York Times (3/31, Leary, 1.19M) reports, "Two months after NASA's top climate scientist complained that political operatives in the agency's press office were trying to censor his views on global warming, Administrator Michael D. Griffin issued a new communications policy on Thursday that he called a 'commitment to openness.'" The policy "details the role of those who release information to the public directly or through the news media" and it "ensures that NASA scientists and engineers are free to discuss their work in public and state their opinions, Dr. Griffin said. When stating a personal opinion, he continued, they should make clear that they are speaking for themselves and not for the agency."

The Washington Post Weiss (3/31, A10, Weiss) reports that the release marks Griffin's "most detailed response yet to embarrassing allegations that NASA's public affairs office had sought to suppress the release of scientific information not consistent with the views of the Bush administration." The new policy "states that NASA scientists are free to talk to members of the media about their scientific findings and even express personal interpretations of those findings -- the heart of the controversy that has engulfed the agency since January. It also makes clear that scientists are not required to have a public affairs officer with them when they speak with members of the media, though Griffin emphasized yesterday in comments broadcast to NASA employees that he believes such behavior is unwise."

House Ethics Panel Proceeds On McDermott Case, No Others. CQ (3/30, Ferrechio) reports that after "15 months of near-inactivity, the House ethics committee met for six hours but managed to agree only on moving forward with one investigation: the one launched last year, targeting Democrat Jim McDermott of Washington." The 10-member panel, "could not come to agreement on a list of other potential cases awaiting scrutiny, including those related to an influence-peddling scandal under investigation by the Justice Department." Democratic Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, ranking member, "made his displeasure clear. 'The sole action that the committee agreed to take was to continue an investigation that was initiated in 2004, at the end of the last Congress. This result falls far short of the committee's obligations in the current circumstances,' he said in a written statement." CQ adds McDermott is "accused of violating House rules in December 1996, when he received and distributed to reporters an intercepted mobile telephone conversation between Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. (1979-99), and John A. Boehner of Ohio, who at the time was House Republican Conference chairman."

House Republicans, Democrats Trade Barbs On McKinney Incident. USA Today/AP (3/31, Kellman) reports House Republicans and Democrats "engaged in their own scuffle — but just a rhetorical one — Thursday, a day after Rep. Cynthia McKinney had a dustup with a Capitol Police officer." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "called the incident 'a mistake, an unfortunate lack of recognition of a member of Congress.' She said the police officer was not at fault." Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., responded, "How many officers would have to be punched before it becomes a big deal?"

McKinney Admits Not Wearing ID Pin. The Washington Post (3/31, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports that in Rep. Cynthia McKinney's statement on the incident, McKinney "admitted that she was not wearing the pin that identifies her as a member of Congress entitled to bypass Hill security checks. Why not? John Judge, a McKinney staffer, said that "a number of the women [in Congress] don't wear the pin, and some men don't either. . . . They train [officers] to recognize the members. It's not just the pin.'"

Talks Between FAA, Union Collapse. The Washington Post (3/31, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Contract talks between the Federal Aviation Administration and its second-largest union fell apart yesterday amid a set of unusual maneuvers. Shortly after noon, the leaders of the Professional Airways Systems Specialists announced they had agreed to the agency's contract terms and would send the agreement to union members -- but with full confidence that the rank and file would turn it down. Within hours, the FAA said it planned to file an unfair labor practice complaint against the union -- a step usually taken by unions, not the government." The Post adds, "If the FAA and its unions fail to reach agreements on contract extensions, the agency may declare an impasse, which sends such disputes to the Republican-controlled Congress for a 60-day review. If Congress takes no action -- more likely than not -- then the FAA's last, best offer can be imposed on the unions."

House Approves Site For Vietnam Veterans Visitors Center. In a 404 to 4 vote Tuesday, the House approved an underground visitor center near the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. The Washington Post (3/31, B1, Dvorak, 744K) reports that Rep. Richard W. Pombo, who sponsored the bill, "said he met with the chairman of the planning commission before he was convinced that legislation was the only answer to get site approval for the center, which was authorized by Congress in November 2003." The legislation now moves to the Senate.

Bush Told Bo Derek She And Bolten Together Were "A Perfect 15." The Washington Post (3/31, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports that back "during the heady days of the 2000 George W. Bush campaign, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten was known as a cool, efficient policy director, and the go-to man when actress-turned-Republican-gadfly Bo Derek -- the woman who inspired the numerical system of hotness ratings -- needed a campaign escort." When Bolten "turned 46 that August, Dubya refused to believe his staffer had received a 'Happy Birthday' phone call from the star of '10' and many legendary Playboy features -- until he grabbed Bolten's cell phone and dialed the number from the last received call, according to a source who was there. When Derek answered, the future president said, 'Bo, let me just say that you and Josh together are a perfect 15.'"

WPost, NYTimes Criticize Lobbying Reform Bill. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/31, A18, 744K) notes that the leading advocates of lobbying reform in the Senate, including the parties' two designated point men on the issue, Sens. John McCain and Barack Obama all voted against it. The Post notes, "Much more could, and should, have been done." But, if "the Senate bill is disappointing," the House "is poised to do even worse. A proposal unveiled last month by the Republican leadership would do nothing to restrict gifts from lobbyists." The Post adds, "As the proposal moves forward -- the House Rules Committee held a hearing on it yesterday -- a critical issue will be whether and how many amendments will be permitted on the House floor to try to make it tougher. It would be the height of irony if an effort to improve the functioning of the democratic process were to take place under undemocratic conditions."

An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) also criticizes lawmakers' efforts at lobbying reform noting that "the Senate has voted for a halfhearted package of reforms that would come nowhere near curing the easy money, quid pro quo culture that now bedevils the Capitol." The Times adds, "For all its shortcomings, the Senate is a light-year ahead of the House. There, reform proposals have been parceled out to committees for indefinite marination as Republican leaders face rebellious members who want no part of real reform. The chances seem slim for two-house action that truly dents the clout of the booming lobbying industry."

Fed Researches Say Data Showing Low Jobless Rate Is Accurate. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, lp, 2.11M) reports, "US unemployment really is low and the jobless rate hasn't been artificially depressed by a failure of many discouraged workers to be counted as unemployed, Federal Reserve researchers say." Their findings, "presented at a conference organized by the Brookings Institution, suggest the Fed could see strong job growth as an inflationary risk in the coming year." The study also "argues that the economy's trend growth rate will slow noticeably in the coming decade as growth in the working-age population slows and a shrinking share of that population seeks work."

Corporate Profits, Inflation Rise. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "Corporate America's share of the nation's income rebounded from the havoc of Hurricane Katrina to a level not seen in four decades, and the hurricane did a bit less damage to the U.S. economy than previously thought." The Commerce Department "said yesterday that corporate pretax profits in the fourth quarter of 2005 grew 14.4% from the previous quarter, the strongest rate since 1992. Pretax profits in the third quarter fell 4% as hurricane-related insurance payouts slammed financial results." Corporate profits "accounted for 11.6% of gross domestic product in the fourth quarter -- the biggest share of the nation's income companies have taken since 1966." USA Today (3/31, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) says "inflation also jumped as the nation grappled with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the government said Thursday." A "special inflation measure based on actual spending patterns, closely watched by the Federal Reserve, rose faster than expected. Commerce's index of consumer inflation, excluding food and energy, was revised to a 2.4% annual rate in the fourth quarter of 2005, from an earlier 2.1% estimate."

Stock Markets Have Mixed Finish. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, the Dow was down 65 points [to close at 11,150.70]. The NASDAQ was just up over 3 points [to close at 2,340.82]." USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) says the Standard & Poor's 500 lost 2.64 points to 1300.25. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Patterson, 2.11M), among other sources, also reports the stock numbers.

Cost Of Church Sex Abuse Claims Rises Despite Fewer New Allegations. The Washington Post (3/31, A3, Cooperman) reports, "The financial costs of the sex abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Church rose dramatically in 2005, even as the number of new allegations fell, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said yesterday." The Post continues, "Releasing an annual report on their efforts to prevent abuse of minors by priests, the bishops said U.S. dioceses spent $399 million last year on legal settlements with sex abuse victims and $68 million on lawyers' fees, psychological counseling and related expenses -- about three times more than they paid in 2004." The Post adds, "The church's cumulative expenditures on sex abuse claims in the United States are approaching $1.5 billion. The tally of known victims has topped 12,500. The number of priests and deacons who have been credibly accused since 1950 is close to 5,000. … In releasing the blizzard of statistics, Catholic Church officials and their academic consultants put a generally positive gloss on the data, suggesting that the worst of the crisis is over. … Karen Terry, a researcher at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said the vast majority of the abuse took place from the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s. There has been a sharp decline in the number of cases since the early 1990s, which an analysis indicates is not just a matter of a lag in reporting, she said."

The New York Times (3/31, Banerjee) reports, "The bishops also said that as a result of a provision they adopted in 2002 under a toughened policy, 94.5 percent of children in Catholic schools and Sunday school classes had been educated on keeping themselves safe from abuse, an increase from 51 percent the year before." The Times adds, "The survey said 87 percent of the new accusations involved abuse that occurred before 1990, some of it as early as 1950. Only nine accusations concerned abuse last year. … But victims' groups have argued that recent accounts of abuse and the church's resistance to extending the statute of limitations on it are renewing doubts about the bishops' commitment to solving the problem." The Times notes, "The president of the bishops' conference, William S. Skylstad of the Spokane Diocese, himself faces accusations of sexually abusing a girl in the early 1960's, which he denies. And earlier this year, after a priest in Chicago was arrested on charges of molesting boys, the archdiocese there came under fire when it was disclosed that the police had shared accusations of abuse with church officials as early as last August. The archdiocese did not remove the priest until January."

The Washington Times (3/31, Duin) reports, "The report, commissioned in 2002 by the USCCB's Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People, tracks what the country's 195 Catholic dioceses are doing to end a sex-abuse crisis that has involved 12,537 youths -- mostly boys and young men -- and 4,827 priests. … Accusations against Catholic priests decreased 28 percent last year, but the cost in millions of dollars to the nation's Catholic dioceses shot up 219 percent last year, the USCCB said. … Specifically, $139,582,157 was paid out in sex-abuse cases in 2004 -- for settlements, attorneys' fees, victim therapy and other costs. Last year, that amount rose to $445,686,548, including the $100 million that California's Diocese of Orange agreed to pay to 90 claimants in January and $120 million the Covington, Ky., diocese agreed to pay to more than 100 victims in June."

Insurers See Drug Benefit As Opening Door To Greater Presence In Medicare. The New York Times (3/31, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports that for "many big insurers, the new Medicare program is shaping up as a great opportunity. And prescription drugs may be only a starting point." So far, "about 18 million Americans are participating in the new drug program, known as Medicare Part D. If things play out the way some big insurers hope, the drug program could prove to be a feeder system into a much greater private presence in Medicare — a longstanding goal of the Bush administration." Insurers "like Humana, which says it has signed up 1.7 million Medicare drug plan members, know that the real money is not in providing drug insurance. The rewards are much richer in other types of Medicare policies, including complete managed care plans called Medicare Advantage, which are operated by the private insurers but subsidized by Medicare."

Company Says It Has Cloned Champion Cutting Horses. A Texas company says it has cloned two champion cutting horses for $150,000 each and would create as many as 30 ore cloned horses over the next year. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/31, A1, Gillis, 744K) reports, "The plans by ViaGen Inc. of Austin represent by far the most ambitious effort yet to turn horse cloning into a paying business. There's little doubt that ViaGen, with one of the world's top cloning scientists in its stable, can pull off the necessary laboratory work, and not a single government rule or regulation stands in the way. But it remains to be seen how far the U.S. horse industry will go in embracing the technique that produced Dolly the sheep a decade ago and has since come to symbolize many people's fears about modern genetic science."

Webb Eulogizes Weinberger. In the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M), James Webb, a former Navy Secretary and a Democratic candidate for the US Senate from Virginia, eulogizes former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, noting, "In this town of inflated egos and ruthless ambition, I have never met a more gracious man. And in a lifetime that, beginning with my father's military service, spans every secretary of defense, I can think of no one who has ever held that office with more competence, intellect and understanding of our country's place in the world." Webb adds, "It is painful for those who knew and respected Cap Weinberger to see his name, even in his obituaries, associated with the Iran-Contra affair, an endeavor that he himself had advised against. But his loyalties were astounding, even legendary among the Reagan inner circle."

NYTimes Criticizes "Piecemeal State-By-State Approach" To Stem Cell Research. An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) says that Maryland is about to become the fourth state to authorize the use of state funds for embryonic stem cell research, joining California, New Jersey and Connecticut "in recognizing that the federal government's abdication of support for embryonic stem cell research has effectively shifted the issue to the states." The Times adds, "This piecemeal state-by-state approach is an absurd way to conduct research that may have extraordinary importance if it pans out. Few residents of states that ban therapeutic cloning will refuse lifesaving therapies developed in other states. So it seems unfair to rely on a handful of states to fill the gaps left by the federal abdication."

WPost Urges Local Governments To Help Homeless. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/31, A18, 744K) says the growing number of homeless people in Washington "has strained the capacity of shelters and other social services. And while the problem of homelessness used to be mainly an urban one, concentrated in the District, now it is felt equally in the suburbs, where half of the region's homeless are thought to live. … It may be impossible to eliminate homelessness altogether, but minimizing it should not be beyond the means of such rich localities. Perhaps a third of the suburban homeless here have jobs. They are making a go of it, and they deserve a greater helping hand from local governments."

China, Russia Rebuff Rice's Suggestion On Iran Sanctions. The New York Times (3/31, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting…with representatives of the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, raised the idea of imposing unspecified sanctions on Iran, but she received a decidedly cool reaction from China and Russia," who "bluntly declared on Thursday that they had no interest in imposing sanctions of any sort or in taking any further action against Iran, though both countries did express concern about the nuclear program." The Financial Times (3/31) adds, "Moscow underlined its opposition to sanctions, and was backed by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the UN nuclear watchdog," and "some diplomats said the event highlighted the continuing international divisions on how to move forward."

In contrast, the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) emphasizes international solidarity on the Iran issue, leading that Rice "warned that 'the international community is united' in its dispute with Iran over its nuclear program," although it later admits "the comments hinted at the strains in the anti-Iran alliance." The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, LaFranchi, 61K) says "the brief Berlin meeting resulted not so much in a 'strategy'" but in "a reinforced show, after Wednesday's Security Council action, of international opposition to a nuclear-armed Iran."

The Washington Post (3/31, A16, Kessler, 744K) reports "senior diplomats from the five veto-wielding members of the UN Security Council and Germany warned Iran on Thursday to halt sensitive nuclear activities and return to the negotiating table," but "strains were apparent as Russia and China appeared to rule out sanctions or military action." Knight Ridder (3/31, Strobel) says "there was agreement" on the "general goal," but "there was no agreement apparent on tactics in the weeks ahead." The Washington Times (3/31, Kralev, 90K) headlines its story "Russian Official Contradicts West On Tehran,"

Iran Vows To Continue Uranium Enrichment Despite UN Demands. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 4, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Defiance from Iran about its nuclear program. The country is vowing to go ahead with uranium enrichment a day after the UN Security Council demanded that Tehran stop immediately. An Iranian diplomat said the program is 'not reversible.'" The AP (3/31, Jahn) also reports that Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Tehran's chief representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, "defiantly rejected a U.N. Security Council demand for a halt in uranium enrichment, saying Thursday that Tehran's activities are 'not reversible.'" His statements "cast a pall on a meeting of top officials of the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany."

ElBaradei Says Iran Not "An Imminent Threat." The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Fleishman, Rubin, 958K) reports, "UN Atomic Energy chief Mohammed ElBaradei urged the international community Thursday to steer away from threats of sanctions against Iran to prevent the dispute over the country's nuclear intentions from spiraling out of control." ElBaradei, speaking in Doha, "emphasized that Iran is not 'an imminent threat' and urged countries to 'lower the pitch' in their effort to stop Iran's nuclear work."

Earthquake Kills At Least 17 In Iran. The New York Times/AP (3/31) reports, "A strong earthquake followed by an even stronger aftershock jolted western Iran early Friday, killing at least 17 and injuring hundreds, state media reported."

Suicide Bomber Kills Three In Jerusalem. The New York Times (3/31, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "A Palestinian suicide bomber, possibly disguised as an observant Jew, blew himself up at a gas station in the West Bank on Thursday evening, turning a car into a fireball and killing three Israelis inside the vehicle, Israeli news reports said." Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades "claimed responsibility for the blast, which came hours after the newly installed Palestinian cabinet, led by Hamas, took up its duties in the Palestinian Authority government offices." The new Palestinian interior minister, Said Siam, "who is in charge of the police, announced that Palestinian militants would no longer be arrested by the Palestinian security forces."

Rice Says US Will Decide On Palestinian Aid Soon. The AP (3/31, Gearan) reports that Secretary Rice said "the United States should soon decide how it will give more aid to the Palestinians that would not be diverted to bankroll the Palestinian government led by the militant group Hamas." She added that "the level of future U.S. aid is one question mark, as is the problem of deciding what kinds of projects to fund through nongovernmental organizations or other means and 'what kinds of aid might in fact get diverted and so you want to avoid that.'" Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar maintains that "the Palestinian Authority's new government would not cave to international pressure to change its ways and that it has no plans to negotiate with Israel."

Abrams, Welch Visit Tel Aviv While Rice Suggests US Might Support Unilateral Separation. The Financial Times (3/31, Morris) reports White House Advisor Eliot Abrams and Assistant Secretary David Welch "met Israeli leaders yesterday for the first time since Tuesday's election after Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, indicated Washington did not rule out support for unilateral measures in the West Bank by the next government. … However, she said the US would not yet lend its support to unilateral moves until it knew more about them."

Likud Reacts To Election Debacle. The Washington Times (3/31, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "Israel's right wing found itself searching for a leader and a program yesterday after the shock of Tuesday's elections, in which the long-dominant Likud Party was reduced to one of several minor parliamentary factions. Calls are being heard for former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to be replaced as leader of Likud amid charges that he has alienated moderate voters from the nation's most dominant party of the past 30 years." The Times adds, "Rising as a new champion of the right is Avigdor Lieberman, whose party of Russian immigrants, Yisrael Beiteinu, finished with 11 seats to Likud's 12 in the final results, which were announced yesterday."

Dionne Says Israeli Election Was Dominated By Domestic Concerns. E. J. Dionne Jr. writes in his column in the Washington Post (3/31, A19, 744K) that "The world expected Israel to have an election on national security, but the voters decided that it was about the economy, stupid," as "the big winners were a group of parties that ran against Israel's rising social inequality." The "domestic social concerns rose to the top of voters' minds precisely because the security situation is frozen," and "voters can cast aside their economic concerns for only so long, even in a nation facing an existential threat."

US, EU Jointly Haul China Before WTO. The Financial Times (3/31, Swann, Minder, Mackintosh) reports, "The US and the European Union on Thursday joined forces for the first time to challenge China before the World Trade Organisation, sweeping aside diplomatic niceties weeks before a visit of the Chinese president to Washington." The Times calls the car parts complaint "provocatively timed ahead of Hu Jintao's visit." USTR Rob Portman "indicated that diplomacy would not be allowed to stand in the way of defending American industry." The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Hitt, 2.11M) reports Portman "said the 'United States has raised this issue repeatedly,' but with no success. 'As a mature trading partner, China should be held accountable for its actions and be required to live up to its responsibilities,' said Mr. Portman." Portman "said he called China's ambassador to the U.S. on Wednesday and 'expressed my disappointment' that the complaints 'had not been resolved through dialogue.'"

The Washington Post (3/31, D5, Blustein, 744K) reports the move "comes amid pressure on the administration from members of Congress to take a tough stance on China's trade practices, especially as the trade deficit with China swelled to $201.6 billion last year, the biggest US gap ever with any country." The New York Times (3/31, Porter, 1.19M) notes "the complaint is only the second brought against China since it joined the trade organization in 2001; the United States filed a complaint in 2004 over China's tax treatment of domestic and imported semiconductors."

China Seeing Surge In Protectionist Sentiment. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, Chen, 2.11M) reports that an economic uproar in China "has turned on foreigners, targeting the many outside investors that have piled into China and prospered -- even while fueling much of the country's growth. … The debate parallels the resurgence of protectionist sentiment in the U.S., which has been driven in part by concerns over China's clout." The "debate inside China is causing the government to rethink its approach. In banking, for instance, some economists and state officials argue that the government has sold foreign stakes in its major state-run commercial banks too cheaply. … The concentration of industries in foreign hands has become a common theme."

WSJournal Suggests "Vietnam-Like Compromise" For Vatican, China. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) says that Vatican is working hard at restoring ties with China, but Beijing "insists that the Holy See drop its recognition of Taiwan in exchange for the right to minister to the mainland faithful. … This is an old game," but it is "particularly odious for China to play that card on spiritual matters." The Journal adds that the Vatican "would be well-advised to demand some serious concessions in return. … Both sides might do well to agree to a Vietnam-like compromise. In Vietnam the Holy See is recognized, but must consult with the Communist government before naming new clergy. While that offends Catholic purists, it's given Vietnam's Communist Party a better image; the Church, a new flock; and the people of Vietnam, a moral purpose the party can't provide."

US Military's Efforts To Help Pakistani Earthquake Victims Noted. The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, Montero, 61K) reports from Islamabad, Pakistan, "In the last six months, some 1,200 US military personnel and a fleet of 24 helicopters have delivered over 15,000 tons of humanitarian aid, in what has been called the largest disaster relief operation in US military history. The 'angels of mercy,' as US helicopters have been called, have delivered not only aid but much needed goodwill in Pakistan, softening an otherwise rocky relationship with the United States." The Monitor adds, "Polling in recent months has shown a marked improvement for the US image among the Pakistani public as a result of the American helping hand."

Lantos Expresses Concerns About Nuclear Deal With India. The AFP (3/31) reports, "India's alleged training of Iranian troops could dampen vital US Congress support for a bilateral landmark civilian nuclear deal, a ranking Democrat warned Thursday." Tom Lantos, "the top Democrat on the House of Representatives' powerful international relations committee scrutinizing the nuclear deal, expressed concern to visiting Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran during talks here over New Delhi's training of the Iranian navy, the lawmaker's spokeswoman Lynne Weil told AFP."

Meanwhile, the AP (3/31, Klug) reports Saran said the "landmark civilian nuclear cooperation deal with the United States would not boost India's nuclear weapons arsenal said Thursday." In "often strong words," he "attacked the criticism that has surrounded a pact critics say would weaken efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. He told an audience at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, that India's record on nuclear issues has long been one of restraint and responsibility."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Richter, 958K), under the headline "US-Indian Nuclear Deal No Shoo-In," says the proposed deal "is meeting with a chilly reception from lawmakers, who are predicting that instead of swift approval, the initiative faces revisions and delays, if not outright rejection." The White House "had hoped to win congressional approval by the end of May for the deal," but "the initiative has found few high-profile champions on Capitol Hill or elsewhere, while becoming a target for criticism from the right and left that it could further undermine international efforts to stem the spread of nuclear weapons."

India Moves To Prevent Sex-Determined Abortions. The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, Baldauf, 61K) reports that New Delhi doctor Anil Sabhani "faces two years in jail in the first-ever conviction under a 12-year old Indian law that forbids doctors from revealing the gender of a fetus to its parents. The law was aimed at preventing the all-too-common and growing practice of sex-determined abortions, which have left India with far more boys than girls. Women's rights activists welcomed the convictions, but added that it will take more than a few high- profile trials to change India's centuries-old cultural preference for boys." Girls "are often seen as a drain on family wealth, since the girl's family is required by centuries of tradition to provide a dowry to her husband's family when she marries."

Sierra Leone Court Asks Hague Tribunal To Try Taylor. The New York Times (3/31, Polgreen, Simons, 1.19M) reports the Sierra Leonean government "asked the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands to provide a venue for" indicted former Liberian president Charles Taylor. "Mr. Taylor has many loyalists in the region, so his presence is a potential threat to the fragile peace that exists here and in Liberia. Secret talks between the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Dutch government about transferring Mr. Taylor to The Hague began several weeks ago." Such a transfer would require an UNSC resolution. The ICC, established in 2002, has no jurisdiction over the 1990s crimes for which Taylor, "one of Africa's most notorious warlords," is accused.

The Washington Post (3/31, A15, Timberg, 744K) reports Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf "said Thursday that she supported a bid to move the war crimes trial to The Hague and that Taylor's dignity and rights must be guaranteed as the case advanced." The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, McLaughlin, 61K), among other sources, also reports on the Taylor trial in a story headlined "Era Of Impunity Wanes For African Leaders."

Venezuelan Candidate Opposes Election Boycott. The New York Times (3/31, Forero, 1.19M) reports that while most of Venezuela's "fragmented opposition" is boycotting the presidential election this year, Julio Borges "is running for office," working "against long odds to win over supporters of President Hugo Chávez." Borges "argues that boycotting elections only adds to [President Hugo] Chávez's power and has already made Venezuela in effect a one-party state. Proponents of a boycott say Mr. Chávez has undermined the institutions of democracy, so they seek to undercut his legitimacy by spoiling elections."

Trachoma Remains Endemic In Third World. The New York Times (3/31, Dugger, 1.19M) reports that trachoma, a disease which disappeared from the US and Europe as living standards improved, remains "endemic in much of Africa and parts of Latin America and Asia, its last, stubborn redoubts." Blinding damage from the disease "builds over decades of repeated infections that begin in babies. The infections are spread from person to person, or by hungry flies that feed from seeping eyes." The Times adds, "As prevalent as trachoma remains, the W.H.O. has made the blinding late stage of the disease a target for eradication within a generation because, in theory at least, everything needed to vanquish it is available. Controlling trachoma depends on relatively simple advances in hygiene, antibiotics and" an inexpensive eyelid operation, but "the extent of the disease far exceeds the money and medical workers available."

French Constitutional Court Affirms New Labor Law. France's Constitutional Council has upheld the constitutionality of a new labor law yesterday in what the New York Times (3/31, Smith, 1.19M) calls "a blow to opposition Socialists who had asked the council to strike it down but extending the crisis now facing the government." Meanwhile, French students "kept up pressure, blocking roads and railways, tying up traffic and halting train service in several cities. The country's influential union syndicates have promised another day of nationwide strikes and protest marches on Tuesday." The Times adds that the ruling "throws the onus for resolving the crisis on President Jacques Chirac, who alone has the power to send the law back to Parliament. But he is widely expected to back his embattled prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, who insists that the law be put into effect."

The Washington Post (3/31, A13, Moore, 744K) reports, "The 10-member Constitutional Council ruled that high youth unemployment rates justified the law, which would give workers under age 26 fewer job protections than older employees. The council also said 'different treatment' for young workers was justified because the law was enacted in the interest of improving job opportunities for them." The Post adds, "Chirac's office said the president would address the country on national television Friday night for the first time since students and labor unions launched demonstrations that often have ended in violence and confrontations with riot police in Paris and other cities across the country."

Author Says Public Supports Student Demonstrators. In an op-ed translated from the French by the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M), author Corinne Maier writes, "The point of the new labor law is to encourage businesses to hire young people without worrying they'll be stuck with them forever. … It's true that French society is hierarchical and rigid, and the disadvantages of employment "flexibility" (a word the French detest) have so far fallen mostly on the weakest: minority groups, women with few marketable skills and young people. … What will happen next? The young demonstrators and the major unions demand the withdrawal of the C.P.E.; surveys show that two-thirds of the public are in sympathy with them." Maier adds, "Mr. de Villepin is getting little support in his own camp as he stands firm. And Paris waits to see what springtime will bring next."

Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) Afro-Cuban doctor Dariel Ferrer "sinned against the Revolution," when "noting the country's abysmal state of health care," he "established an independent health and human rights clinic." In Cuba, "his work scandalizes the state. It has rewarded him by shutting him out of the official medical community and refusing to allow him any form of gainful employment. … Dr. Ferrer is a victim of what human rights observers say is the one of the most brutal crackdowns in the island's history, one that has received little notice in the US."

At Least 44 Dead In Bahrain Ferry Accident.

ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 5, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The US Navy has joined a rescue mission after a passenger ferry capsized off the coast of Bahrain today. At least 44 passengers died. Dozens of survivors were pulled from the waters." The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 6, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) also reported the story.

NYTimes Says US Embassy Should Drop Fight Over Congestion Surcharge In London.

An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) says the American Embassy in London is refusing to pay a traffic congestion surcharge when its diplomats drive around the city. The Americans "say the fee is a tax, and add that the Vienna Convention protects diplomats from taxes abroad. … The British make a good case that the charge is not a tax, but a toll for the use of selected streets. Their diplomats, they note, regularly pay tolls on American roads and bridges." The times adds, "This is one war the United States government doesn't need to take on. It has a real one going on. And the British -- they're on our side."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Trial Said To Contrast Nimble Al Qaeda With FBI "Lumbering Bureaucracy." Under the headline "At Sept. 11 Trial, Tale Of Missteps And Management," The New York Times (3/31, Shane, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Three weeks of testimony and dozens of documents released in the sentencing of Zacarias Moussaoui have offered an eerie parallel view of two organizations, Al Qaeda and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and how they pursued their missions before" 9/11. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed's trial statement revealed that "Al Qaeda…took its time in choosing targets," whereas, "at the F.B.I., a few agents pursued clues that would later prove tantalizingly close to the mark, but they could not draw attention from top counterterrorism officials." 9/11 commissioner Timothy Roemer said that "the picture of a large and lumbering bureaucracy trying to defend against a small and flexible enemy is striking." He added that "the court testimony…has reinforced his belief that 'Moussaoui was an Al Qaeda mistake and a missed opportunity for the F.B.I.'"

Jurors Ask Judge About WMD Definition, Conclude First Day Of Deliberations. The Washington Post (3/31, A9, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) reports Moussaoui trial jurors "completed their first full day of deliberations yesterday, with no indication of how they would resolve the question of whether" he "is eligible for execution." Jurors "paused only to ask the judge a brief question concerning the definition of weapons of mass destruction." US District Judge Leonie Brinkema told them "that the term meant using an airplane as a missile or bomb. And with that, jurors disappeared again into their deliberation room." The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Serrano, 958K) notes the use of WMD "charge is a component of one of the key allegations against" Moussaoui.

The AP (3/31, Sniffen) also reports on the jury deliberations and adds, "meanwhile, federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are investigating a government lawyer who nearly derailed Moussaoui's sentencing trial by what Brinkema ruled was improper coaching of witnesses and lying to defense attorneys. … Unlike Brinkema's finding of civil violations, a criminal inquiry will address" TSA lawyer Carla Martin's "motivation or intent."

Federal Prosecutor Probes TSA Attorney In Moussaoui Case. The AP (3/31, Barakat) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are investigating the conduct of a government lawyer who nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui by coaching witnesses on their testimony." The AP continues, "The criminal investigation of Carla J. Martin, a lawyer with the federal Transportation Security Administration, was revealed in recently unsealed transcripts of a closed March 21 hearing in the Moussaoui case." The ap adds, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in the hearing that she had been 'advised by the U.S. Attorney's Office that there may very well be a prosecution of her, at least they're looking at the possibility.' … Rob Spencer, the lead prosecutor in the Moussaoui case, responded that 'the matter has been referred to a prosecutor in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and I believe they are handling the matter.' … Prosecutors in Alexandria recused themselves from the investigation. … Moussaoui's defense lawyers have said Martin should face criminal charges for witness tampering."

WPost Concerned Moussaoui Confession Will Overshadow Truth Of His Involvement. In an editorial, the Washington Post (3/31, 744K) recounts Moussaoui's "boasting" confession at trial this week and notes, "The government and Mr. Moussaoui, at this point, are both pushing for his execution," though "their motives differ. The government is prosecuting his crime, while Mr. Moussaoui appears to be attempting to martyr himself. The danger is that in such a confluence of interests the truth falls by the wayside. That would be dangerous, in part because the government's theory under which Mr. Moussaoui is eligible for death is an expansive one that could open the door for executions of low-level conspirators in a range of criminal enterprises."

USA Today Says FBI Agent's Testimony Raises Questions About Readiness. USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) says in an editorial that the "most chilling testimony at the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui" came "from a government witness who attested in heart-rending detail to the stubborn resistance and monumental missteps that kept the FBI from capitalizing on Moussaoui's arrest four weeks before 9/11." FBI agent Harry Samit's testimony "raised questions about the nation's preparedness for the next terror attack."

UN Investigator Claims He Has "Proof" Of Secret US Prisons. The AP (3/31, Klapper) reports Manfred Nowak, the United Nations' "special investigator on torture said Thursday he was certain that there are secret U.S. prisons in Europe and he wants access to them." In an interview with the AP, Nowak said he "had proof that secret U.S. prisons continue to operate in Europe." Nowak said, "I am 100 percent sure. I have evidence." The AP adds Nowak "cited a U.S. refusal to provide details or records of interrogations later used in terrorism trials in Germany. He did not explain how that was proof of the ongoing existence of U.S. prisons in Europe, and he did not offer other examples."

Judge Criticizes Intelligence Agency Reorganization. The Washington Post (3/31, A17, Pincus, 744K) reports US Court of Appeals Judge Richard A. Posner "sharply criticized the restructuring of U.S. intelligence agencies last week, telling CIA lawyers that the overhaul has done nothing to rectify flaws exposed by al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and that the changes 'in the end . . . will amount to rather little.'" Posner said Congress' 2004 intelligence overhaul "was based on 'a deep misunderstanding of the limitations of national security intelligence'" that "came from a naive belief that intelligence agencies can somehow be made infallible." In Posner's analysis, "the director of national intelligence (DNI), created by Congress to be the president's top intelligence adviser, was given too much to do. DNI John D. Negroponte oversees the CIA and 15 other intelligence agencies, including those at the Pentagon. Negroponte's staff, which has grown to about 1,000, 'has become a new bureaucracy layered on top of the intelligence community,' Posner said."

Redmond Withdraws From Consideration For Counter-Spy Post. The Washington Times (3/31, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Former CIA spy hunter Paul Redmond, who helped catch notorious Moscow mole Aldrich Ames, has withdrawn from consideration to become the Bush administration's top counterspy." US intelligence officials said Redmond had "been selected to be national counterintelligence executive, but backed out after the FBI held up his formal appointment by conducting a lengthy background investigation, said officials speaking on the condition of anonymity."

House Panel Votes To Withhold Funds From DNI. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Miller, 958K) reports the House Intelligence Committee "voted Thursday to withhold funding from the nation's intelligence director over concerns that his office, which was created to streamline operations in the nation's spy community, is instead becoming bloated and bureaucratic." Panel Republicans also "defeated a Democratic push to suspend hundreds of millions of dollars in spy agency funding until the Bush administration provided more information about a controversial domestic espionage program being conducted by the National Security Agency." The "move to withhold funding still must be approved by the full House as well as the Senate. But it reflects rising frustration among House lawmakers with" the DNI office. However, the Washington Post (3/31, 744K) reports the committee "rejected yesterday a proposal to withhold money from the National Security Agency if the White House did not reveal information about the cost of the agency's warrantless surveillance program." Only Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), "who heads a subcommittee that oversees the NSA, voted with the Democrats to support the measure to withhold one-fifth of the agency's budget."

Hayat Prosecutors Say No Evidence Supports Informant Claim About Al Qaeda. In a widely-distributed story headlined "Prosecutors Can't Prove Informant's Claims," the AP (3/31, Thompson) reports, "In a potential blow to their terrorism case against" Umer and Hamid Hayat, "federal prosecutors on Thursday said there is no evidence to support statements by their key witness," FBI informant Naseem Khan, "that a top aide to Osama bin Laden attended a Lodi mosque in the late 1990s. The surprise move was designed to dissuade the defense from calling witnesses who would challenge the story's credibility." Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III "told reporters outside court that the government's statement about Khan 'shows that he is a liar.'" The Sacramento Bee (3/31, Walsh, 301K) also reports on the prosecution stipulation that "the government has no information indicating that Ayman al-Zawahri was in Lodi…aside from the information supplied by Naseem Khan," and notes "Sacramento FBI Special Agent Rachel Pifer, who was Khan's 'handler' from November 2001 to September 2002, testified Thursday" that she concluded Hayat's report about al-Zawahri "was 'probably not true' before she 'opened Khan up as an informant' on Nov. 14, 2001. … Questioned by prosecutor David Deitch, Pifer said the FBI 'received a lot of reports of mistaken identity' in the wake of the bureau's release of a list of its 22 most wanted terrorists."

The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/31, Bohm) reports, "Hamid Hayat didn't know it at the time, but when a new Muslim convert helped him purchase and set up a computer, that man was actually an undercover FBI agent." Special Agent Terry Rankhorn, "spoke to Hamid Hayat about four times and testified…Thursday that he was 'very cordial' and also bragged about his relatives." When Hamid Hayat's lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi asked Rankhorn whether he believed Hayat when he said that "his uncle was a highly placed politician in Pakistan who could get him rare cigars, among other things," Rankhorn said, "It seemed to be more boasting than actual fact."

Lodi Police, FBI Investigating Threat Letter Sent To Newspaper. The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/31) reports, "Lodi police and the FBI are looking into a letter sent to the News-Sentinel stating that it is among several targets of al-Qaida. … 'There is clearly a possibility this is a prank, but we have to take this seriously,' Capt. David Main said. A spokeswoman for the FBI, Special Agent Karen Ernst, said her agency is aware of the letter and is working with local police to track down its origin."

Smith Still Employed By State Department, Despite Detroit Terror Trial Charges. The AP (3/31) reports State Department security agent Harry Smith, accused of conspiring with Assistant US Attorney Richard Convertino and lying under oath in the Detroit terror trial, "remains employed by the department, an official said Thursday. … The official could not say what Smith's assignment is."

U.S. News and World Report (3/31) reports on the indictment of Convertino and Smith, noting they allegedly "conspired to mislead the jury about evidence during the 2003 trial of the case, United States v. Koubriti, in which three Middle Eastern men were accused of operating a 'sleeper cell' and convicted on a variety of terrorism and fraud charges. Theirs were the first and only jury convictions stemming from the FBI's investigation into the 9/11 terrorist attacks. But the federal judge handling the trial, Gerald Rosen, threw out the convictions after the Justice Department issued a scathing report accusing Convertino of withholding evidence that could have been beneficial to the defense."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Bill Would Drop Color-Coded Terror Alert System. The Washington Times (3/31, Hudson, 90K) reports a "bipartisan push on Capitol Hill to strip the hue from the government's color-coded terrorist alert system is gaining momentum." A bill under consideration in the House "eliminates the Department of Homeland Security's use of colors to change the threat level, and calls for more specific threat information to be shared with the private sector and local governments." The "current system, implemented by former Homeland Security chief Tom Ridge, has frustrated governors and local officials nationwide who say they are forced to spend millions responding to threat level rises without information as to whether it directly affects their region."

DHS IG Report Says $1 Billion Contract Has Done Little To Benefit TSA. The AP (3/31, Miller) reports on the release of a report by DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner yesterday, which found that Unisys, a company that received a $1 billion contract for airport security equipment from the TSA, had "performed so poorly" that the agency should put the project out for bid again. According to the report, "The original funding is almost exhausted but many airports still do not have basic information technology and a telecommunications infrastructure." The agency agreed to "put the contract out to bid again once the $1 billion is exhausted," adding that "it has strengthened its procurement oversight."

Senate, House Advance Bills To Improve Infrastructure Security. The Washington Times (3/31, Fagan, 90K) reports both the House and Senate yesterday advanced bills "that aim to improve the security of the nation's ports and other key infrastructure advanced in both the House and Senate yesterday." The Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee "approved 20-0 a bill that would reform the interagency panel charged with approving such foreign deals -- forcing more thorough investigations and congressional involvement." Meanwhile, a House Homeland Security subcommittee "approved by voice vote legislation that would boost funding for the nation's ports and improve port-security programs."

The New York Times/AP (3/31, Press) reports the congressional panels took action on the bills "to stem the furor over the attempted takeover of significant terminal operations at some large American ports by a company owned by the United Arab Emirates."

CQ (3/30, Starks) reports a House Homeland Security subcommittee "approved legislation Thursday that would authorize $821 million annually to defend the nation's seaports against terrorist attacks." The bill (HR 4954), "approved by voice vote by the Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection and Cybersecurity Subcommittee, is the first on port security to move since the DP World deal to take over management of facilities at six U.S. port collapsed."

Senate Bill Would Extend CFIUS Review Of Foreign Acquisitions. The Financial Times (3/31, Kirchgaessner) reports on the Senate Banking Committee bill, submitted by Chairman Richard Shelby, noting that "foreign takeovers of sensitive US assets could face a national security review of up to 120 days." The bill "aims to make reviews conducted by the Treasury-led interagency panel that investigations foreign acquisitions, or CFIUS, more onerous and will give Congress more oversight over the confidential vetting process." Lobbyists "expressed satisfaction that, despite the extended review period permitted in certain circumstances, the draft legislation was far weaker than proposals first put forward by Mr Shelby last week. That initial draft would have subjected nearly every foreign deal to an automatic 75-day investigation."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, King, 2.11M) also reports on the Shelby bill, saying that "US business interests, with some Senate support, have fought back, arguing that lawmakers risk scaring off crucial investors and making life harder on U.S. companies overseas." Bowing to "business concerns, the committee adopted an amendment by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.) to limit the range of cases that would require a full 45-day investigation on top of a preliminary 30-day review."

The Washington Post (3/31, D2, Blustein, 744K) reports Chairman Shelby "led a chorus of panel members who cited the ports case as evidence that CFIUS needs fixing. Noting that the heads of the agencies represented on the foreign investment committee, such as the secretaries of the Homeland Security, Defense and Treasury departments, didn't know about the deal until it made headlines, he said that 'demonstrates that the system is woefully short of transparency and has no recognizable requirements for accountability.'"

DOJ Official Stresses Survivability Of Communications Systems. Federal Computer Week (3/31, Arnone) reports, "If Hurricane Katrina taught first responders anything, it's that communications systems must survive a natural disaster before they can be used to coordinate response efforts. … That's what officials from the Defense and Justice departments told Congress today as they explained some of the steps they are taking to improve information sharing before the 2006 hurricane season starts June 1. … 'The survivability of our systems is critical,' Vance Hitch, DOJ's chief information officer, told the House Government Reform Committee." FCW continues, "The federal government must work with industry to create self-powered communications technology that can operate without traditional infrastructure, said Linton Wells, principal deputy assistant secretary of Defense for networks and information integration. … 'The federal government must continue to expand its capability to rapidly deploy commercial off-the-shelf networks, making use of satellite links, wireless local-area networks, laptop computers and 'plug-and-play' equipment to bridge the gap created by a devastated civil infrastructure,' Wells said in a statement." FCW notes, "Common operating standards and equipment are the long-term solution to interoperable communications in disaster response, Hitch said. The Justice, Homeland Security and Treasury departments are making progress toward implementing such standards through the Integrated Wireless Network (IWN), he said."

Ground Zero Redevelopment Talks Break Down. The New York Times (3/31, Bagli, 1.19M) reports Gov. George E. Pataki's "last-ditch effort to strike a deal with the developer Larry A. Silverstein to speed up the rebuilding at ground zero crashed yesterday, when he was unable to convince New Jersey or City Hall officials that it made financial sense." Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and "representatives of Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey vowed to work with Mr. Pataki to put together a new framework for rebuilding at the World Trade Center site, one that would be likely to diminish Mr. Silverstein's role."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Frangos, 2.11M) reports "talks are continuing nonetheless." Govs. Pataki and Corzine and Mayor Bloomberg "couldn't settle upon a position to take with real-estate developer Larry Silverstein, who owns the legal right to rebuild the office space there, several people involved in the negotiations say."

Emergency Calls From 9/11 Released. CBS and NBC last night both ran segments on the release of audio from 911 calls from people trapped in the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001. The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 5, 1:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "It is hard to imagine the horror of the people trapped in the World Trade Center after the September 11th attacks. Now, four and a half years later, New York City is releasing recordings of some of the 911 calls." CBS excerpted the 911 call made by 34-year-old Christopher Hanley.

NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 6, 2:15, Fratangelo, 9.87M) reported, "New York City officials notified 27 families of 911 recordings. They'll be released tomorrow but only with the voices of dispatchers. The voices of victims will be erased. Hanley's family released the entire recording to the 'New York Times.'"

Powell Says Areas Of New Orleans May Not Receive Required Levee Protection. The Washington Post (3/31, A1, Whoriskey, Hsu, 744K) reports in a front page article that Donald E. Powell, the Bush Administration's Gulf Coast rebuilding coordinator, said yesterday that parts of New Orleans "may be left without the protection of levees strong enough to meet requirements of the national flood insurance program" The Post reports Powell's announcement as "a shift for the administration," which "had pledged in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina to rebuild New Orleans 'higher and better.'" Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco called the news an "outrage" that "is totally unacceptable." Earlier, the Army Corps of Engineers had announced "that the levee reconstruction project, most recently estimated at $3.5 billion, would now cost $9.5 billion if insurance-certified levees were extended throughout the region."

ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 7, 1:30, Osunsami, 8.78M) reported, "Louisiana's Governor says she has no idea where the extra money will come from." Osunsami: "Homeowners, businesses trying to secure insurance and mortgages might be delayed until the additional money is found."

The New York Times (3/31, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "Powell said in a news briefing yesterday that the $2 billion that the Army Corps of Engineers is currently spending and the $1.4 billion in additional funds it has requested will make the system stronger and better than it has ever been. Asked if he would feel comfortable living in the area despite the government's inability to certify the levees, he responded, 'after the Corps completes its work, yes.'" The Times adds, "Although people can rebuild without the federal flood maps today, many homeowners may well decide that the risks of rebuilding are too great."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Vartabedian, 958K) reports the additional cost "could be a significant setback to rebuilding New Orleans." The Times adds, "The problem evolved in recent weeks when disparate federal agencies began grappling with complex rules and regulations that affect federal flood insurance, the technology of predicting hurricanes and certifications of levee safety standards. As a result, Powell found himself this week having to disclose to senior Bush administration officials and congressional leaders that what looked like a price tag of $3.5 billion to upgrade and repair levees in and around New Orleans had exploded almost threefold, to $9 billion."

Powell Says Full Recovery In New Orleans Could Take 25 Years. Meanwhile, in an interview with the AP (3/31, Jordan) yesterday, Powell said that New Orleans' full recovery "could take 25 years as homeowners, businesses and tourists are coaxed back." He added "that much of the city's rebirth will hinge on factors he said were 'out of our control,' including restoring housing, ensuring safety and encouraging robust investment by the private sector." NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 5, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Bush Administration's point man for the Gulf Coast recovery effort told the Associated Press today that a full recovery in New Orleans could take as long as 25 years. Don Powell said much of the city's fate depends on factors outside the government's control. He also said it may cost another $6 billion or more to repair the levees just so they'll be strong enough to clear the way for widespread building there."

WAR NEWS:

US Journalist Freed After 82 Days Of Captivity.

Jill Carroll, the freelance writer for the Christian Science Monitor who was kidnapped 82 days ago, was freed from captivity yesterday. US and Iraqi authorities did not disclose whether any concessions had been made to her captors. The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, Murphy, Peterson, 61K) reports that yesterday "Carroll's captors simply drove her to Amariyah, stopped the car, pointed her in the direction of the Iraqi Islamic Party (IPP) office at about 12:20 p.m. local time and then drove off." Carroll, who "was on assignment for the Monitor when she was kidnapped, gave a short interview to Baghdad TV, which is owned by the IIP, before being transported to the Green Zone by the US military." She "was told the interview was for internal party uses only, and didn't realize it would be broadcast. In that interview Carrroll said that for most of her ordeal she was kept in a darkened room which she later described as a 'cave.'" The Washington Post (3/31, A1, Knickmeyer, 744K) says "party leader Tariq al-Hashimi presented her with an embossed Koran in a plush box. The Koran was for the true followers of Islam, Hashimi said, and he mentioned the Iraqi people. Accepting it, Carroll said her suffering was nothing compared with theirs."

The story was the lead on each of the networks, which devoted a total of nearly 14 minutes to Carroll's release, and an additional three minutes to the problem of kidnapping in Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, lead story, 3:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush may have summed it up best, when upon hearing the news, he said simply, 'Thank God.'" US and Iraqi authorities "will not say what, if anything, they may have done to lead to her release." ABC (Harris) added, "Despite this wrenching hostage video, despite her captors' repeated threats to kill her, and despite the fact that they did kill her translator, today Jill Carroll had nothing bad to say about the people who held her for 82 days."

The CBS Evening News (3/30, lead story, 3:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "For a change, the headline from Iraq is not about death but about someone who alive, well, and free." The US Ambassador to Iraq "says none of the kidnappers was captured and no ransom was paid by the US Embassy." CBS (Logan) added, "A senior Pentagon official told CBS News tonight that Jill has declined the use of military transport to get her out of Iraq, and she has also not agreed to be interrogated or debriefed by the US military here." In a separate segment, the CBS Evening News (3/30, story 2, 2:10, Bowers, 7.66M) reported, "Whatever the reason for Carroll's release, this is a day her family will forever celebrate."

NBC Nightly News (3/30, lead story, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "For Jill Carroll, her family, and her friends, it's been an awful ordeal. And it ended with her safe release today. We'll begin here tonight." NBC (Hattori) added, "After appearing in videos as a hostage held at gunpoint, today Jill Carroll went on Baghdad TV as a free woman." In Boston, "the 'Christian Science Monitor's' editor insisted no ransom was paid." Richard Bergenheim, Editor, The Christian Science Monitor: "There is absolutely no negotiations that took place for her release." Hattori: "The US Ambassador to Iraq chose his words carefully." Zalmay Khalilzad, US Ambassador to Iraq: "No US person has made any arrangements with the kidnappers. By US person, I mean the United States mission."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Daragahi, 958K) says that "by Thursday evening, Carroll was inside the Green Zone, Baghdad's US-protected fortress-like administrative headquarters, getting unspecified medical attention while awaiting departure from the country." The New York Times (3/31, Semple, Filkins, 1.19M), Washington Post (3/31, A14, Finer, 744K), USA Today (3/31, 2.31M), Washington Times/AP (3/31, Fam) and Knight Ridder (3/31, Youssef, Awsy) run similar reports. In a Washington Post column,

David Ignatius (3/31, A19, Ignatius) comments on Carrol's release, saying "Americans should be grateful that reporters such as Jill Carroll are risking their lives to chronicle this agonizing story -- and tell Americans not what they want to hear, but what they need to know."

Carroll's Employer, Family Used Careful Campaign To Seek Her Release. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 2, 2:05, Karl, 8.78M) reported Carroll's family and employer undertook a "carefully coordinated campaign" to seek her release "that began with days of the public learning that Jill Carroll had been taken hostage." The message "that Jill Carroll is a sympathetic person attuned to the plight of the Iraqi people -- was central to her release," and her "family and her newspaper editors were coached by FBI agents who specialize in the art of hostage rescue and helped craft the message. Hostage crisis experts believe constant, consistent appeals like this are directly heard by the hostage takers."

Seven Americans Remain In Captivity. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 3, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Jill Carroll and her family have pointed out that there are many hostages whose fates remain unknown. One US soldier and six American civilians are held against their will. And for Iraqis, kidnapping is an epidemic. The Iraqi government estimates 5,000 Iraqis have been kidnapped since the war began. There's no on how many of them have been released."

USA Today (3/31, Bazar, 2.31M) runs a story on the missing soldier, Sgt. Keith "Matt" Maupin, and reports that shortly "after Maupin disappeared, his parents founded the Yellow Ribbon Support Center. Keith Maupin says he even left his job to spend more time there." The non-profit, which "operates out of a strip mall, is a bustling hub of patriotism. In the past two years, the center has shipped more than 4,500 packages to troops in Afghanistan and Iraq."

Kidnapping Is Major Problem For Iraqis. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 2, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "While a case like Jill Carroll's is very high-profile and gets a lot of attention, the fact is that in Iraq right now, the most vulnerable targets for kidnappers are Iraqis themselves. Kidnapping has become big business in Iraq and often the kidnappers are a different kind of criminal these days." NBC (Miklaszewski) added kidnapping is "lucrative for insurgents and criminals alike: Since the US invasion in 2003, 280 foreigners have been kidnapped, 46 killed, 151 freed, 83 unaccounted for. But a much larger number of Iraqi civilians are kidnapped, not for political reasons, but for ransoms as high as $100,000." USA Today (3/31, Memmott, Brook, 2.31M) runs a similar report, noting that "in Baghdad, four or five organized criminal gangs control the streets, prowling for anybody who looks non-Iraqi, says Steven Casteel, a senior vice president at the security firm Vance International." Kidnappers "want somebody who works for a company or government willing to pay for his or her release, he says." If gangs "can't get a ransom quickly, they sometimes 'sell' foreign hostages to terrorist groups. About 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since April 2003, Colton said."

Sistani Ignores Bush Letter. The AP (3/31, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "A letter from President Bush to Iraq's supreme Shiite spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, was hand-delivered earlier this week but sits unread and untranslated in the top religious figure's office, a key al-Sistani aide told The Associated Press on Thursday." The aide, "who has never allowed use of his name in news reports, citing al-Sistani's refusal to make any public statements himself -- said the ayatollah had laid the letter aside and did not ask for a translation because of increasing 'unhappiness' over what senior Shiite leaders see as American meddling in Iraqi attempts to form their first, permanent post-invasion government." The aide "said the person who delivered the Bush letter…said it carried Bush's thanks to al-Sistani for calling for calm among his followers in preventing the outbreak of civil war after a Shiite shrine was bombed late last month."

Friedman Says War Has Entered "Dangerous New Phase." Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) that the war in Iraq has "entered a dangerous new phase. It is the phase of barbaric identity-card violence between Sunnis and Shiites. … Once this kind of venom gets unleashed — with members of each community literally beheading each other on the basis of their religious identities — it poisons everything." Friedman adds, "There is only one hope for halting this slide and that is the formation…of a national unity government in Iraq, with Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds sharing power, and the deployment on the streets…of massive numbers of troops and police, both Iraqi and American, to prevent more of these tribal killings."

McCain Says Things Are Getting Better In Iraq. Sen. John McCain said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/30) that "things are getting better" in Iraq, adding, "I think they are progressing. I think that the Iraqi military is improving. I think the Iraqi police training is improving, but much more slowly. … Our ambassador is doing a great job urging that. And the president is personally involved. But these Iraqi leaders have to understand they have to form a government because they had an election. And the people of Iraq have the right to do that. Long, hard, tough. Can we do it? Yes. Will we do it? I'm confident we will. But it's -- the risks of failure are immense."

War Veterans Form Group To Back Bush On Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "War vets organize to back Bush on Iraq. VetsforFreedom.org3, a nonprofit group of recently returned soldiers, cites a 'disconnect' between what soldiers and veterans think about the war and what's portrayed in the media."

Wisconsin Towns To Vote On Referendums Asking For US Pullout From Iraq. USA Today (3/31, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "People in 32 communities across Wisconsin…will vote on referendums calling for the 'orderly and rapid' withdrawal of US troops from Iraq." Evansville, WI "is the only place where residents also will vote on a separate referendum stating that US forces should remain until 'unquestioned victory is clearly won.'" USA Today adds, "The outcome won't carry any legal weight here or in Washington." But "if all the anti-war measures pass, politicians might not be able to ignore the results, says Kenneth Mayer, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin-Madison."

Stephens Says Promoting Democracy Requires Patience. Columnist Phillip Stephens writes in the Financial Times (3/31) that there is a "spat raging in Washington between neo-conservatives past and present. Francis Fukuyama, once a celebrated cheerleader for the muscular interventionism that led the US into war with Iraq, has recanted. The invasion was a mistake. The US cannot remake the tyrannies of the world in its own democratic image. … Quiz the administration officials charged with striking these balances and they will tell you that there are never easy trade-offs. Promoting democracy, in the words of one senior official, was always going to be 'messy.'" Stephens concludes that "the frequent talk in this administration about legacy raises the suspicion that it has become a substitute for hard policy choices now. Wilsonian realism, liberal internationalism, call it what you will, requires consistency and patience. These are hard to find in a weakened presidency."

Documents Said To Reveal Saddam's Contact With Terrorists. The Washington Times (3/31, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The more documents that emerge from Saddam Hussein's reign of terror, the more evidence stacks up that his regime was in lockstep with international terrorists. Newly released papers seized after the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion reveal contacts made between Saddam's top aides and Osama bin Laden, particularly during the al Qaeda leader's stay in Sudan. … The documents show the fanatical Fedayeen operated bustling terror training camps for recruits from all over the Middle East."

Six Oil Workers Killed In Iraq As Insurgents Continue Attacks. The Washington Post (3/31, A14, Anderson, 744K) reports, "A bus ferrying oil workers to their job was forced to the side of a road in northern Iraq by masked gunmen, who ordered the workers to get off, accused them of being 'agents of the occupation' and then shot them, killing eight, police said." The workers "were all employees of one of Iraq's largest oil refineries, in Baiji, a town about 120 miles north of Baghdad." In the capital, meanwhile," one person was killed and 11 were injured in two roadside bombings; two were killed and seven injured in a car bombing; and five people were injured when a suicide car bomber detonated explosives near a police convoy."

Rahman Thanks Pope For Intervening On His Behalf. The AP (3/31, Sanminiatelli) reports, "An Afghan who faced the death penalty in his homeland for converting from Islam to Christianity said Thursday he was certain he would have been killed had he stayed there, and he thanked Pope Benedict XVI for intervening on his behalf. 'In Kabul, they would have killed me, I'm sure of it,' said Abdul Rahman, who was spirited out of Afghanistan to a secret location in Italy. 'If you are not a Muslim in an Islamic country like mine, they kill you. There are no doubts.'"

Woodruff Given Bloom Award For Reporting Excellence. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 11, 1:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Two months ago, Bob Woodruff was injured by a roadside bomb in Baghdad. Last night, at a dinner in Washington, DC, Bob was honored with the David Bloom award for excellence in reporting. The award is named after NBC correspondent David Bloom who died while covering the Iraq invasion three years ago. Bob and David were close friends as well as competitors and David's twin daughters, Christine and Nicole, aged 12, presented the award." Bob was "honored for his reporting from North Korea, Iran and from New Orleans. ABC News chief White House correspondent Martha Raddatz accepted the award and read a statement written by Bob."

Pentagon Developing Bombs To Destroy Underground Targets. The Pentagon is researching the development of weapons that can destroy deeply buried military targets. As part of that research, officials say they will detonate a 700 ton explosive in the Navada desert this June. The Washington Post (3/31, A9, Tyson, 744K) reports, "The test, code-named 'Divine Strake,' will occur on June 2 about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas in a high desert valley bounded by mountains, according to Pentagon and Energy Department officials. … The test is aimed at determining how well a massive conventional bomb would perform against fortified underground targets -- such as military headquarters, biological or chemical weapons stockpiles, and long-range missiles -- that the Pentagon says are proliferating among potential adversaries around the world."

DOJ:

On Western Swing, Gonzales Warns Youths About Online Thievery. The AP (3/31) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales brought a simple message to middle school students (in San Jose, CA) on Thursday: Don't steal. … 'I'm the top cop in the U.S. and I want you to know that if you illegally download a game or music or a video it's stealing, just as if you went into a store and stole blue jeans,' Gonzales told 7th and 8th graders at Windmill Springs School in the heart of California's Silicon Valley." The AP continues, "The lesson culminated an unusual four-day lesson on intellectual property and copyright infringement during which the nation's top law enforcement official became a classroom teacher. … Most children these days are exposed to Internet safety messages, both in television and in the classroom, but curriculum has only recently been developed about software piracy, copyright laws and intellectual property." The AP adds, "Entertainment software corporate leaders have repeatedly said the public simply doesn't understand that there are rules when it comes to usage of the Internet and computers. … But Windmill Springs students said Thursday that they got the message. … 'Most kids know it's wrong to download some movies or songs or copy games and CDs but they figure that if they can do it on a computer then they will,' said Andrew Lopez, 13. 'But not me. You can get a fine. You can go to jail.' … Gonzales said the consequences of intellectual property theft are just starting to be understood. … 'I'm not kidding myself that we have a lot of work to do, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't try,' he said."

Security Still Top Gonzales Concern. The Portland Oregonian (3/31) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave the Portland Business Alliance a quick review Thursday of the Bush administration's priorities, saying, 'Every day, I ask myself: Are we doing all that we can to prevent another attack? Are our neighborhoods safer? Are things safe in Portland?'" The Oregonian adds, "Making his first trip to Portland, Gonzales spoke to the city business group at a breakfast meeting, then he said he planned to "review the troops" in the U.S. attorney's office in Portland."

Gonzales Discusses Google Case. TheStreet.com (3/31, Wolverton) reports, "In town to talk with kids about respecting intellectual property, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez found himself addressing questions about the government's respect for online privacy." TheStreet continues, "In the middle of a legal dispute with Google over access to search records, the government has come under criticism from consumer privacy advocates. Gonzalez sought to assure critics that the government was trying to strike a 'good faith' balance between privacy interests and protecting the public. … Even though a federal judge recently restricted the amount of data the government will potentially have access to in the Google case, Gonzalez appeared unabashed by the government's request. Indeed, in determining the balance between privacy protection and how much information the government will request from private information keepers, the Department of Justice, instead of setting its own limits, will take its lead from Congress and the courts, he said. … 'Sometimes the courts will agree, and sometimes they will disagree,' he said."

Dow Jones (3/31) reports, "Gonzales said he was pleased with a federal judge's decision in the Google Inc. case two weeks ago, but that it showed there are limits to the kind of information the government can get from Internet companies." Dow Jones continues, "During an appearance here at the Windmill Springs Middle School, Gonzales reiterated that the government had not sought personal information on people using Google's Internet search engine when it subpoenaed the company in August. … 'We're not interested in any kind of user information,' he said." Dow Jones adds, "Gonzales said the judge's decision recognized that the information the government sought was relevant to its defense of the embattled Child Online Protection Act. … 'We're happy with the judge's decision,' Gonzales said, but 'there are limits to what kind of information the government can get.' … Separately, Gonzales said he pressed Chinese officials on intellectual property protection when he was in that country several months ago."

Gonzales Says Islamic Case Files To Remain Sealed. The AP (3/30, Frazier) reports, "Evidence in a dismissed case against an Ashland (OR) branch of an Islamic charity will remain confidential, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday." The AP continues, "Gonzales was in Portland to meet with the U.S. attorney's office in Oregon and to address a breakfast meeting of the Portland Business Alliance. … He said 'certain kinds of information can be and should be withheld.' … He declined further comment on the case, saying it is in litigation." The AP adds, "A federal lawsuit seeks to shut down electronic surveillance by the National Security Agency, claiming the government illegally wiretapped conversations between the director of the Islamic charity Al-Haramain and two of the charity's attorneys. … The charity had been indicted on tax charges related to money laundering in 2004, but the charges were dismissed." The AP notes, "Gonzales did not elaborate on the broader NSA wiretapping controversy beyond repeating President Bush's position that it is legal. … 'I can only talk about what the president has disclosed to the American public in December of last year,' he said. … 'We have been very, very forthcoming about his authorities,' he said. He said members of Congress continue to get briefings."

Gonzales Address Immigration Reform. KOIN-TV, CBS 6, Portland (3/31, Huston) reports, "It could be winter before Congress passes an immigration bill. That's because there is a growing split among Republicans over what to do about it. … One of President Bush's point men on the issue was in Portland Thursday morning. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales certainly has been one of the president's must trusted advisors on the issue, but he stuck with what has been the White House script." KOIN-TV adds, "Speaking to a morning breakfast for the Portland Business Alliance, Gonzales praised the local U.S. Attorney's Office for a recent meth bust which was the largest in state history. He also pledged to continue to pursue sexual predators who use the Internet, corruption in government and gang violence. … After his speech, Gonzales restated his support for immigration reform, including a guest worker program. But he offered no opinion on the legal definition of amnesty for illegal immigrants. … 'The president says he will not support a program that provides amnesty to those who have broken the law and come into our country unlawfully. But as to how you define it, that's part of the ongoing debate within the Congress,' Gonzales said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Orders Former Broker In Enron Case Released On Bail. The New York Times (3/31, Creswell, Thomas) reports, "In a surprise move, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Houston late yesterday ordered that a former Merrill Lynch executive, William Fuhs, be immediately released on bail awaiting final decision on his appeal." The Times continues, "Mr. Fuhs was one of four former Merrill employees convicted in 2004 on fraud and conspiracy charges involving a 1999 sale by Enron of power generators mounted on barges in Nigeria. Prosecutors argued during the trial that the Merrill executives were guilty of conspiring to defraud investors in an effort to win future banking business from Enron. … The appellate court said the conditions of Mr. Fuhs's release will be established today in a hearing before a federal magistrate judge." The Times adds, "Last May, Judge Ewing Werlein Jr. of the United States District Court in Houston sentenced Mr. Fuhs to three years and one month in prison. In most white-collar criminal cases, the defendants are generally allowed to remain free on bail while their appeals are heard. But Mr. Fuhs and the other former Merrill executives who were convicted were ordered to prison immediately."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Emshwiller) reports that "the federal government has been dealt a possible setback" by the ruling. " a related case involving the 2004 conviction of four former executives of Merrill Lynch & Co." In the 2004 criminal trial, involving the four former Merrill officials and two former Enron officials, the government alleged that Enron had falsely reported income from a bogus sale to Merrill of some electricity-producing barges off the coast of Nigeria. Prosecutors argued that Enron had secretly promised Merrill that it would be quickly taken out of the deal at a profit, which meant a "true sale" never took place because the brokerage giant assumed no risk. The jury also convicted one Enron official and acquitted the other. … The four Merrill officials appealed their convictions and unsuccessfully sought to stay out of prison pending those appeals. All four are currently incarcerated. Only Mr. Fuhs recently reapplied for bail pending the appeal. Attorneys for the other three Merrill officials declined to comment or couldn't be reached." The Journal notes, "People familiar with the barge case say that even if Mr. Fuhs's conviction were overturned, it wouldn't necessarily mean the others would be, too."

Skilling's Attorney Seen As Potential Key For Lay Defense. The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Johnson) reports, "Daniel M. Petrocelli is no stranger to the national stage. But he's more at home representing entertainers such as Lisa Marie Presley and John Travolta than defending former corporate executives trying to stay out of prison." The Post continues, "The California attorney is acting as a criminal defense lawyer for the first time, on behalf of former Enron Corp. chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, accused of leading one of the most complicated white-collar conspiracies in history. … And as the defense prepares to begin its case Monday, Petrocelli has emerged as perhaps the most potent factor on behalf of both his client and former chairman Kenneth L. Lay. Both men face multiple fraud charges that could send them to prison for decades." The Post adds, "There are two teams of defense lawyers, but during the prosecution's case, Petrocelli dominated the cross-examination of the government's witnesses, in part because Lay's top lawyer had health problems. … Defense lawyers are engaging in careful choreography in a trial where their clients' interests sometimes converge and sometimes conflict. In the course of the nine-week-old trial, the defendants have displayed a few subtle disruptions in their alliance. But to the surprise of some legal experts, Skilling and Lay have stuck together for the most part, despite acute differences in their personal styles and in the evidence against them. … The critical question is whether they will point fingers at each other when they each take the witness stand in coming weeks. Of the approximately two dozen witnesses the defense expects to call, the defendants are far and away the most important. In a real sense, their lives are in their own hands."

New Method For Reporting Pension Obligations Could Cause Problems. The New York Times (3/31, Walsh) reports, "The board that writes accounting rules for American business is proposing a new method of reporting pension obligations that is likely to show that many companies have a lot more debt than was obvious before. … In some cases, particularly at old industrial companies like automakers, the newly disclosed obligations are likely to be so large that they will wipe out the net worth of the company." The Times continues, "The panel, the Financial Accounting Standards Board, said the new method, which it plans to issue today for public comment, would address a widespread complaint about the current pension accounting method: that it exposes shareholders and employees to billions of dollars in risks that they cannot easily see or evaluate. The new accounting rule would also apply to retirees' health plans and other benefits." The times adds, "The board is moving ahead with the proposed pension changes even as Congress remains bogged down on much broader revisions of the law that governs company pension plans. In fact, Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the new House majority leader, who has been a driving force behind pension changes in Congress, said yesterday that he saw little chance of a finished bill before a deadline for corporate pension contributions in mid-April."

Columnist Sees New Sympathy For Corporate Executives. In his column for the New York Times (3/31), Floyd Norris writes, "Suddenly there is a wave of sympathy for overregulated corporate executives. Not only are some going to jail, but the Securities and Exchange Commission is making them pay large fines. … The S.E.C. also wants to force more disclosure of executive compensation. The commission denies that the purpose is to hold down pay, but few bosses believe that." Norris continues, "To hear some people tell it, corporate officials are being victimized in ways that can only inspire sympathy. … The United States Chamber of Commerce is calling on the S.E.C. to stop penalizing companies for refusing to cooperate in investigations and to give companies a break if they can show that some lawyer or accountant blessed the activity the S.E.C. deems illegal." Norris adds, "Just four years ago, as WorldCom was collapsing, President Bush endorsed 'corporate responsibility' and signed the Sarbanes-Oxley act with vigor. One poll then found that about two-thirds of both Democrats and Republicans thought business leaders had low standards of honesty and ethics. Politicians and even journalists received better marks. … But now many people hope to push aside the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms. … An S.E.C. advisory committee thinks bosses of companies traded on the over-the-counter bulletin board should not be asked to say whether their internal controls are adequate."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Retired FBI Agent Indicted On Mob-Related Murder Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/31, Hays) reports retired FBI Special Agent R. Lindley DeVecchio "was indicted on murder charges Thursday for allegedly taking bribes from a mobster to supply him with inside information that led to four underworld slayings in Brooklyn." He "was arrested in a case of 'confidential leaks, payoffs and death' dating back two decades, District Attorney Charles Hynes said. DeVecchio pleaded not guilty and was released on $1 million bail." The AP notes, "Colleagues of the FBI veteran were quick to defend him against the charges." The New York Times (3/31, Rashbaum, 1.19M) adds that when DeVecchio rose in court "to face charges that he had helped his prized Mafia informant commit four murders, the tension was clear. On one side of the gallery…were nearly four dozen mostly gray-haired men in dark-colored suits. Retired F.B.I. agents who had once been Mr. DeVecchio's colleagues, they were now his supporters." The Times notes DA's office chief investigator Michael Vecchione's "contention that the former agents would help Mr. DeVecchio flee prompted groans, angry grumbling and some laughter from retired agents in the gallery."

Newsday (3/31, DeStephano) reports, "Calling the case the most 'stunning example of official corruption I have ever seen,' …Hynes outlined at a news conference how DeVecchio allegedly provided Colombo crime family member Greg Scarpa with information about rivals and informants who were murdered between September 1984 and May 1992. 'Each of the informants and rivals exposed by DeVecchio posed an imminent threat to Scarpa, Scarpa's family and Scarpa's crew,' said Hynes." The New York Daily News (3/31, Katz, 729K) notes, "Sources told The Daily News yesterday that DeVecchio could face charges in as many as three other gangland murders, two of them on Long Island. The slayings are believed to be tied to a intra-clan conflict that decimated the Colombo family in the early 1990s, the source said. 'This is only one little piece in Brooklyn,' a source said. 'There are murders involved in Nassau County. There were murders in other areas.'"

Under the headline "'Mafia' G-Man's Job Power Trip," The New York Post (3/31, Weiss, 624K) reports, "He didn't just do it for the money. FBI hotshot Lindley DeVecchio was indicted yesterday on charges he traded secrets with a murderous Mafia chieftain for more than a decade -- a relationship he built primarily so he could burnish his own rising star within the Justice Department, investigators revealed." Vecchione said, "He received a weekly stipend, but there was also his desire to feather his own nest within the FBI to rise to greater prominence." The Post notes, DeVecchio's lawyer, Douglas Grover, blasted the DA's 'new evidence as old evidence - and it is false evidence.'" UPI (3/31) also briefly reports on DeVecchio's arraignment.

Alleged Mob Hitmen Also Charged. The New York Daily News (3/31, Sherman, 729K) reports, "One of the alleged hit men is a 39-year-old Las Vegas limousine dispatcher who is on antidepressants and suffers from high cholesterol. The other is a 41-year-old Florida charter fishing-boat captain." Craig Sobel and John Sinagra "were young men involved with Brooklyn Mafia capo Greg Scarpa and his sons in the drugs and murder business, prosecutors say. The two alleged hit men are embroiled in the case charging retired FBI agent Lindley DeVecchio with helping Scarpa murder mob rivals and informants." Sinagra was in the Brooklyn courtroom yesterday for his arraignment, but Sobel remains in Florida, fighting extradition.

Former Hockey Player Denied Transfer To Canadian Prison. The AP (3/31, Suhr) reports, "The U.S. government rejected the request by former NHL player Mike Danton to be transferred to his native Canada to serve a prison sentence for his foiled attempt to have his agent killed. … The move 'would not serve the ends of justice,' said the Justice Department." The AP continues, "The decision was made last week by the Justice Department's prisoner-transfer unit and revealed on Wednesday in federal court filings. It assures that Danton will for now remain inmate No. 10096-111 at a prison in Fort Dix, New Jersey. … A lawyer for the 25-year-old former St. Louis Blues player promised to continue appealing." The AP adds, "When Danton was sentenced in 2004 to 7 1/2 years after pleading guilty to murder conspiracy charges, prosecutors agreed not to oppose Danton's deportation to Canada, where he said he wanted to get behind-bars surgical treatment for a shoulder injury and therapy for what his sentencing request called his 'grave mental disorders.' … Danton sued the U.S. government last November, contending that he unfairly has not been transferred to Canada. He asked to be resentenced. … The Justice Department countered that Danton waived his right to appeal by pleading guilty in July 2004 to orchestrating a conspiracy to commit an interstate killing targeting his agent, David Frost. The government also has insisted no regulations require action on international transfers within a specified time, and that Danton's deal did not require a transfer, only that he be considered for one."

New Orleans FBI To Investigate Alleged Red Cross Katrina Relief Fraud. The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 4, 2:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "After Hurricane Katrina, Americans donated more than $2 billion to the Red Cross to help victims. But after reports that some of its volunteer workers stole relief money and supplies, the Red Cross investigated and today it passed on its findings to the FBI." CBS (Attkisson) added, "The Red Cross sent allegations of wrongdoing with food distribution and warehouses to the FBI. Red Cross leaders were also here on Capitol Hill meeting with Senator Charles Grassley in his ongoing investigation of the charity."

The New York Times (3/31, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports New Orleans FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said yesterday that the bureau "will look into possible improprieties in the distribution of millions of dollars' worth of Red Cross relief supplies" in New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. Interim Red Cross President John McGuire "pledged to prosecute any 'wrongdoers'" and "urged any volunteers 'who may have information' to come forward."

The Washington Post (3/31, A8, Salmon, 744K) reports the Red Cross is turning over its internal report on the allegations to the FBI, but Red Cross volunteers Jerome Nickerson and Michael Wolters, "who wrote a detailed report in December accusing New Orleans relief workers of operating a 'rogue' operation using donated goods and equipment, said yesterday that they have already reported their findings to the FBI. And they expressed bitterness that the charity has not contacted them."

Bloomberg (3/31, Zee) reports, "The American Red Cross was part of the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force after the storm struck the U.S. Gulf Coast at the end of August. The charity said it is working with law enforcement groups to seek out and prosecute fraud, waste and abuse."

11th Circuit Mulls Federal Death Penalty Request. The AP (3/31, Yee) reports, "Lawyers for a man accused of killing a Florida deputy asked the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals Thursday to throw out the government's request for the death penalty, saying they were not given sufficient notice." The AP continues, "Jeffrey Lamken, an attorney for Kenneth Wilk, asked a three-judge panel to throw out the request because the government informed Wilk and his defense team it would seek the death penalty less than two months before Wilk's scheduled trial date last April. … 'An indictment was released six months before the trial date, yet the Justice Department did not sign off on the death penalty,' Lamken said." The AP adds, "Wilk, 43, is charged with killing Broward County sheriff's Deputy Todd Fatta, 33, by using a high-powered hunting rifle with a bullet that pierced the officer's protective vest when deputies raided Wilk's home in August 2004. A second deputy, Angelo Cedeno, was shot in the hand and lost a finger. … Federal law requires the government to inform defendants of its intent to seek the death penalty 'a reasonable time before trial.' In previous cases, the government has provided notice about 11 months before trial, Lamken said. … Assistant U.S. Attorney E.J. Yera told the panel the 58-day notice was sufficient. The government filed the request on Feb. 18, 2005. The trial had been set to open April 18, 2005. The trial is expected to be held after the panel issues its opinion."

Failed Engagement Split DeLay Aides, Fed Abramoff Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, A1, Mullins, 2.11M) reports in a front page story about the estrangement of Michael Scanlon and his former fiancé, Emily Miller, both former aides to Rep. Tom DeLay. Scanlon and Miller "were among a tight-knit group of aides who helped Mr. DeLay rise to the pinnacle of Capitol Hill in the 1990s and cement his power as House majority leader. Some of those aides provided a link between their boss and Jack Abramoff, a Republican lobbyist." The "end of the engagement was part of that group's unraveling -- which has had significant consequences for official Washington. The aides have since turned on one another, feeding the ethics scandal surrounding Mr. Abramoff that now roils the capital." Prosecutors "came to Ms. Miller to help them build a case that drove her ex-fiancé to plead guilty, according to a person familiar with the situation."

The New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) runs a poem by Hart Seely that mocks the Abramoff lobbying scandals as the "Congress that Jack built." Seely writes, "This is the Jack/Jack Abramoff/Who bought the souls/Then sold them off."

Letters To Judge Sought Leniency For Abramoff. The Washington Post (3/31, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column on the "extraordinary outpouring of letters on behalf of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff," which "must have played a part in persuading U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck to give Abramoff the minimum possible sentence." The Post notes, "The sheer volume -- 262 letters were ginned up by Abramoff's lawyers -- was impressive. So was the range -- from family members to old friends to religious folks to a member of Congress (Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif.). All asked for leniency for a great guy who lost his way."

Six Jefferson Aides Subpoenaed In Bribery Case. The AP (3/31) reports a US District Court "has issued grand jury subpoenas to six aides to Rep. William Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who has been implicated in a bribery case." In statements "read on the House floor Thursday, the aides notified House Speaker Dennis Hastert that they had been served with grand jury subpoenas for testimony issued by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia." The Washington Post (3/31, 744K) also runs the AP story.

Illinois Man Flees After Mistakenly Released From Federal Jail. CBS 2 Chicago (3/31) reports, "A North Side (Chicago) man was on the lam after a communication glitch caused him to be accidentally released from the downtown federal jail, authorities said Wednesday." CBS 2 continues, "U.S. marshals were searching for Amar Abu Siessi, 36, a Jordanian national, after they inadvertently let him out of the Metropolitan Correctional Center Monday. … U.S. District Judge Matthew F. Kennelly issued a warrant for the Siessi's arrest Wednesday when he did not show up to court." CBS 2 adds, "The U.S. Marshals Service mistakenly believed the court had released Siessi on bond. They released him without his bond discharge papers, a violation of protocol, according to Deputy U.S. Marshal Michael Prout. … 'At the time we had transmitted incorrect information that he was to be released on bond, when in fact he was to appear in court today for a bond hearing,' Prout said. … Siessi, a grocery store owner, had been held since March 7 when he was arrested by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on fraud charges, the second fraud case brought against him since December. He is accused of defrauding the Link card program, which provides taxpayer money to the poor so they can buy food."

US Attorney Snafu Blamed For Chicago Conman's Release From Prison. WBBM-TV Chicago (3/30, Zekman) reports, "A conman who pulled off elaborate scams while he was supposed to be monitored by federal agencies has done it again." Michael Anthony Nelson "is now pictured on an FBI 'wanted' poster. It includes mug shots of how he looked for his past scams, posing as a banker, lawyer, and business consultant, to pull off one con after another. It is a history that amazes even Chicago FBI Special Agent-In-Charge Robert Grant." Grant said, "He is a professional conman. He is very smooth. He is very articulate. He can con the socks off of you." WBBM notes, "Federal officials promised the Chicago victims" that, after he served his time for a Florida scam, "Nelson would be brought back to Chicago to face new charges." But he "was released from an Atlanta prison on Dec. 23 of last year…apparently because the U.S. Attorney's Office in Chicago did not get around to returning a bank fraud indictment against Nelson until about a week after his release."

US Charges Two In Pennsylvania Contract Killing. The Beaver County (PA) Times (3/31, Vidonic) reports, "More than two years ago, Beaver County District Attorney Dale Fouse made a promise to the family of Frank J. Helisek Jr. that his office would find out why the New Brighton man was gunned down in the doorway of his home. … Fouse fulfilled a good portion of that promise Wednesday with the announcement that federal murder charges - a first in Beaver County - had been handed down against two men, accusing them of a contract killing scheme wrapped into a large-scale cocaine ring that operated from 1999 to November." The Times continues, "Jelani Solomon, 27, of 1917 Fourth Ave., Beaver Falls, is accused of paying Claron Hanner, 28, formerly of Pittsburgh, to shoot Helisek on Feb. 19, 2004. One of Helisek's sons, Shawn Helisek, was scheduled to testify against Solomon in a drug trial that was to begin Feb. 20, 2004. Solomon instead pleaded guilty to cocaine possession and was sentenced to between 2½ and five years in state prison. .. . Solomon and Hanner could face the death penalty, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Wednesday, as they are accused of using a gun to cause a death while trafficking in drugs." The Times adds, "Buchanan must make a recommendation to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has the final say on whether prosecutors seek the death penalty. Buchanan would not say Wednesday what her recommendation will be, though Fouse said he supports death penalty prosecutions in this case."

Attorneys At Law Firm In Pellicano Probe May Depart. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Philips, Christensen, Weinstein) reports, "Two top attorneys with a Century City law firm at the center of a federal racketeering investigation into alleged wrongdoing by Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano will soon leave to establish a new practice." The Times continues, "Dale F. Kinsella and Howard L. Weitzman are expected to take seven attorneys with them when they exit Greenberg, Glusker, Fields, Claman, Machtinger & Kinsella in mid-April, according to sources within the firm. … 'If we do, it is because we want to go back to practicing in a smaller environment,' Weitzman said in a statement, adding that the decision has nothing to do with the federal probe. 'As I've said publicly before, I do not believe any Greenberg Glusker lawyer has acted inappropriately, nor do I think anyone from the firm will be so charged.'" The Times adds, "Greenberg Glusker was thrust into the spotlight amid allegations that Pellicano and others committed wiretapping and other illegal acts while working on a number of cases, some of which involved the firm's clients. … A 110-count federal indictment last month accused Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in what prosecutors have described as a conspiracy to gain tactical advantage in litigation. … So far, 13 people have been charged, including an entertainment lawyer, a record company executive, two former police officers and several telephone company employees. Four have admitted to charges stemming from hiring Pellicano or helping him conduct illegal investigations."

Convicted Sniper Muhammad To Defend Himself In Maryland Court. The Washington Times (3/31, Ward) reports, "Maryland's public defender said this afternoon that he will abandon the case of convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad, leaving him to defend his own case in Montgomery County without legal advice." The Times continues, "Muhammad, 45, relegated Paul B. DeWolfe, a lawyer with the state's Office of the Public Defender, to standby status yesterday, after a judge rejected Mr. DeWolfe's argument that Muhammad is insane and not mentally competent to present his own case. … 'We have a policy of not serving as standby counsel,' Mr. DeWolfe said. 'It's been a policy we will enforce in this case. We will not be standby counsel.'" The Times notes, "Muhammad, an Army veteran, asked Circuit Judge James L. Ryan earlier this week for permission to present his own defense because Mr. DeWolfe planned to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. … Muhammad maintains he is innocent and has portrayed himself as a victim of racism. … The trial is scheduled to begin May 1, with prosecutors seeking life in prison without parole in connection with the fatal shootings of six persons in Montgomery County over three weeks in October 2002."

Judge Delays Cuban Spying Trial Over Challenge Of FBI Surveillance Warrants. The AP (3/31) reports US District Judge K. Michael Moore yesterday postponed the trial of alleged Cuban agents Carlos Alvarez and Elsa Alvarez "until sometime in January 2007. One key reason for the delay is that defense attorneys are challenging whether the FBI lawfully obtained warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to eavesdrop on the pair. Prosecutors said it will take months for federal officials to produce the information about those thousands of intercepts being sought by the Alvarez lawyers. The defense lawyers are also appealing a previous decision to keep the couple in detention prior to trial.

New York Court Rules Against Gabelli In Investor Suit. The New York Times (3/31, Sorkin) reports, "Mario J. Gabelli's first investor won a crucial ruling yesterday in a long-running, bitter legal battle over whether Mr. Gabelli bilked him and another backer out of more than $100 million." The Times continues "A judge in New York State Supreme Court in White Plains granted a summary judgment against Mr. Gabelli, the famed money manager. The judge, Linda S. Jamieson, determined that he unfairly prevented the two investors from selling their shares in his private company, Gabelli Group Capital Partners, the controlling shareholder of Gamco Investors, Mr. Gabelli's publicly traded mutual fund company." The Times adds, "Judge Jamieson also agreed to grant the two investors a trial to determine if Mr. Gabelli's company should be dissolved — refusing Mr. Gabelli's efforts to have the case thrown out — and said, 'There are allegations made against Mr. Gabelli that trouble this court.' … The decision, handed down late yesterday, comes as Mr. Gabelli is facing other, and potentially more serious, legal trouble. The Justice Department said this month that it would pursue civil fraud claims against Mr. Gabelli, contending that he orchestrated a scheme to deceive the Federal Communications Commission in its auctions of wireless spectrum licenses several years ago. … That case argues that he used friends and associates to create sham companies that bid for F.C.C. licenses at a discount under a program that favored minorities and small businesses."

California Woman Charged In University Of Washington ELF Arson. The Seattle Times (3/31, Green) reports Briana Waters of Berkeley, Calif., "has become the first person to face charges for the 2001 arson that destroyed the University of Washington Center for Urban Horticulture, the latest in a series of charges against suspected members of the Earth Liberation Front." She "was indicted by a federal grand jury and has been charged in U.S. District Court in Seattle with arson and using or carrying a destructive device during a crime of violence, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Seattle." The Times notes, "While the FBI has called ELF and the similar Animal Liberation Front (ALF) the nation's top domestic terror threat, the groups say they are careful not to hurt people." The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (3/31, Castro) adds, "If convicted…Waters faces a minimum sentence of 35 years. She was released after the brief hearing" yesterday "and will be electronically monitored." The AP (3/31) notes Waters "is the 14th person to be charged in Oregon and Washington with conspiracy to commit a series of ecoterrorist attacks in the West in recent years."

Computer Glitches Plague DC Criminal Court. The Legal Times (3/31, Broida) reports, "Criminal defense lawyers say a new computer system in Washington, D.C., Superior Court is wreaking havoc with their cases and in some instances violating their clients' rights." The Times continues, "The attorneys say that since the criminal division of the court moved to a paperless computer system at the beginning of the year, bad information has led to their clients being arrested after warrants have been dismissed, and in some cases the opposite is occurring: Defendants with bail violations are walking because warrants haven't been entered into the system. … In other cases, motions and paperwork are getting lost. And some lawyers say they can no longer trust what the court record is telling them." The Times adds, "The problems have mainly centered on proceedings in arraignment court and in preliminary hearings -- courtrooms with a high volume of cases that are heard in quick succession. In addition, a lag time in scanning documents has meant that some information isn't being entered in a timely fashion or, in some cases, at all. … The new case management system was part of a multiyear, $20 million project to upgrade the court's entire computer framework. The new system integrates 18 databases with the aim of giving court personnel, attorneys and the public easy access to complete, real-time information about cases. … In January all new criminal cases in the court were being housed entirely in the new system, eliminating the need for paper case jackets and allowing multiple users to access the file from any computer in the courthouse. The system is now considered to be the official court docket and official court jacket. … Court officials downplay the trouble. Judge Brook Hedge, chair of the court's technology and automation committee and co-chair of the committee that oversaw the implementation of the new system, says the problems are small glitches common with a startup."

Lawyers Question Constitutionality Of Espionage Act. US District Judge T.S. Ellis III, who is overseeing the prosecution of former AIPAC lobbyists Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman for receiving classified information, has given the government until today to respond to defense claims that the ACT is unconstitutionally vague and may violate the First Amendment. The Washington Post (3/31, A6, Pincus, 744K) reports that Ellis "directed a series of questions to Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin DiGregory expressing concern that the government had not dealt with constitutional issues raised by the defense. … Ellis also said he had thought there would be well-established precedent he could follow, since the statute had been around for so long. But it has turned out that Rosen and Weissman are the first nongovernment employees to be indicted under the act for receiving classified information orally and not through documents or other tangible items."

Former Nevada County Commissioner Testifies Colleagues Took Bribes. The AP (3/31) reports that in the bribery trial of former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey yesterday, former Commissioner Erin Kenny "testified…that she accepted money from a former striptease club owner and his lobbyist, and knew it was wrong." Kenny "told jurors that it was 'understood' that Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey also were being paid off by" Michael Galardi. "She said Malone and Galardi often referred to the two colleagues as 'on board' or 'being taken care of.'" The AP adds, "In his cross examination, Herrera's defense attorney Jerry Bernstein tried to undermine Kenny's credibility," saying that she "had changed her story from when she was first interviewed by FBI agents. 'The FBI didn't seem happy with the answers she was giving, (agents) took a break, came back and the story was different,' he told KLAS-TV outside the courtroom."

Ryan Jury Recesses For Weekend. The Chicago Tribune (3/31, O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "The revamped jury in former Gov. George Ryan's trial recessed deliberations for the week Thursday without reaching a verdict. … Deliberations are scheduled to resume Monday morning."

FBI Requests Houston City Councilwoman's Bank Records. KPRC-TV Houston (3/30) reports, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation asked for the bank records of Houston City Councilwoman Carol Alvarado as it entered the investigation into improper bonuses at City Hall," and "it's the first indication that the federal government is involved in the probe. The FBI request is for all of Alvarado's bank accounts, open or closed. … The FBI would not comment on the investigation. But Harris County District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal confirmed for KPRC that the federal request was made."

Top Aide Says Street's Style Is Problem, Not FBI Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/31, Gelbart, 423K) reports, "Forget FBI bugs, a corrupt city treasurer, crooked contracts. Mayor Street's problem is what it's always been -- John F. Street. Or so says George Burrell, the mayor's closest adviser. Burrell, who today toils out his last day at Street's side," said that "Street's true successes had not been obscured by the federal corruption probe. Rather, he said, the problem is Street's inability to shed his prickly image."

In Call To Defense Lawyers, Jailed Mob Boss Says "Mafia Cops" Innocent. The New York Times (3/31, Feuer, 1.19M) reports that at the trial of alleged "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa yesterday, "the day prosecutors planned to rest their case and at the very moment when it seemed the trial could not get any more complex, there came, in a 1 p.m. conference call from a maximum security federal prison in Florence, Colo., the voice of Anthony Casso, former underboss of the Luchese crime family." Defense lawyers "said he referred them to a letter he wrote this month to" US Attorneys office Mark Feldman, "in which he claimed responsibility for two murders and a kidnapping that the defendants have been charged." The Times notes, "Today, at roughly 10 a.m., the defense will announce its plan: to call, or not to call, Mr. Casso to the stand." Newsday (3/31, DeStefano) adds that Eppolito and Caracappa defense lawyers will move for a mistrial, in light of Casso's letter, in which he "claimed the defendants were being falsely accused of three of the homicides charged in the case: that of Edward Lino, James Hydell and Israel Greenwald. 'I, Anthony Casso, hereby confess to have personally participated, as part of a three-man team, that shot and killed Eddie Lino in Brooklyn's Gravesend section. Detective's Eppolito and Caracappa are falsely being accused of this crime,' said Casso in the letter." The New York Daily News (3/31, Marzulli, 729K) also reports on the Casso letter, under the headline "'Mob Cops' Innocent – Casso."

FBI Art Crime Team Has Leads On Stolen Rockwell Painting. The AP (3/31, Douglas) reports, "FBI officials said Thursday the agency's Art Crime Team…has several leads in the theft of Rockwell's 'Russian Schoolroom,' stolen in June 1973 from a suburban St. Louis exhibit and believed to be worth as much as $200,000 today. … It is believed the painting was advertised for sale in 1989 at a Rockwell exhibit in New York, but nobody made the connection until recently, officials said. 'The experts have said there are no other copies of this oil painting,' FBI Assistant Special Agent Steven Gomez said." The AP notes, "Earlier this month, the Art Crime Team recovered a Marion Greenwood painting valued at $99,000 that was stolen in 1968. Frank Brostrom, with the Regional Art Crime Team in St. Louis, said the Rockwell case should be solved in a similar manner. On Thursday, the FBI also returned a drawing by Susan Rothenberg to its rightful owner, the Webster University art department. Worth about $20,000, the piece was among more than 100 works of art stolen from a St. Louis art storage facility in 2002."

Pentagon IG Finds Convicted Official Broke Rules To Benefit Lockheed. A Pentagon IG report says former Air Force procurement official Darleen Cruyun, who was convicted of showing favoritism to Boeing Co. while negotiating for job, also manipulated Pentagon rules to benefit Lockheed Martin Corp. and another contractor. The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Babcock, 744K) reports, "The audits, part of an IG review of eight contracts that the Air Force requested last year after Druyun pleaded guilty, found that she helped Lockheed Martin on two airplane contracts between 1998 and 2001 while serving as a top civilian contracting official. … The inspector general focused its criticism on the Air Force, recommending that the service tighten its control of the contracting process."

Former Naval Intel Officer Convicted Of Kidnapping, Murder. Jay E. Lentz, a former naval intelligence officer, was found guilty yesterday by a federal jury in the kidnapping and death of his ex-wife. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/31, A1, Smith) reports that when the jury delivered its verdict, Lentz "screamed out, 'No, no! Reconsider!'" The charge "carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole. Lentz is scheduled to be sentenced June 23. … Defense attorney Frank Salvato said Lentz, 46, who has spent five years in jail, will appeal the verdict."

New York Court Rules Judge Can Face Charges. The New York Law Journal (3/31, Caher) reports, "The Court of Appeals in Albany, N.Y., Thursday reinstated six felony counts against former New York Supreme Court Justice Gerald P. Garson with a precedential ruling that judges can face criminal prosecution for acts that started with a violation of the Rules of Judicial Conduct." The Journal continues, "Thursday's 6-1 opinion means the former judge accused of accepting bribes and kickbacks from a divorce lawyer is once again confronted with the full panoply of felony charges lodged against him following a sting operation initiated by Brooklyn District Attorney Charles J. Hynes' office. … Garson now faces trial on a total of seven felonies -- one count of receiving a bribe and six of receiving reward for official misconduct. All of the charges stem from an illicit attorney-judge relationship involving Garson and attorney Paul Siminovsky." The Journal adds, "Garson's attorney, Diarmuid White of Manhattan, had argued -- successfully, in the lower courts -- that the Rules of Judicial Conduct could not be used to criminally prosecute a judge. The preamble to the rules makes plain that they are not designed or intended to support a criminal prosecution, and the Court of Appeals accepted that proposition in People v. La Carrubba, 46 NY2d 658 (1979). But Thursday the court clarified La Carrubba, holding that while a violation of the rules alone cannot sustain a criminal prosecution, judges are not immune from indictment when an ethics violation escalates into criminality."

California Prisons Ordered To Pay Doctors. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Warren) reports, "Managers of California's beleaguered prison system received a double dose of bad news today as a federal judge ordered them to pay tens of millions of dollars owed to doctors who treat inmates, and the state launched an audit of their agency." The Times continues, "Some of the doctors have not been paid in four years. Some of their contracts have lapsed. And some who deliver cardiology, radiology and a wide range of other services to prisoners are no longer responding when called." The Times adds, "U.S. District Judge Thelton Henderson, who recently put the state prisons' healthcare system in the hands of a federal receiver, ordered that outstanding doctor bills --- which total more than $58 million --- be paid within two months. … Henderson also had harsh words for corrections leaders, saying they have stuck 'heir collective heads in the sand'instead of resolving the contracting mess."

States Creating Crime Lab Oversight Commissions. USA Today (3/31, Willing) reports, "State legislators, troubled by reports of botched DNA tests and other mistakes by forensic analysts, have begun to establish oversight commissions to improve local crime labs and coroner's offices." USA continues, "Virginia and Texas, where a lab technician mistakenly implicated the wrong man in a rape case, passed laws last year that set up such commissions. Legislators in New Hampshire, Vermont and Minnesota are considering similar plans this spring." USA adds, "In Illinois, legislators are considering a plan that would require state and private labs to be accredited by a professional crime lab group. Oklahoma has had such a measure in place for three years. In Massachusetts, Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, revived the state's dormant oversight panel after a pair of eyes critical to a murder investigation were reported missing from a lab in 2002." USA notes, "Beginning today, the American Judicature Society, a non-partisan policy research group of judges, attorneys and academics, begins a three-day conference in Greensboro, N.C., to establish recommendations for crime lab practices. The conference's co-chairs include former U.S. attorney general Janet Reno and former federal judge and CIA and FBI director William Webster."

FBI Busts Canadian For International Fraud Scam Targeting Mosques. The AP (3/31, Mitchell) reports, "An international wire fraud scheme targeting Islamic institutions with a phony stranded-traveler plea, netting only small sums but hitting multiple victims over many years, has been disrupted by the arrest of its mastermind, the FBI says. Islamic advocates say Mohammed Mustafa Agbareia, who was arrested in Canada and pleaded guilty March 1 in Alabama to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, may have scammed more than $1 million from mosques and Islamic groups over nearly two decades. He will be sentenced July 10 by U.S. District Judge Charles Butler in Mobile, where he is in the custody of federal marshals." The AP notes Mobile FBI Special Agent Craig Dahle "said it's unknown how much money the scheme collected. He said there could be victims worldwide."

Faith, Family Seen As Key To Curbing DC Gang Violence. The Washington Times (3/31, Doolittle) reports, "Faith and family must figure large in solving the region's growing gang violence problem, which also will require mentors who understand street culture, a panel of forum speakers and audience members said yesterday. … 'Regardless of the message, one of the things I've found is that the message must be modeled by the messenger,' said former Washington Redskins cornerback Darrell Green, who now operates several youth organizations. 'I believe the best defense is a great offense.'" The Times continues, "Mr. Green was one of several panelists who participated in the Citizens Forum Project on Gang Violence, held at the Arbor Ballroom in The Washington Times building in Northeast. … Other panelists included Robert Woodson, founder of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise; the Rev. Fred Shuttersworth, a civil rights leader; Luis Cardona, a former gang member who works with at-risk area youth; and Robert Goodwin, president of the Points of Light Foundation." The Times adds, "About 200 students and residents attended the forum, the fifth in a monthly series, said Brian Bauman, director of The Washington Times Corp.'s Citizens Forum Project. … The Times reported yesterday that D.C. officials say there are more than 270 girl gangs alone in the District. … In addition, the number of D.C. Superior Court cases involving female juveniles increased from 445 in 2003 to 571 in 2004. The number of girls brought before the court for violent offenses jumped from 225 in 2003 to 322 in 2004, a 43 percent increase."

States Move To Combat Predatory Lending. More than half of the states have moved to protect risky borrowers from predatory lenders, as Congress remains divided over legislation to combat the practice. According to the Wall Street Journal (3/31, Conkey, 2.11M), "At least 10 states -- including New York, West Virginia and New Mexico -- have adopted comprehensive laws in the past few years crafted to curtail tactics commonly used by unscrupulous lenders, including excessive penalties for paying off a loan early, inflated interest rates and frequent refinancing of a mortgage that does little to improve a buyer's finances but generates fees for lenders and brokers. Other states are taking it one issue at a time: Maryland has restricted prepayment penalties, for instance. And still others are considering proposals to subject lenders to greater liability if they are found to have duped home buyers."

NYTimes Praises Cities' Efforts To Help Law-Abiding Ex-Offenders. An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) says, "Locked out of the mainstream, ex-felons become burdens to their families, their communities and the nation as a whole. Three cities -- Boston, Chicago and San Francisco -- have taken groundbreaking steps aimed at de-emphasizing criminal histories for qualified applicants for city jobs, except in law enforcement, education and other sensitive areas where people with convictions are specifically barred by statute. … Taken together, the recent developments in Boston, Chicago and San Francisco symbolize a step forward in terms of fairness for law-abiding ex-offenders, who are often barred from entire occupations because of youthful mistakes and minor crimes committed in the distant past. It should be clear to all of us by now that confining those people to the ranks of the unemployed makes it more likely that they will commit new crimes, return to prison and become a permanent burden to society."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Seeks Files From Dozens Of Internet Service Providers, Tech Firms. The AP (3/31, Dale) reports, "The Justice Department is demanding internal files from dozens of Internet service providers and other technology firms as it seeks to defend a controversial Internet child protection law." The AP continues, "The subpoenas are similar to one given to Google Inc., which waged a partially successful battle over the government's request for millions of pieces of information about search engine requests and Web site domains." The AP adds, "InformationWeek magazine unearthed subpoenas that show the government also demanded information from at least 34 other companies, including Internet service providers such as Comcast Corp. and EarthLink Inc., security software firms and other technology companies. … The subpoenas, which the magazine obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests, show the Justice Department preparing for an October trial in Philadelphia over the 1996 Child Online Protection Act. It is not clear which companies are complying, and to what extent. … 'That money could be spent so much more wisely on giving software away to parents that are having these problems,' Dan Jude, president of Security Software Systems, said of the litigation costs. … The 12-person firm, which makes filtering software, spent more than 40 hours trying to comply with the subpoena, he said. The company refused to provide some information on proprietary grounds, fearing it could make its way into the court file."

CNET News (3/31) reports, "Google made headlines in January when it was disclosed that the search company had refused to hand over random search terms and Web address data that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online had provided the government when asked. Google challenged the subpoena in court, arguing that it was overreaching. Earlier this month a judge ruled that Google didn't have to provide any search queries but did have to provide a much smaller number of Web sites in its index than the government had sought. … The government is seeking information on Web user behavior and filtering software and other tools in an effort to justify COPA, which faces a trial later this year. That law restricts the posting on commercial Web sites of sexually explicit material deemed 'harmful to minors,' unless it's made unavailable to the youngsters. The ACLU argues that Web sites cannot realistically comply with such requirements and that the law violates the right to freedom of speech mandated by the First Amendment."

The New York Times (3/31, Hansell) reports, "Both the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union confirmed yesterday that they had requested and received information from Internet service providers and software makers in connection with an A.C.L.U. lawsuit challenging an anti-pornography law." The Times continues, "Earlier this year it was revealed that the Justice Department, which is defending the law, had subpoenaed information from four search engine companies about keyword requests by users. Google challenged its subpoena. This month a judge ordered the company to provide some information to the Justice Department but not information on individual searches, saying that had the potential to violate the privacy of users." The times adds, "Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the agency had issued the subpoenas 'to see the effectiveness of Internet filters.' He said he was not able to say which of the companies had responded to the subpoenas and to what extent they had complied. … The A.C.L.U. also subpoenaed many of the same companies, said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer for the organization. 'We have asked for information that is relevant to the lawsuit, such as information to show that filters are effective,' he said. Mr. Fine declined to say how many companies were subpoenaed and what questions they were asked."

Republicans Taking Aim At 527 Groups. The New York Times (3/31, Hulse, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports that "to many Republicans, the liberal activist organization MoveOn.org is a political boogeyman that they hope to chase off with new restrictions on so-called 527 groups. But the pursuit may turn out to be fruitless." MoveOn.org has "already figured out what it thinks is a better, and less controversial, way to spend its millions. Its 527 — named for a section of the tax code — is being put on ice." Still, "two years after 527's burst onto the political scene, gaining notoriety by raising unlimited amounts from private donors, Congressional Republicans are moving to rein in the groups — just in time for the November midterm elections. Leading Democrats are threatening a fight." House GOP leaders intend "to bring a plan to impose new restrictions on 527 groups to the floor next week to spur action in the Senate, where Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a champion of the campaign finance bill that bears his name, is offering similar legislation."

The AP (3/31, Abrams) reports the bill "to require groups known as 527s to register as political committees and abide by contribution limits is likely to meet resistance from Democrats, who in 2004 relied on 527s as a key source of financing." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said, "I will strongly oppose it."

Judge Rules FEC Failed To Rationalize Decision Not To Regulate 527 Groups. The AP (3/31, Locy) reports the Federal Election Commission "failed to give a good reason for refusing to rein in nonprofit political groups that spent huge sums in the 2004 presidential elections, a judge has ruled in a case brought by President Bush's campaign and lawmakers." In a 34-page opinion, US District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan "said the FEC failed to give 'a reasoned explanation' for its decision not to issues rules to require so-called '527' groups to register as federal political action committees and face the same strict fundraising, spending and disclosure rules PACs do." Sullivan "stopped short of saying the FEC had abused its discretion. Nor did he order it to develop rules to crack down on the groups' fundraising and spending." Rather, the judge "in his ruling Wednesday sent the issue back to the FEC and ordered the commission to 'articulate its reasoning,' or come up with a rule for the groups 'if necessary.'"

The Washington Post (3/31, A5, Edsall, 744K) reports Judge Sullivan "rejected requests by the Bush-Cheney campaign and by two advocates of campaign finance legislation to order the Federal Election Commission to impose tough regulations on "527" political committees that put more than $400 million into the 2004 elections. Instead, in a ruling issued late Wednesday evening, the judge gave the FEC a choice: Either explain in detail why regulations are not needed or begin proceedings to develop such rules."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Alabama House, Senate Cannot Agree On Voting Bill. The AP (3/30) reports, "The Alabama Senate and House can't agree on how to make sure military serving overseas get to vote in the primary runoff election this summer. … But the U.S. Justice Department is pressuring both to find a solution. It is suing the state, claiming there is not enough time between the primary election June 6 and the runoff June 27 for military personnel overseas to get and return absentee ballots." The AP continues, "The Senate voted 20-5 Thursday for a bill that would delay primary runoff by three weeks from June 27 to July 18 to make sure the military have time to get and return absentee ballots for the runoff. … On March 16, the House voted 100-1 for a bill that would keep the runoff on June 27, but would allow soldiers overseas to use special ballots. The ballots, which would be delivered with the primary ballots, would allow soldiers to mark their runoff preferences in races with three or more candidates. … Now, either the Senate must agree with the House-passed bill, or the House must agree with the Senate-passed bill."

DOJ Officials Set Record Straight On Milwaukee Police Shooting Case. In a letter to the editor of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/30), Wan J. Kim, Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, and Steven M. Biskupic, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, write, "A recent article and an editorial in your paper reported that the Civil Rights Division 'overruled' a decision by the U.S. attorney's office to prosecute an officer in the tragic fatal shooting of Justin Fields. … That is not true. Prosecutors from both of our offices, with more than a half-century of combined experience, carefully investigated and reviewed this matter and ultimately concluded that federal prosecution simply was not viable." Kim and Biskupic continue, "Their consensus is plain from the letter that closed this case, which stated that 'this (United States Attorney's) Office and the Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division . . . have concluded that there is not a federally prosecutable criminal case here.'" Kim and Biskupic add, "Your editorial also erroneously claims that civil rights prosecutions have declined by 40%. To the contrary, the Justice Department has brought more criminal civil rights cases - and convicted 40% more law enforcement officials for misconduct - in the past five years than the preceding five." Kim and Biskupic conclude, "What happened to Justin Fields is indeed a tragedy and we express our deep sympathies to his family. They deserve to know that our decision not to prosecute was made after a thorough and searching analysis of our comprehensive investigation. … Neither the family nor the community are served by any suggestion that our decision was based on something other than the facts and the law."

Court Monitor Says Violations Persist At Mississippi Training Schools. The AP (3/31) reports, "A federal court monitor says violations continue at Oakley and Columbia juvenile training schools." The AP continues, "In a report covering Aug. 1 to Dec. 15, 2005, the monitor says most of the conditions of the agreement that ended a Department of Justice lawsuit against the state over conditions at the two training schools were not met. A report that covered May and June last year, also was critical of the state's progress." The AP adds, "The schools serve 550 youths combined - boys ages 10 to 17 at Oakley in Hinds County and girls 10 to 18 at Columbia. … The current report cites, among other things, student complaints about staff cursing them and using inconsistent disciplinary practices and continued fights between students. … Court monitor Joyce Burrell said she was aware that the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has impacted the Mississippi Department of Human Services. … 'But the needs of this population and those rights that were determined to have been violated must be corrected as quickly as possible,' Burrell wrote in the report filed in U.S. District Court in Jackson. … State officials entered a four-year consent decree with the Justice Department last May."

Massachusetts High Court Rules Nonresident Gay Couples Can't Marry In State. CNN's The Situation Room (3/30, Blitzer) reported, "The Massachusetts high court ruled today same sex couples from other states cannot legally marry in the Bay State. A ruling by that same court three years ago made Massachusetts the first state to legalize gay marriage." Republican Governor Mitt Romney "ordered local officials to uphold a century-old state law barring non-residents from Massachusetts. Eight gay couples challenged the law accusing Romney of discriminating against same-sex couples but the state high court ruled in favor of the possible presidential contender." The New York Times (3/31, Belluck, Zezima, 1.19M) says "the decision by Mr. Romney…was backed by the state's attorney general, Thomas F. Reilly, a Democrat."

The Washington Post (3/31, A8, Powell, García, 744K) notes Romney "called the decision a victory for 'traditional marriage.' … 'We don't want Massachusetts to become the Las Vegas of same-sex marriage,' Romney told reporters. 'It's important that other states have the right to make their own determination of marriage and not follow the wrong course that our Supreme Judicial Court put us on.'"

The Washington Times (3/31, Wetzstein, 90K) reports, "To date, 44 states have laws or amendments that uphold traditional marriage and ban same-sex "marriage," said the Massachusetts Family Institute, which supports traditional marriage." This year, "voters in at least seven states -- Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- will have constitutional marriage amendments on their ballots."

Alabama Bill Would Pardon Segregation Law Breakers. The Alabama House yesterday unanimously passed a bill to pardon Rosa Parks and hundreds of others who were arrested for violating the state's segregation-era laws. The New York Times/AP (3/31), "The original bill was amended to say that the arrest records would not be expunged or sealed from public view, but would be turned over to the State Department of Archives and History. That way, backers said, the records will provide a permanent record of civil disobedience that, in many cases, helped lead to desegregation."

Schiavo's Family Creates Foundation To Combat Euthanasia. To mark the anniversary of her death, Terri Schiavo's family announced the creation of a foundation in her name to combat euthanasia. The Washington Times (3/31, Debose, 90K) reports, "The foundation's mission will be to eliminate the persistent vegetative state, the condition that doctors said Mrs. Schiavo was in, as a diagnosis for patients, said her brother Bobby Schindler. But the foundation, which also will have a separate lobbying organization, will seek to have feeding tubes classified as ordinary care for hospital patients and to make people aware of the need to have advance directives or living wills in case they cannot communicate their wishes late in life."

Georgia Attorney Challenges Courtroom Pledge. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (3/31, Land) reports, "Attorney Donald A. Weissman won't have to stand for the Pledge of Allegiance when he goes to court in Gwinnett, Ga., today, but he's still concerned that others will feel compelled to declare their loyalty to the U.S. government in order to get a fair hearing from Magistrate Judge Mark A. Lewis." The Report continues, "Lewis, hearing civil cases for a Gwinnett Superior Court judge tied up with a criminal trial, begins each day in court by turning to face the U.S. flag and reciting the pledge. … Lewis said he started the practice after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." The Report adds, "Weissman recently complained about the practice in a letter to Lewis and the court administrator. … According to Gwinnett County Court Administrator Philip M. Boudewyns, Lewis said that he would forego the pledge when Weissman is present, but will continue the practice on other days. … Thursday, the judge responded officially, entering an order chiding Weissman for passing the complaint letter -- which had been marked 'confidential to be opened by recipient only' -- to the Daily Report. … Lewis also defended his actions by citing a 2003 Georgia Supreme Court decision that said a judge's request that jurors stand for the pledge 'shows no bias, either for the State, or for one who is charged by the State with a crime.'"

Blacks Steadily Closing "Digital Divide." In what the New York Times (3/31, Marriott, 1.19M) calls a "remarkable closing of the 'digital divide' that many experts had worried would be a crippling disadvantage in achieving success," African Americans are "steadily gaining access to and ease with the Internet." While civil rights leaders, educators and national policy makers "warned for years that the Internet was bypassing blacks and some Hispanics as whites and Asian-Americans were rapidly increasing their use of it," the "falling price of laptops, more computers in public schools and libraries and the newest generation of cellphones and hand-held devices that connect to the Internet have all contributed to closing the divide, Internet experts say."

Indiana Firm Admits Role In Concrete Price-Fixing Scheme. The AP (3/31, Wilson) reports, "A second central Indiana company and its president have agreed to pay millions of dollars in fines after admitting they conspired to fix the price of ready-mix concrete paid by homeowners, building contractors and the government." The AP continues, "The U.S. Department of Justice announced the guilty plea by Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. Inc. of Fishers on Thursday. The company was charged in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis with violating the federal antitrust Sherman Act, which prohibits restraint of trade." The AP adds, "Government attorneys allege that Builder's President Gus B. 'Butch' Nuckols III hosted at least two price-fixing meetings of central Indiana concrete executives at a horse barn next to his house in Fishers, a northern suburb of Indianapolis. … 'Price fixing threatens our free market system and robs consumers of the benefit of competitive prices,' Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, said in a statement. 'We vigorously investigate and prosecute companies and individuals involved in these conspiracies.' … The company issued a statement Thursday saying it 'remains committed to its central Indiana employees, customers and local communities.' … Four former executives of another company, Irving Materials Inc. of Greenfield, were sentenced to prison for their role in the scheme in December, and IMI was fined $29.2 million, the largest fine ever in a domestic antitrust investigation. … The investigation is continuing, the Justice Department said."

DOJ Probing McClatchy Purchase Of Knight Ridder Newspapers. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/31, Said, Writer) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators have begun looking at McClatchy Co.'s $4.5 billion purchase of Knight Ridder, an investigation that is legally required for any transaction of that size. Regulators may also be looking at what the pending sale of the San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times would mean for competition in the Bay Area." The Chronicle continues, "A U.S. Department of Justice spokeswoman confirmed that the department is looking at the deal, announced earlier this month, which would make McClatchy the nation's No. 2 newspaper company. 'We will review it carefully,' she said." The Chronicle adds, "McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers and promptly said it will sell 12 of them. Those papers include the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, which have a combined daily circulation of 495,000. … One potential buyer is MediaNews Group of Denver, which already owns nine Bay Area dailies with a combined circulation of just over 300,000." The Chronicle notes, "The director of a local media consumer watchdog group said he was interviewed by the Justice Department on Wednesday about the ramifications of MediaNews buying the Bay Area papers. … John McManus, director of GradetheNews.org, which is based at San Jose State University, said he had a 45-minute interview with a Justice Department attorney about his concerns if MediaNews bought the Mercury and Contra Costa Times."

The AP (3/31, Sherman) reports that the DOJ attorney "asked about the impact of a MediaNews buyout on advertisers, rather than on consumer prices or news quality. But he was willing to listen to concerns about concentration of ownership on the news product," according to McManus. "Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed that antitrust lawyers are examining the proposed McClatchy-Knight Ridder deal, but she would not comment on specifics about the inquiry."

DOJ Questions EU Case Against Microsoft. Dow Jones (3/31) reports, "The U.S. government says it has 'substantial concerns' about European regulators' antitrust case against Microsoft Corp., according to a person who has seen a letter sent to regulators." Dow Jones continues, "Relations between Brussels and the software giant have 'hit a new low,' the letter said. … The U.S. letter could re-ignite transatlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Commission, the regulatory arm of the European Union, notoriously blocked General Electric Co.'s planned merger with Honeywell International Inc.. Since then, Neelie Kroes has succeeded Mario Monti as the commission's top antitrust official." Dow Jones adds, "The letter is particularly delicate, since Kroes is seen as a more 'pro- American' commissioner than Monti, a U.S. diplomat said. The diplomat said ' Washington ordered (its) E.U. mission to send the letter,' noting that Microsoft has been pressuring U.S. officials and politicians to intervene on its behalf." Dow Jones notes, "The commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said the regulator received the letter via email Monday and also met with a U.S. diplomat to discuss its contents. … The U.S. has questioned Brussels' treatment of Microsoft before. The March 2004 decision was described as 'unfortunate' by R. Hewitt Pate, then the head of the U.S. Justice Department's antitrust division."

Bloomberg (3/31, Rega) reports, "The U.S. said it wanted to ensure that the commission treated the company fairly, according to a copy of the two-paragraph letter seen by Bloomberg News. … The EU ruled in March 2004 that Microsoft illegally abused the dominance of its software, which runs on more than 90 percent of the world's personal computers, and fined it a record 497 million euros ($601 million). The regulator is threatening an additional 2 million euros in daily fines unless the company provides 'complete and accurate' information to competitors on how the Windows operating system communicates on networks. … In February, Microsoft demanded 'full access' to the case file, accusing the commission of violating its rights of defense. The commission refused to release letters between the regulator and two experts it hired to help on the case, arguing that the correspondence is 'internal.'"

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Cohen) reports, "U.S. intervention, in an email to EU regulators and European capitals, comes at a delicate time. The case could reignite trans-Atlantic tensions that peaked in 2001 when the European Union notoriously blocked U.S.-based General Electric Co.'s planned merger with Honeywell International Inc. More recently, the U.S. and EU have worked to harmonize how they deal with business regulation, but Microsoft and the EU have been escalating their public battle. … Separately Wednesday, a U.S. district court in California quashed a Microsoft bid to move the fight into the U.S. legal system. The company asked the court to help it obtain documents related to its European antitrust case from U.S.-based rivals Oracle Corp. and Sun Microsystems Inc., which participated in the case. Microsoft had complained that European regulators weren't giving it enough information to prepare its challenge."

The New York Times (3/31, Meller) reports, "United States diplomats visited the offices of three European commissioners earlier this week. Jonathan Todd, the spokesman for the competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, confirmed that her close aides met American diplomats this week and received the memo. He declined to comment on its content. … The diplomats also visited the offices of the internal market commissioner, Charlie McCreevy, and Gunter Verheugen, vice president of the commission, according to the person close to the commission." The Times notes, "A United States official denied that the American government was coming to Microsoft's aid in the antitrust dispute. 'Our interest is less that than wanting to see that everything is done properly,' said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the tenuous nature of the matter."

Whirlpool Attorneys Were Right About DOJ Review Focus. Dow Jones (3/31) reports, "Whirlpool Corp.'s antitrust attorneys had it pegged right all along. … They had predicted that the Justice Department wasn't going to decide the merits of a Whirlpool acquisition of Maytag Corp. on the basis of market share but rather on whether the bulked-up company, which already is the world's largest appliance maker, could change industry dynamics and raise prices, to the detriment of consumers." Dow Jones continues, "Indeed, in giving its stamp of approval to the $1.7 billion acquisition Wednesday the government's antitrust watchdogs focused on pricing power. … 'Market shares are not always likely to be the best predictor' of how his agency would rule, new antitrust unit chief Thomas Barnett said at a news conference Wednesday." Dow Jones adds, "Last July Mark C. Schechter, a onetime Justice Department official who now specializes in antitrust issues at the Washington law firm of Howrey Simon Arnold & White LLP, and was among those advancing Whirlpool's case, had told Dow Jones Newswires that the merger would pass DOJ muster. … He said the regulators would consider whether the acquisition could give Whirlpool enough power to profitably raise prices at least 5%, an outcome Schechter considered 'implausible.' … That analysis ran counter to what became a mini-groundswell of misplaced opinion, on Wall Street and in the financial press, on how the government would rule in what some saw as a barometer of the Bush administration's views on business competition."

Judge Sanctions Gateway For Missing Evidence In Patent Case. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Lawton) reports, "A federal judge in Utah harshly reprimanded Gateway Inc. for destroying or losing evidence 'in bad faith' in a patent-infringement case brought by an inventor against the computer maker." The Journal continues, "The plaintiff, Phillip M. Adams, a former International Business Machines Corp. engineer, filed the suit in 2002 after talks fell through with Gateway in 2001 over licensing his patented technologies that address a defect in circuitry used to control floppy-disk drives. Mr. Adams asserts in the lawsuit that Gateway violated a nondisclosure agreement signed between the parties, and that the company infringed on his patents. He later added allegations that Gateway lost or destroyed documents needed to help prove his case, which is scheduled to go to trial Monday." The Journal adds, "U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart sided with Mr. Adams, in a ruling that was issued March 6 and unsealed March 22. He chastised Gateway for failing to disclose information that a magistrate judge had found central to the case. Although he found no 'direct' evidence about Gateway's intentions, he cited 'ample circumstantial evidence' that Gateway acted in bad faith.'"

Apple Defends iTunes Logo In London Court. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Patrick) reports, "To the classical strains of Antonio Vivaldi's 'Gloria,' a lawyer for Apple Computer Inc. yesterday argued in a high-profile United Kingdom court case that the company's iTunes service simply distributes music and isn't in the music-production business." The Journal continues, "The classical soundtrack contrasted with the first day of the hearing Wednesday when a lawyer for Apple Corps, the Beatles record company, demonstrated his points with the 1970s disco hit 'Le Freak.' … Behind the courtroom demonstrations in England's High Court, however, is a serious legal case: The Beatles' company claims Apple Computer is in breach of a 15-year-old agreement designed to end years of fighting between the companies over use of the Apple name and logo." The Journal adds, "Apple Corps wants the Cupertino, Calif., computer company to stop using the Apple logo on the iTunes service and in advertisements for it. But Anthony Grabiner, the Apple Computer lawyer, said the company's iTunes music store was no more than a 'data-transmission service'" and that using the Apple logo on iTunes is to tell visitors that the iTunes software was created by Apple and has nothing to do with the music being sold. … The outcome of the case could affect Apple's thriving digital music business, which has helped transform the company into an electronics and entertainment powerhouse from a maker of personal computers. While selling music through iTunes isn't a huge money-maker for the company, it is an important companion business for Apple's iPod, the digital music player that accounted for $2.91 billion, or more than half of the company's $5.75 billion, in revenue in the holiday quarter."

NRC Has Yet To Approve FPL, Constellation Merger. In its coverage of the $11 billion merger between FPL Group Inc. and Constellation Energy Group of Baltimore, the Palm Beach Post (3/31, Swartz) reports that "an explosion" happened Thursday in the Maryland Legislature. "That state's lawmakers voted to create a special counsel that would review utility mergers, thus delaying the deal" and while the bid "by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly still has to be approved by Gov. Robert Ehrlich, a Republican who is up for reelection" Ehrlich "hasn't said whether he'd veto the bill." The Post notes that the headaches in Maryland seem to be driven by deregulation and adds that the merger has yet to be approved by "shareholders of both companies as well as state and federal regulators, including the Federal Regulatory Energy Commission and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission."

Colony Capital Makes Rival Bid For Aztar. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Sanders) reports, "Colony Capital LLC offered about $1.5 billion for casino operator Aztar Corp. three weeks after Aztar entered an agreement to be acquired by rival casino operator Pinnacle Entertainment Inc. The move sets off a possible bidding war for the Phoenix company best known for its Tropicana properties in Las Vegas and Atlantic City." The Journal continues, "Colony will offer $41 a share and would seek to refinance the $723 million in debt that Aztar carries, the company said. On March 14, Pinnacle of Las Vegas offered $38 a share for Aztar, or about $1.45 billion, not including the debt. … Colony, a closely held real-estate firm, owns the Las Vegas and Atlantic City Hilton hotel-casinos. … Colony's unsolicited offer may be the first salvo in what could be a heated bidding war for a small casino company that has underperformed. Aztar's $1.52 billion in market value is significantly lower than industry rivals like MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment Inc."

JP Morgan In Talks To Buy Bank Of New York Branches. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Sidel, Riley) reports, "Many of the nation's financial institutions favor one of two strategies when it comes to retail branches: build it or buy it. … J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. is aggressively pursuing both." The Journal continues, "The nation's third-largest bank based on market value is in discussions to acquire about 300 branches from Bank of New York Co., according to people familiar with the matter. The deal would take the form of an asset swap in which J.P. Morgan would transfer a portion of its corporate-trust business to the bank that was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784." The Journal adds, "Representatives of both banks declined to comment on any possible deal, which was reported yesterday by CNBC. It wasn't immediately clear if any cash would change hands as part of a transaction. Wall Street analysts, who have long speculated that Bank of New York would jettison the bulk of its retail business, have estimated the branch network's value at about $4 billion. … People familiar with the situation said a transaction wasn't imminent, noting that the deal's structure is complex. Bank of New York is seeking the asset swap over an outright sale, these people said, because the retail business represents a hefty 15% of its total profits -- an amount that can't be easily replaced on the bottom line. Such a structure also would help Bank of New York avoid paying the higher taxes that usually accompany a big cash or stock deal."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DOJ To Enter Virginia Landfill Negotiation. The Suffolk (VA) News-Herald (3/29, Williams) reports, "The Southeastern Public Service Authority has asked the U.S. Justice Department to review a private landfill owner's proposal to put construction rubble and debris in SPSA's landfill." The News-Herald continues, "On March 13, days after a Suffolk Circuit Court judge dismissed his $20-million lawsuit against the public regional waste authority, landfill owner John C. Holland proposed an arrangement between his business and SPSA." The News-Herald adds, "Under the proposed contact, John C. Holland Enterprises Inc. would dispose of four to eight 20-ton trailers of construction debris every day at SPSA's landfill on U.S. 58. SPSA would be paid $630 n the same rate that the agency receives from Bay Transport, the other company that hauls for SPSA, based on Holland's proposal. … The authority's board of directors and legal counsel are concerned about potential state and federal anti-trust violations, said John S. Hadfield, SPSA's executive director. … On March 22, SPSA's board of directors indicated it would issue the Holland Enterprises a contract that would expire June 30, 2006, as soon as the proposed contract is approved by the U.S. Justice Department, according to a letter to Holland's lawyer Gary H. Baise. Receiving that approval is expected to take 30 to 60 days, said SPSA's lawyer Michael R. Katchmark."

Interior Department Officials Report Net Increase Of Wetlands. The New York Times (3/31, Barringer, 1.19M) reports that because the Interior Department's definition of a wetland includes golf course water hazards and other man-made ponds, "at a time of continued marsh depletion, pond inflation permitted Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns to announce proudly on Thursday the first net increase in wetlands since the Fish and Wildlife Service started measuring them in 1954. Wetlands acreage, measured largely by aerial surveys, totaled 107.7 million acres at the end of 2004, up by 191,800 acres from 1998. The two cabinet secretaries hailed the apparent reversal in the long trend of wetland losses. … A net total of 523,500 acres of swamps and tidal marshes had been lost, but the Fish and Wildlife Service measured gains of 715,300 acres of shallow-water wetlands, or ponds. According to the report's author, Tom Dahl, those can be 20 to 30 feet deep."

Report: Meth Sweeping Through Indian Country. From Arizona's San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation, USA Today (3/31, Wagner) reports meth "is sweeping through Indian country, tearing families apart and leaving a trail of violence and tears. … Native American leaders nationwide — but especially in the West — report a meth-induced surge of domestic violence, juvenile sex and meth-addicted babies, while federal authorities say foreign drug cartels are targeting tribal lands as distribution beachheads. … At Wyoming's Wind River Reservation, 25 tribal members were arrested by Bureau of Indian Affairs and Drug Enforcement Administration agents last May in connection with a drug ring."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Clarifies Ruling Suggesting FBI Link To Oklahoma City Bombing. The AP (3/31, Foy) reports, "A federal judge on Thursday rewrote a sentence to clarify a ruling that had suggested Timothy McVeigh received help from paramilitary militias in the Oklahoma City bombing and that the government had an informant in the bombing conspiracy." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Dale Kimball had issued a decision that called those two claims 'fact.' Asked if he was endorsing the conspiracy theories, Kimball issued a new decision late Thursday to attribute both claims to a Salt Lake City lawyer." The AP adds, "The lawyer, Jesse Trentadue, is trying to expose FBI evidence he contends will show the bureau was tipped to McVeigh's plans but failed to stop the Oklahoma City bombing. FBI officials have repeatedly refused to address Trentadue's claims. … Trentadue is also trying to prove that his brother - a bank robber who died in federal custody after being picked up on a parole violation - was mistaken for an associate of McVeigh's in the frantic search for conspirators after the bombing, and was killed by federal agents during an interrogation gone awry." The AP notes, "In his original 23-page decision, released late Wednesday, Kimball singled out one FBI teletype already released to Trentadue, but in heavily edited form. … The judge, who has inspected the unedited version of the memo, first wrote: 'The plaintiff (Trentadue) points out the fact that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh.' … The judge rewrote the sentence to eliminate the word 'fact' and substitute: 'The plaintiff claims that this document indicates that there was an undercover operative in with Timothy McVeigh and members of the various militia groups who aided and supported McVeigh.'"

DEA: Drug Ring Used Tombstones To Smuggle Cocaine. The AP (3/30, Barrett) reports, "Federal agents on Thursday said they had broken up a ring of drug smugglers who used tombstones featuring the Virgin Mary to move hundreds of pounds of cocaine into New York from Mexico. The Drug Enforcement Agency announced arrests of 12 people as part of the conspiracy. … 'Like grave robbers who have no respect for the dead, this drug organization used revered tombstones to smuggle millions of dollars worth of cocaine into New York City,' said John Gilbride, the special agent in charge of the New York DEA office." The drug bust received wide media coverage, with news outlets making more than 90 references to it. The AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of ABC News, FOX News, CNN, Canada's CBC News, the San Diego Union Tribune, Tampa Tribune, Houston Chronicle, and the Knoxville Tennessee News Sentinel.

UPI (3/30) reports the DEA "said the investigation, called Operation Omni Presence, resulted in the arrests of 11 people and the seizure of more than 425 pounds of cocaine and $474,000 in cash."

WABC-TV, New York (3/30) reports on its Web site, "Eyewitness News has obtained photographs that show the lengths some drug organizations will go through to smuggle cocaine into the country, and more specifically New York. Sources tell us at least 10 suspects have been arrested in New York as part of an international drug ring that used tombstones with the image of the Virgin Mary on them to smuggle drugs."

New York Daily News (3/31) reports, "The New York angle began to emerge last May when the NYPD, the DEA and Nassau County narcotics cops tailed a dealer running drugs between Houston, Washington Heights and Atlanta."

Two "Major" Drug Rings Broken Up, At Least 15 Arrested. The New York Times (3/31, Lambert) reports two major drug-trafficking rings that "smuggled huge amounts of cocaine from Mexico — some of it concealed in tombstones engraved with the image of the Virgin Mary — and shipped it to the East Coast were broken up yesterday in multiple raids by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies nationwide. … The tombstones were tracked from Mexico to a warehouse in Brooklyn, where investigators found broken pieces of those that had already been opened." The Times says according to the DEA, some intact tombstones remained, and officers found cocaine bricks inside of them. That raid "found 196 kilograms of cocaine with a retail value estimated at $8 million to $12 million." The Times adds that at least 15 people have been arrested.

State Police Announce Cocaine Bust. WCBS-TV, New York (3/30) reports on its Web site, "New York State Police announced a major bust of a multi-million dollar cocaine distribution network. … Police executed eight search warrants throughout Suffolk County that resulted in the seizures of 210 kilograms of powder cocaine with an approximate street value of $40 million. … The DEA Long Island District Office, Suffolk County Police Department, the Suffolk County District Attorney's Office and the Nassau County Police assisted the New York State Police."

Local TV Coverage. KTRK-TV , Houston (3/30, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Ten people were arrested, and agents say those drugs were smuggled into the country by a trafficking organization."

KOAT-TV, Albuquerque-Santa Fe, New Mexico (3/30, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Drug smugglers are apparently using the Virgin Mary to bring cocaine into the US. The Drug Enforcement Agency issued the pictures today. They show just how the drugs are hidden."

WBAY-TV, Green Bay-Appleton, Wisconsin (3/30, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "You might be surprised at the latest path illegal drugs are taking to get to the US. The DEA just released these pictures of a recent bust where hundreds of pounds of cocaine were found hidden inside statues of the Virgin Mary. Police say the method is similar to what was shown in an episode of the hit show 'Lost.' Officials confiscated nearly 500 thousand dollars and arrested 11 people in connection with the statues."

WXYZ-TV, Detroit (3/30, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Tombstones of the Virgin Mary were used to smuggle cocaine into the US. In addition, they also smuggled cash, and ten people [were arrested].

Federal Agents Arrest Reputed Philly Drug Kingpin, Seven Others. The Philadelphia Daily News (3/31, Caparella, Gambacorta) reports, "A reputed drug kingpin who sells hip-hop clothing and music out of a South Street-area business has been arrested with seven others in four states in a major sting involving a 210-kilogram shipment of Mexican cocaine, $5 million in cash and 14 weapons. … The FBI, the DEA, the IRS, New York and Pennsylvania State Police, and Philadelphia police raided at least 15 locations in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland in the past two days in the ongoing federal drug investigation. At roughly 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, armed agents in flak jackets hit the Teagle Co….owned by Omar Teagle, 33, a reputed Philadelphia drug kingpin, according to authorities." The Daily News adds, "Yesterday, Teagle and two other suspects, George Rodgers and Donnell Ball, appeared briefly for a federal hearing that was postponed until today while Assistant U.S. Attorney Curtis Douglas prepared their criminal complaints."

MLB To Investigate Players' Steroid Use. The networks last night each reported on the baseball steroid investigation last night in a full segment. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 6, 2:25, Berman, 8.78M) reported, "With slugger Barry Bonds poised to break the game's most revered records, baseball vowed to determine once and for all if he broke the rules." The investigation, "led by former Senator George Mitchell, will focus on allegations published in the new book, 'Game of Shadows, that Balco Labs in California provided a slew of steroids for bonds and other Major Leaguers. But Mitchell promised to go beyond Bonds and follow whatever leads he may find into the game's steroid-laden past."

The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 7, 2:15, Mason, 7.66M) reported, "Selig said accusations in the new book, 'Game of Shadows,' that home run champion Barry Bonds used steroids as early as 1998 triggered the inquiry, and he tapped former Senator George Mitchell to lead it." Selig: "He has my permission to expand the investigation and to follow the evidence wherever it may lead." The "scandal has made the game's national sponsors squeamish. Bank of America and Home Depot have refused to support any celebration of Bonds' quest for the all-time home run record unless he's cleared of steroid use."

NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 4, 2:30, Taibbi, 9.87M) reported, "Even in spring training Barry Bonds has heard lots of boos. Fans sick of hearing about steroids reacting to this book just out about steroid-provider Balco and about Bonds' five years of alleged use of steroids and other performance enhancers to fuel his late-career power surge: Now, baseball's official investigation."

Mitchell Has Power To Expand Steroid Probe. USA Today (3/31, Bodley, 2.31M) reports that Selig "emphasized that Mitchell has the authority to expand the scope of the probe if necessary. … 'Should Sen. Mitchell uncover material suggesting that the scope of the investigation needs to be broader, he has my permission to expand it,' Selig said.'

Arab Drug Traffickers Selling Cocaine From South America. The White House Bulletin will report later today that Arab drug trafficking gangs are moving cocaine from South America to Europe and the Middle East, where some profits are ending up with radical groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration. In response, DEA is zeroing in on the smugglers' base of operations in South America's notorious Tri-border area, a crime-ridden no-man's land where Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay meet. The lucrative drug trade could become "an unlimited source of cheap and easy revenue" for terrorist groups, DEA Chief of Operations Michael Braun warned Congress in testimony yesterday afternoon. A $6,000 kilo of Latin American cocaine, he noted, goes for $110,000 in Israel and $150,000 in Saudi Arabia. Key to the crackdown, officials say, will be going after the flow of money generated by the illicit trade.

Sentencing Expected For Three Charged In International Drug-Smuggling Investigation. The Vancouver Sun (3/30, Mulgrew) reports on the expected sentencing of three men charged for their involvement in a large, international cocaine smuggling ring. Their arrests in August 2001 "were part of the culmination of an incredibly complex, law-enforcement initiative that spanned the continent and targeted organized crime." The Sun continues, "The RCMP, the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, border security forces and other law-enforcement agencies would ultimately begin surveillance and wiretaps on dozens and dozens of individuals. Soon, they would be chasing people involved in supplying most of the marijuana consumed in Atlantic Canada, other individuals involved in shipping hundreds of kilograms of pot at a time to the U.S. and, of course, another parcel of people involved in importing massive amounts of cocaine from Mexico through the U.S. and into Canada."

Trial Continues For Former Massachusetts Narcotics Investigator. The Malden (MA) Observer (3/31, Keough) reports Jurors in Boston's U.S. District Court "are working their way through a wealth of witnesses and audio evidence to determine whether former Malden drug detective David Jordan did his best to single-handedly prevent a drug deal, or if he participated in a staged raid and used the cover of his officer's uniform to steal cocaine." Jordan "is being charged with conspiring to sell cocaine, cocaine possession, using a gun in the commission of a drug offense, witness intimidation and giving false information to Drug Enforcement Administration agents."

New Orleans Man Held Until Trial. The AP (3/30) reports that Brian Expose, who was "arrested last week with a cache of drugs and weapons, then set free without bond by New Orleans judge, will remain in federal detention pending trial on drug-dealing charges. … Expose was arrested March 21st by New Orleans police and Drug Enforcement Administration agents, after an investigation and surveillance of his home produced evidence he was selling drugs."

Five In New Jersey Indicted On Weapons Charges. The Asbury Park (NJ) Press (3/29, Jones) reported, "Five Monmouth County residents, including a former corrections officer, were indicted Tuesday on charges of selling a dozen guns and a bullet-proof vest — and trying to sell a live hand grenade — to a government witness, authorities said." John Velba, William Schreiber, Cheryl Britton, Harold Smith and Kevin Benn each are "charged with one count of conspiracy and one count of engaging in the business of dealing in firearms without a federal license to do so. … FBI agents arrested all five people on Nov. 1, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a prepared statement Tuesday."

Increasingly Popular Gun Shows Draw Supports, Critics. Knight Ridder (3/31, Thomas) reports that gun shows, "which gained popularity in the 1990s and now number in the thousands nationwide…are coming under increasing fire as critics claim they are contributing to the incidence of violent crime. … 'Gun shows are one of our main problems,' said Kansas City Mayor Pro Tem Alvin Brooks. 'These are the guns that end up on the streets of America.'" Knight Ridder continues, "Critics contend that the biggest problem is a legal loophole that allows criminals and others who are prohibited from buying a firearm to obtain guns from unlicensed sellers at guns shows. In most states, including Missouri and Kansas, no background checks are required to buy long guns - including assault rifles - from sellers who do not have a federal firearms license. … Gun-rights advocates maintain, however, that there is no 'gun show loophole.' … 'If anyone is involved in the trade of selling and buying firearms, they have to obtain a federal firearms license,' said Andrew Arulanandam, director of public affairs for the National Rifle Association. 'That is the law of the land today, so to say that there's a loophole is disingenuous.'" Knight Ridder notes, "Paul Marquardt, a spokesman for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Kansas City, said the agency is more concerned about 'the people who illegally sell firearms to criminals' such as felons, illegal aliens or drug traffickers. … 'The ATF does not target gun shows, we target criminals who are trying to acquire firearms from any source whether it's in a back alley or anywhere else,' Marquardt said."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Optimistic About Passage Of Immigration Reform Bill. In Cancun, Mexico today, President Bush met with Mexican President Vincente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Hunter. As the AP (3/31, Pickler) reports, "the immigration debate is receiving a lot of attention at the summit." USA Today (3/31, Jackson, 2.31M) reports Bush "told Mexican counterpart Vicente Fox on Thursday he supports a temporary 'guest worker' program, but said the final decision belongs to Congress -- where many of Bush's fellow Republicans oppose the idea. 'I told (Fox) there is a legislative process that's going forward,' Bush said."

According to the New York Times (3/31, Thompson, Sanger, 1.19M), "in an effort to reassure Mexicans and to defuse an intense debate in the United States," Bush told Vicente Fox "that he supported proposals to legalize undocumented workers as long as they were not given any advantages over immigrants who entered the United States legally." In fact, says Fox News' Special Report (3/30, Cameron), Bush "said he was optimistic about a deal in Congress and went out of his way to say that a guest worker program is not the same as amnesty."

NBC was the only network to cover the summit, highlighting the immigration debate as an introduction to its report on the Senate debate. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 3, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "They looked like good neighbors today, dressing down for a tour of Mexico's ancient Mayan ruins." Bush and Fox "were united calling for a process to put illegal immigrants on a path to legal status." President Bush: "We don't want people sneaking into our country who are going to do jobs Americans won't do. We want them coming in an orderly way." Gregory: "But in Congress today, the debate was still hot." Meanwhile, CNN's The Situation Room (3/30, Quijano) reported that Vicente Fox "acknowledged to reporters that the immigration issue was largely out of his and President Bush's hands, saying it was essentially up to the United States Congress." Despite Fox's comments, the AP (3/31, Pickler) says "both leaders were clearly trying to sway the debate," and Bush "gave Congress a long-distance push Thursday to open the United States to immigrant workers."

The Washington Times (3/31, Dinan, 90K) offers a different take on the story, under the headline "Fox Pledges More Border Control." The Times says Fox "yesterday promised President Bush that his country will do more to control the US-Mexico border and will strengthen its own southern border to reduce the number of aliens crossing into Mexico to reach the United States." The Times adds, "The emphasis on border security reflects the political climate in the United States on immigration, where the only point that nearly all voters agree on is that the borders leak and the U.S. government has failed to control them."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gaouette, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that "for Fox…the meeting brought the immigration debate full circle: He took office seeking to improve relations with the United States, particularly over immigration." But "that relationship was disrupted by the United States' attention to its campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11 attacks, and then by differences between Fox and Bush over the Iraq war, which Fox opposed."

The Washington Post (3/31, A13, Fletcher, 744K) focuses on the same issue, saying Bush came to the meeting is "hopes of repairing fissures that have developed in the relationship among the North American neighbors." The relationship "between the United States and both its neighbors has been characterized in recent years by creeping distrust over issues such as illegal immigration and the implementation of US trade policy."

Bush "Emerging Slowly" From "Touring Shell." Knight Ridder (3/31, Douglas), meanwhile, says Bush "traded in his business suit Thursday for a white tropical short-sleeve shirt and khaki slacks as he played tourist, something he rarely does on foreign trips." The President "was all smiles and business casual as he spent about an hour walking through the impressive ruins of Chichen-Itza, a Mayan archeological site about 127 miles west of Cancun." Bush "has earned a reputation for being an indifferent tourist at best on overseas trips, dashing through museums and exhibits or leaving social and cultural events early. He typically prefers to stick to business and not interrupt his routine. … The president seems to be emerging slowly from his touring shell. … On Thursday, Bush looked like a man having fun and in no hurry."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gerstenzang, 958K) runs a similar story, in which it says "Given a choice, President Bush is not a tourist. When he visited St. Petersburg, Russia, in 2002, he completed his tour of the Hermitage museum in two hours, 16 minutes. … As president, he has been to Rome. He skipped the Colosseum. Berlin? He drove past the Brandenburg Gate without stopping. He did the Great Wall of China in a half-hour flat, then turned to a reporter and said, 'Let's go home.' And four weeks ago, he caused a diplomatic row by refusing entreaties while in India to visit the Taj Mahal." The Times adds, "All of which make his activities Thursday morning that much more remarkable."

GOP Deeply Divided As Senate Debates Immigration. As the Senate debate on immigration reform continued yesterday, the Wall Street Journal (3/31, Rogers, 2.11M) reports that "in deference to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.), debate had been confined" to narrow "border-security bill favored by conservatives and the House." But yesterday, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "was allowed to bring out the broader Judiciary measure that will be the focus going forward." That bill includes guest worker and other provisions backed by the President. Democrats "believe they can deliver 42 votes for the bill, and Mr. McCain's office appeared confident that 18 Republicans can be found to bridge the difference and invoke cloture to cut off a filibuster." But Frist" said last night that 'cloture doesn't have the votes to pass now even if they had all 45 Democrats.'" The White House's "worst fear regarding the legislation is that it will collapse in the Senate, denying Mr. Bush the chance of getting the House to consider a more comprehensive approach to immigration."

The GOP split on immigration continued to dominate the coverage of the Senate debate. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 3, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Some Republicans are arguing that people don't want a guest worker program." Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado: "They want to secure the border and they want to go after the people who are hiring people here illegally." Gregory: "Others warn against isolationism." Sen. John McCain, Arizona: "But, by God, we have got to continue those traditions of freedom, democracy and hope for every person all over the Earth." Gregory: "Some Republicans fear this debate will hurt the party with Hispanics after President Bush successfully courted their votes."

Like NBC, many media outlets this morning highlight comments by Sens. Frist and McCain and GOP Rep. Tom Tancredo, a leading immigration. All three may run for president in 2008. Coverage of Tancredo's criticism of Bush (he said, for example, "I wish he'd think about the party, and of course, I also wish he'd think about the country") is particularly widespread. Tancredo is even profiled by the Washington Post (3/31, A1, Murray, Reid, 744K) in a front-page story this morning. Titled "Tuning In To Anger On Immigration," the piece recounts that "after Tancredo suggested in 2002 that President Bush's views on immigration amounted to a national security threat, White House political adviser Karl Rove told him, 'Don't ever darken the door of the White House' -- although Tancredo later was invited to the White House for a bill signing." Tancredo "has appeared more than 1,000 times on radio talk shows in recent years and has become a television news mainstay."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Koppell) reported that the Senate is "shaping up into two camps." On one side, "you have the Majority Leader, Bill Frist, who's saying that essentially to lay out a path to citizenship, to the 11 to 12 million illegal immigrants in this country, is tantamount to amnesty. On the other side, you have many Republicans and Democrats who are saying if you don't lay out that path, if you don't offer them a way out, what do you do?" CNN added, "Over in the House today -- as you know, the House already passed its legislation -- very tough border enforcement, but nothing to do with what many people refer to as a guest worker program. One of the leading proponents of the House legislation is Tom Tancredo, Republican of Colorado, who stood before an enormous banner with an X going through the word 'amnesty.' He said that according to recent polls, Americans are not in favor of legalizing those illegal aliens."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M), in its "Washington Wire" column, analyzes the immigration debate's impact on McCain and Frist's presidential prospects. McCain, says the Journal, "gains from improving odds for immigrant guest-worker program. House Speaker Hastert's openness to guest-worker compromise enhances Arizona senator's reputation for driving Hill action. Championing White House priorities, on immigration as well as Iraq, fuels his hopes for wooing Bush loyalists." Meanwhile, tough border-security talk by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "McCain's 2008 rival, could produce inroads among conservative Christians; by 64%-29%, evangelical Protestants call immigrants a burden rather than a benefit in new Pew Hispanic Center poll."

The debate over whether the bill would represent "amnesty" also took center stage yesterday. Dana Milbank writes in his Washington Post column (3/31, A2), "the use of the word 'amnesty' -- more than 50 times on the Senate floor yesterday -- says much about the immigration debate. Proponents of the 'guest-worker' path toward legalization appear to have gained the upper hand; Specter seems to have the votes in the Senate, and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is rethinking his chamber's hostility to a guest-worker plan. Opponents, therefore, need to escalate the rhetoric and invoke the A-word." Democrats, "who favor the guest-worker plan, called in a polling firm, Lake Research Partners, to provide talking points to counter the amnesty charge. 'Lead with an enforcement message,' the firm advised, and propose 'reasonable solutions' that are also 'tough and fair.' Lake continued: 'Immigrants have to pay taxes...and be learning English.'"

McCain took to the airwaves last night to make the case the a guest worker plan is not "amnesty." Sen. John McCain was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (3/30) about Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's criticism that his guest worker proposal is "amnesty" for immigrants in the US illegally. McCain said, "Let me just say that the definition of amnesty, as I read it in the dictionary, is forgiveness for crime, sin, et cetera. This is a tough, tough row to hoe for anyone who has violated our laws by coming to this country illegally. There's 11 or 12 million of them. We require them to pay back taxes, criminal background checks, $2,000 fine, work for six years before you're eligible for a green card. We're talking about 11 years or more in order to obtain citizenship. On the flip side of that is, they are here. They are here. And as George Will said, it would take 200,000 busses from San Diego to Alaska to transport them back. How would you possibly go about sending people back to the country that they came from? Our proposal is to make them earn citizenship, and through a very tough, rigorous procedure, which we don't believe is amnesty, nor by any definition of the word."

McCain said on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (3/30), "Everybody knows that we have to fix the problem of our broken borders and that we have 11 million to 12 million people in this country who are here illegally. So I want to make one early comment. That is the President's comments in Cancun today I thought were very helpful. He said we need a viable guest worker program and make people go to the end of the line, but give them a chance to earn championship."

The AP (3/31, Fournier) says polls "show the issue has the potential to divide Democrats as well as Republicans. Many working-class Democrats resent what they consider to be a constant flow of cheap labor. The hard-line House bill was backed by 36 Democrats, including those considered most in danger of losing their seats in November." Still," the fear is most palpable among GOP leaders. Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman said his party's challenge is to improve border security 'and do it in a way that is pro-immigrant.'" The AFP (3/31) says the debate sets Bush against "hard-line Republicans," while the Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gaouette, 958K) says it "pits the needs for post-9/11 border security against the economic and humanitarian concerns of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country." Another Los Angeles Times story (3/31, Gaouette, Gerstenzang) says the "competing visions" in Congress, "reflect attitudes among Americans, according to a poll by the nonpartisan Pew Hispanic Center. Like lawmakers, Americans are increasingly concerned about illegal immigration, with 52% seeing such immigrants as a burden to the country. And, like lawmakers, Americans are divided on how to deal with the issue."

House Conservatives Criticize Bush, Warn Leaders Not To Compromise With Senate. Under the headline "Conservatives Stand Firm On Immigration," the New York Times (3/31, Hulse, Swarns, 1.19M) reports "conservative House Republicans bluntly warned their leaders Thursday against any immigration compromise that would allow temporary foreign workers and assailed a Senate proposal that would open the way for illegal immigrants to earn citizenship." The "sharp divisions among Republicans illustrated the difficulty Congress would have in reaching agreement, particularly with midterm elections looming."

The Washington Times (3/31, Hurt, 90K) reports Rep. J.D. Hayworth, Arizona Republican, said of voters, "They will remember in November," and "many of those who have stood with our Republican majority in the last decade are not only angry, many of them plan to be absent from the polls" this year when the entire House and one-third of the Senate is up for re-election." GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California "fired a warning shot specifically at Sen. John McCain. … 'Those elected officials who are insisting on a guest-worker program and diluting the efforts of border security and internal enforcement are telling the American people exactly whose side they are on,' Mr. Rohrabacher said. 'The American people now have that opportunity to make that determination, and they will. Senator McCain and others will find out about that, when they find their own career is short term.'" Rep. Tom Tancredo, who "leads the House immigration reform caucus, offered a simple explanation for why Mr. Bush is pushing a guest-worker program that voters don't want. 'He's not running for re-election,' Mr. Tancredo said yesterday. 'I wish that he would recognize the dangerous position he would place himself in and the rest of his agenda if the Republicans lose the House and Senate, which they could easily do on this issue. Although he's not running for re-election, I wish he would think about the party. And, of course, I wish he'd think about the country."

Rohrabacker Says "Prisoners," Not Illegals, Should Pick Up Crops. The AP (3/31, Espo) also reports House conservatives "criticized…Bush, accused the Senate of fouling the air, said prisoners rather than illegal farm workers should pick America's crops and denounced the use of Mexican flags by protesters Thursday in a vehement attack on legislation to liberalize US immigration laws." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher said, "I say let the prisoners pick the fruits."

Guest Worker Issue Also Divides Liberals, Organized Labor. The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Weisman, 744K) reports, "New economic research that pits native-born workers against low-skilled immigrants in a struggle for jobs and wages has fueled a rift between some of Washington's most liberal lawmakers and their allies in economics and labor, who fear that the Democratic Party is pushing an immigration policy that forsakes the party's working-class mainstay." The Post adds, "At issue is a guest-worker provision that would allow hundreds of thousands of foreign workers legal access to the U.S. labor market each year and the impact those new low-wage workers would have on stagnant wages. An unusual coalition of business groups, immigration advocates and labor unions with large immigrant memberships have come together to support the guest-worker program proposed by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.)." Kennedy, "the Senate's liberal lion and an unflagging ally of organized labor, says the legislation he co-wrote would help all low-wage workers by applying minimum-wage laws and other workplace protections to immigrants and undocumented workers, who are often exploited." The AFL-CIO "and many economists strongly disagree."

Senate Votes To Launch Study On Illegals' Deaths. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "The Senate today approved an amendment to launch a study of how many illegal immigrants die trying to cross US borders, which Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) described as 'an immense humanitarian tragedy.'" The 94-0 vote "provided little hint of the tumultuous votes to come."

Few Temporary Visas Available For Skilled Immigrant Workers. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 8, 2:20, Lewis, 9.87M) reported, "By law, only 65,000 people a year can get" temporary skilled workers visas, and "it's difficult for them to become permanent residents. The same is true for foreign students pursuing high-tech subjects at American universities. When they complete their education, many are forced to go home, taking their skills home with them." But "unions and other organizations representing high-tech workers oppose liberalizing the visa and green card regulations."

The Washington Post (3/31, D1, Kalita, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Most See Visa Program As Severely Flawed," and reports "opponents say the highly skilled foreign workers compete with and depress the wages of native-born Americans." Meanwhile, "supporters say foreign workers stimulate the economy, create more opportunities for their US counterparts and prevent jobs from being outsourced overseas. The problem, they say, is the cumbersome process: Immigrants often spend six years as guest workers and then wait for green card sponsorship and approval."

Protests Continue. The New York Times/AP (3/31) reports from Houston, "Dozens of students were arrested or cited on Thursday." The students who were arrested "were among thousands in Texas and elsewhere who left class this week to rally in support of immigrants." They "were arrested after 150 students left class and refused to get on buses to return, Lt. Robert Manzo of the Houston police said." The Washington Post (3/31, B1, Bahrampour, Stockwell, 744K) says "demonstrations among high schoolers and middle schoolers spread yesterday as 1,500 students in Northern Virginia and a smaller group in Maryland poured into the streets to protest proposed federal legislation that would crack down on illegal immigrants." The Post adds that protesters were "draped in flags of Latin American countries."

High School Principal Raises Mexican Flag On Campus Flagpole. The Washington Times (3/31, Richardson, 90K) reports, "A high-school principal who raised the Mexican flag on a campus flagpole as a show of support for Hispanic students was disciplined yesterday as the school district grappled with massive student walkouts." Robert Pambello, principal of John H. Reagan High School in Houston, "received 'appropriate disciplinary action,' said Terry Abbott, a spokesman for the Houston Independent School District, adding that no details would be released because it was a personnel matter."

Latino Immigrants Becoming Integral Part Of North Carolina's Economy. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 8, 3:00, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "Many of the jobs" taken by Latino immigrants in North Carolina "are off the books. By one estimate, employers and illegal immigrants are shortchanging the Federal Government by $35 billion in unpaid income taxes. According to one new study, each Latino resident is costing North Carolina taxpayers $102 a year. But the equation is complex." John Kasarda, Kenan Institute, University of North Carolina: "The economic output of this state is increasingly dependent upon Hispanics." Snow: "Farmers rely on the hard-working immigrants. … Without them, these small towns wouldn't survive."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) editorializes that "the most important political outcome" of the immigration debate "may turn out to be the message that Republicans send about the kind of the party they are and hope to be." Republicans face a choice between "Ronald Reagan's view of America as a 'shining city on a hill'" and "the chauvinist conservatism usually associated with the European right. How Republicans conduct and conclude their immigration debate will show the country which kind of 'conservative' party they want to be."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (3/31, 958K) argues that California's two senators, Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein, "have not distinguished themselves in recent years on immigration issues, but this week it has been heartening to see them on the correct side of the momentous debate in the Senate. California is an iconic state of immigrants in this iconic nation of immigrants, and its representatives in Washington should be on the side of enlightened reform," referring to a "broad" guest-worker program.

In its "Opinionline," USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) surveys editorials from around the nation. The Parsons Sun from KS, in a signed editorial by Ann Charles says, "While a U.S. House-passed bill would make the presence of these laborers a felony and require fencing 700 miles of the border along Mexico, the reality of that would cause an earthquake in the US economy." The Middletown Journal from OJ, in an editorial: "The federal government's unwillingness to secure our borders and to stop the steady rush of people illegally coming into the United States threatens to overwhelm local communities' resources, services and employment opportunities. … It's time for Congress and the White House to do their jobs." Also, the Lufkin Daily News, in TX, editorialized: "It would be difficult to find even one American citizen who has not benefited in some way from the fruit of undocumented workers' labor. And with the exception of full-blooded Native Americans, every American is either descended from immigrants or is an immigrant himself."

Daniel Henninger, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M), "It's not a coincidence that the first push-back Immigration Act emerged in the Roaring Twenties, another period of abrupt social disruption and anxiety with heavy immigrant inflows from southern Europe. It may be too much to hope, but the purpose of political leadership in such times is to find a path toward our best lights rather than our darkest impulses. At the moment, Senator Frist of Tennessee isn't measuring up."

Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (3/31, A19, 744K), "It's frustrating. The three overlapping forces that have sent this country in so many wrong directions -- the conservative movement, the neoconservative movement and the Republican Party -- are warring among themselves, doing their best impression of crabs in a barrel, and sensible people can't even enjoy the spectacle. That's because it's hard to take pleasure in the havoc they've caused and the disarray they will someday leave behind."

In his New York Times column (3/31), Paul Krugman says he is "all in favor of…offering those already here a possible route to permanent residency and citizenship. Since we aren't going to deport more than 10 million people, we need to integrate those people into our society." But he is critical of "the plan to create a permanent guest-worker program."

TAX:

Judge Raises Questions About KPMG Tax-Shelter Prosecutions. The New York Times (3/31, Browning) reports, "A federal judge raised questions yesterday about the prosecution of 16 former KPMG employees over aggressive tax shelters, criticizing prosecutors for what he called murky definitions of fraud and evasion." The Times continues, "The judge, Lewis A. Kaplan of Federal District Court in Manhattan, said he was confused by what prosecutors said was a conspiracy by the defendants to make and sell aggressive shelters that allowed hundreds of wealthy investors to evade $2.5 billion in taxes from 1996 to 2002. … 'Was the fraud and evasion in the execution or the design' of the shelters, Judge Kaplan asked during a hearing held to consider defense motions to drop or alter some charges." The Times adds, "Judge Kaplan made no ruling yesterday; he is expected to issue orders on the motions in coming weeks."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Davies, Burns) reports, "Prosecutors contend the shelters were sham products designed, sold and implemented to improperly avoid paying taxes. The shelters were sold to about 600 wealthy individuals from 1996 to 2002 and generated about $2.5 billion in tax savings, prosecutors say. … Lawyers for the defendants argued that a separate settlement KPMG reached with prosecutors last year has hampered their clients' defense. The deferred-prosecution agreement required KPMG to admit to criminal wrongdoing and pay $456 million to avoid a criminal indictment that probably would have put the firm out of business. It makes it difficult to get current KPMG employees to testify freely about the case, say defense lawyers. … They also claim prosecutors pressured KPMG into not paying legal costs for those who were indicted. Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle said the government played no role in KPMG's decision."

Spitzer Rebuts WSJ On H&R Block Challenge. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (3/31), New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer writes, "In your March 24 editorial 'The Spitzer Savings Plan' you reported that I was upset at the H&R Block Co. … That much is true. … Compared with the array of frauds my office has uncovered -- including biased stock research, improper trading of mutual funds and bid-rigging in the insurance industry -- H&R Block's conduct was in certain ways particularly egregious. … That's because the company was preying on lower-income people, steering them into individual retirement accounts that were virtually guaranteed to lose money because of high fees and low interest rates. And H&R Block had the audacity to suggest that it was actually doing people a favor. Here are the facts to show why that claim is absurd:" Spitzer continues, "H&R Block told its tax preparation customers that its Express IRA 'paid great rates' and was a 'better way to save.' Some 500,000 people signed up. But instead of receiving 'great rates,' the Express IRA actually paid less than 1% interest at times. … Most importantly, and this is the core of our case, H&R Block failed to tell customers that the Express IRA had substantial fees …" Spitzer concludes, "No true champion of free enterprise, as the Journal purports to be, would defend the failure to properly disclose fees to customers. And no one truly interested in encouraging people to save would recommend H&R Block's Express IRA. After all, how does losing money encourage anyone to save? … Finally, contrary to your characterizations, this case could easily have been settled if the company had simply agreed to return the undisclosed fees. … And for the record, I always get upset when I see people being cheated."

GOP Believes It Can Save "Modest Tax Cut Victory." The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Republicans grow confident of salvaging modest tax-cut victory. Though hitting initial April tax-day target is unlikely, strategists at the White House and on Capitol Hill predict passage of temporary extension of the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains. … Other tax proposals seek election-year political points. Senate leader Frist plans May vote on abolishing estate tax, though Republicans lack the 60 votes needed to defeat potential Democratic filibuster."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow's Future At Treasury Uncertain. The AP (3/31, Aversa) reports the departure of Andrew Card as White House Chief of Staff "is renewing speculation about the fate of Treasury Secretary John Snow, the administration's lead economic salesman for three years." Asked about "a New York Times story which said that Joshua Bolten, Bush's incoming chief of staff, wanted to make changes to the economics team and wanted to replace Snow," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "The president appreciates the job his economic team is doing." McClellan "didn't rule out changes at the helm of Treasury, saying Bolten has the authority to recommend personnel changes throughout the Bush administration. But, McClellan added: 'Any speculation at this point is way premature.'" The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Harwood, 2.11M) also reports in its "Washington Wire" column about "rumors swirl of changes at Treasury following Bolten's elevation. … Dubai ports controversy hurts Deputy Secretary Kimmitt's chance of moving up if Snow departs. To replace Bolten at budget office, current deputy Joel Kaplan is seen as more politically savvy but less connected than colleague Clay Johnson, Bush's one-time classmate."

Neuharth Says Bush Should Dump Cheney, Name Rice As VP. Al Neuharth writes in USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) that the resignation of White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card started the Oval Office shakeup many have been calling for, but "for Bush to bounce back from plunging ratings, he must make more drastic White House reorganization. Two moves that might do the trick: Lobby to get Vice President Cheney named NFL commissioner, succeeding Paul Tagliabue who resigned last week. Then name Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice vice president." Neuharth says Cheney "is the real albatross for Bush. … If Bush wants a say in picking his successor, and most presidents do, replacing Cheney is a necessary first step. … Replacing Cheney with Rice would make her the front-runner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination."

Frist Faces Undercurrent Of Criticism Over 2008 Ambition. The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Curtius, 958K) reports that as he "prepares to leave the Senate and position himself for a presidential bid," Majority Leader Bill Frist "faces mounting criticism that he has proved an ineffectual majority leader whose legislative agenda increasingly is dictated by his White House ambitions." The "complaints about the patrician Tennessean by fellow Republicans intensified this week, sparked by his decision to force a Senate debate on illegal immigration. Some GOP lawmakers say his move spotlighted a public squabble within the party over a hot-button issue in an election year." But the

"grumbling about Frist and decisions he has made as majority leader were evident before the flap over immigration," reflecting the "growing discontent with his performance."

Censure Said To Have "Mixed Record" In Rebuking Presidents. The Senate Judiciary Committee meets today to consider Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for his National Security Agency domestic surveillance program. The Washington Post (3/31, A17, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "Old newspaper clippings and historical writings show that censure has a mixed record as an effective means for Congress to express disapproval of presidents." One reason censure "has not had much legitimacy as a tool for rebuke is that it is expressed by a congressional resolution without the force of law, and 'you can express a resolution that apple pie and motherhood are good for American life,' says professor William W. Van Alstyne of the College of William & Mary law school. Yet it has kept on coming up."

Senate Judiciary Committee Clears Way For Courtroom Cameras. CQ Today (3/30, Carter) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee approved two bills Thursday that would pave the way for televising proceedings at all federal courts, including the Supreme Court." CQ continues, "The committee approved, 10-6, a measure (S 829) by Charles E. Grassley that would give both district and appellate court judges the option of allowing their proceedings to be televised. The bill includes a three-year sunset on the district court provision. … Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., offered an amendment to remove district courts from the bill, but it was rejected by a 7-9 vote." CQ adds, "Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has long wanted to see Supreme Court proceedings televised. His bill (S 1768), which would require the court to permit television coverage of its public sessions, is cosponsored by several committee members of both parties. … The measure, approved 12-6, would require television cameras to be allowed in the high court unless a majority of the nine justices voted not to do so in a particular case for fear they would violate due process rights."

House Passes Education Bill. The New York Times (3/31, Schemo, 1.19M) reports, "The House voted largely along party lines on Thursday to approve the main measure governing colleges and universities, adding provisions to expand student grants based on need and pressing colleges to control tuition." But "the House rejected a Democratic proposal to halve the interest rate on student loans." The Times adds, "The $70 billion proposal, which would renew the law until 2012, sets the terms for loans and grants along with the limits for maximum aid. It was last renewed in 1998."

The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Hechinger, 2.11M) says "the College Access and Opportunity Act sparked complaints from Democrats and higher-education groups, though Republicans changed some measures at the last minute to mollify universities." The bill "passed the Republican-controlled House…221-199." It "reauthorizes the Higher Education Act, which governs billions of dollars of federal funding for colleges and universities. The Senate is expected to take up its own version of the reauthorization in coming months." The Washington Times (3/31, Bellantoni, 90K) headlines its story "House Passes Bill To Raise Pell Grant For Poor Students," and notes "there were 14 Democrats who sided with the chamber's majority to pass the measure," while "eighteen Republicans and one independent voted with the Democrats in protest."

FBI Check Said To Have Prompted Redmond Nomination Withdrawal. The Washington Times (3/31, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Former CIA spy hunter Paul Redmond, who helped catch notorious Moscow mole Aldrich Ames, has withdrawn from consideration to become the Bush administration's top counterspy." US intelligence officials said Redmond had "been selected to be national counterintelligence executive, but backed out after the FBI held up his formal appointment by conducting a lengthy background investigation, said officials speaking on the condition of anonymity." The Times notes, "Counterspy posts at the CIA and FBI also remain vacant or held by acting officials at a time when foreign spying continues to plague the administration. FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told a congressional committee earlier this week that Chinese spying is a 'major threat' to the United States."

Boozman Among GOP Representatives At Informal Bush Chat. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (3/31) reports Arkansas' Rep. John Boozman "was one of a dozen Republican congressmen who participated Wednesday in what he described as an 'informal' meeting with President Bush." The group "talked in the White House living quarters. Boozman has been on several Air Force One flights, but he said this was his first meeting with the president 'in this kind of setting.'"

Boehner Confirms Pension Overhaul Bill Stalled. CQ (3/30, Crittenden) reports House Majority Leader John A. Boehner "made clear Thursday what lobbyists and staff members recently have suggested: Conferees will be unable to complete negotiations on a pension overhaul bill before Congress leaves town April 7 for a two-week recess." Boehner said, "I'd like to, but I'm not sure that's realistic. It's very, very difficult." CQ adds Boehner's comments "were the latest signal that lawmakers have made little progress reconciling differences on pension overhaul legislation (HR 2830) since the conference convened March 8."

New NASA Policy Permits NASA Scientists To Discuss Opinions Freely. NASA Administrator Michael Griffin unveiled new rules yesterday governing the release of information to the media and public. The New York Times (3/31, Leary, 1.19M) reports, "Two months after NASA's top climate scientist complained that political operatives in the agency's press office were trying to censor his views on global warming, Administrator Michael D. Griffin issued a new communications policy on Thursday that he called a 'commitment to openness.'" The policy "details the role of those who release information to the public directly or through the news media" and it "ensures that NASA scientists and engineers are free to discuss their work in public and state their opinions, Dr. Griffin said. When stating a personal opinion, he continued, they should make clear that they are speaking for themselves and not for the agency."

The Washington Post Weiss (3/31, A10, Weiss) reports that the release marks Griffin's "most detailed response yet to embarrassing allegations that NASA's public affairs office had sought to suppress the release of scientific information not consistent with the views of the Bush administration." The new policy "states that NASA scientists are free to talk to members of the media about their scientific findings and even express personal interpretations of those findings -- the heart of the controversy that has engulfed the agency since January. It also makes clear that scientists are not required to have a public affairs officer with them when they speak with members of the media, though Griffin emphasized yesterday in comments broadcast to NASA employees that he believes such behavior is unwise."

House Ethics Panel Proceeds On McDermott Case, No Others. CQ (3/30, Ferrechio) reports that after "15 months of near-inactivity, the House ethics committee met for six hours but managed to agree only on moving forward with one investigation: the one launched last year, targeting Democrat Jim McDermott of Washington." The 10-member panel, "could not come to agreement on a list of other potential cases awaiting scrutiny, including those related to an influence-peddling scandal under investigation by the Justice Department." Democratic Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, ranking member, "made his displeasure clear. 'The sole action that the committee agreed to take was to continue an investigation that was initiated in 2004, at the end of the last Congress. This result falls far short of the committee's obligations in the current circumstances,' he said in a written statement." CQ adds McDermott is "accused of violating House rules in December 1996, when he received and distributed to reporters an intercepted mobile telephone conversation between Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. (1979-99), and John A. Boehner of Ohio, who at the time was House Republican Conference chairman."

House Republicans, Democrats Trade Barbs On McKinney Incident. USA Today/AP (3/31, Kellman) reports House Republicans and Democrats "engaged in their own scuffle — but just a rhetorical one — Thursday, a day after Rep. Cynthia McKinney had a dustup with a Capitol Police officer." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "called the incident 'a mistake, an unfortunate lack of recognition of a member of Congress.' She said the police officer was not at fault." Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., responded, "How many officers would have to be punched before it becomes a big deal?"

McKinney Admits Not Wearing ID Pin. The Washington Post (3/31, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports that in Rep. Cynthia McKinney's statement on the incident, McKinney "admitted that she was not wearing the pin that identifies her as a member of Congress entitled to bypass Hill security checks. Why not? John Judge, a McKinney staffer, said that "a number of the women [in Congress] don't wear the pin, and some men don't either. . . . They train [officers] to recognize the members. It's not just the pin.'"

Talks Between FAA, Union Collapse. The Washington Post (3/31, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Contract talks between the Federal Aviation Administration and its second-largest union fell apart yesterday amid a set of unusual maneuvers. Shortly after noon, the leaders of the Professional Airways Systems Specialists announced they had agreed to the agency's contract terms and would send the agreement to union members -- but with full confidence that the rank and file would turn it down. Within hours, the FAA said it planned to file an unfair labor practice complaint against the union -- a step usually taken by unions, not the government." The Post adds, "If the FAA and its unions fail to reach agreements on contract extensions, the agency may declare an impasse, which sends such disputes to the Republican-controlled Congress for a 60-day review. If Congress takes no action -- more likely than not -- then the FAA's last, best offer can be imposed on the unions."

House Approves Site For Vietnam Veterans Visitors Center. In a 404 to 4 vote Tuesday, the House approved an underground visitor center near the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. The Washington Post (3/31, B1, Dvorak, 744K) reports that Rep. Richard W. Pombo, who sponsored the bill, "said he met with the chairman of the planning commission before he was convinced that legislation was the only answer to get site approval for the center, which was authorized by Congress in November 2003." The legislation now moves to the Senate.

Bush Told Bo Derek She And Bolten Together Were "A Perfect 15." The Washington Post (3/31, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports that back "during the heady days of the 2000 George W. Bush campaign, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten was known as a cool, efficient policy director, and the go-to man when actress-turned-Republican-gadfly Bo Derek -- the woman who inspired the numerical system of hotness ratings -- needed a campaign escort." When Bolten "turned 46 that August, Dubya refused to believe his staffer had received a 'Happy Birthday' phone call from the star of '10' and many legendary Playboy features -- until he grabbed Bolten's cell phone and dialed the number from the last received call, according to a source who was there. When Derek answered, the future president said, 'Bo, let me just say that you and Josh together are a perfect 15.'"

WPost, NYTimes Criticize Lobbying Reform Bill. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/31, A18, 744K) notes that the leading advocates of lobbying reform in the Senate, including the parties' two designated point men on the issue, Sens. John McCain and Barack Obama all voted against it. The Post notes, "Much more could, and should, have been done." But, if "the Senate bill is disappointing," the House "is poised to do even worse. A proposal unveiled last month by the Republican leadership would do nothing to restrict gifts from lobbyists." The Post adds, "As the proposal moves forward -- the House Rules Committee held a hearing on it yesterday -- a critical issue will be whether and how many amendments will be permitted on the House floor to try to make it tougher. It would be the height of irony if an effort to improve the functioning of the democratic process were to take place under undemocratic conditions."

An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) also criticizes lawmakers' efforts at lobbying reform noting that "the Senate has voted for a halfhearted package of reforms that would come nowhere near curing the easy money, quid pro quo culture that now bedevils the Capitol." The Times adds, "For all its shortcomings, the Senate is a light-year ahead of the House. There, reform proposals have been parceled out to committees for indefinite marination as Republican leaders face rebellious members who want no part of real reform. The chances seem slim for two-house action that truly dents the clout of the booming lobbying industry."

Fed Researches Say Data Showing Low Jobless Rate Is Accurate. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Ip, 2.11M) reports, "US unemployment really is low and the jobless rate hasn't been artificially depressed by a failure of many discouraged workers to be counted as unemployed, Federal Reserve researchers say." Their findings, "presented at a conference organized by the Brookings Institution, suggest the Fed could see strong job growth as an inflationary risk in the coming year." The study also "argues that the economy's trend growth rate will slow noticeably in the coming decade as growth in the working-age population slows and a shrinking share of that population seeks work."

Corporate Profits, Inflation Rise. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "Corporate America's share of the nation's income rebounded from the havoc of Hurricane Katrina to a level not seen in four decades, and the hurricane did a bit less damage to the U.S. economy than previously thought." The Commerce Department "said yesterday that corporate pretax profits in the fourth quarter of 2005 grew 14.4% from the previous quarter, the strongest rate since 1992. Pretax profits in the third quarter fell 4% as hurricane-related insurance payouts slammed financial results." Corporate profits "accounted for 11.6% of gross domestic product in the fourth quarter -- the biggest share of the nation's income companies have taken since 1966." USA Today (3/31, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) says "inflation also jumped as the nation grappled with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the government said Thursday." A "special inflation measure based on actual spending patterns, closely watched by the Federal Reserve, rose faster than expected. Commerce's index of consumer inflation, excluding food and energy, was revised to a 2.4% annual rate in the fourth quarter of 2005, from an earlier 2.1% estimate."

Stock Markets Have Mixed Finish. NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, the Dow was down 65 points [to close at 11,150.70]. The NASDAQ was just up over 3 points [to close at 2,340.82]." USA Today (3/31, 2.31M) says the Standard & Poor's 500 lost 2.64 points to 1300.25. The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Patterson, 2.11M), among other sources, also reports the stock numbers.

Cost Of Church Sex Abuse Claims Rises Despite Fewer New Allegations. The Washington Post (3/31, A3, Cooperman) reports, "The financial costs of the sex abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Church rose dramatically in 2005, even as the number of new allegations fell, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops said yesterday."

The Post continues, "Releasing an annual report on their efforts to prevent abuse of minors by priests, the bishops said U.S. dioceses spent $399 million last year on legal settlements with sex abuse victims and $68 million on lawyers' fees, psychological counseling and related expenses -- about three times more than they paid in 2004." The Post adds, "The church's cumulative expenditures on sex abuse claims in the United States are approaching $1.5 billion. The tally of known victims has topped 12,500. The number of priests and deacons who have been credibly accused since 1950 is close to 5,000. … In releasing the blizzard of statistics, Catholic Church officials and their academic consultants put a generally positive gloss on the data, suggesting that the worst of the crisis is over. … Karen Terry, a researcher at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said the vast majority of the abuse took place from the mid-1960s to the mid-1980s. There has been a sharp decline in the number of cases since the early 1990s, which an analysis indicates is not just a matter of a lag in reporting, she said."

The New York Times (3/31, Banerjee) reports, "The bishops also said that as a result of a provision they adopted in 2002 under a toughened policy, 94.5 percent of children in Catholic schools and Sunday school classes had been educated on keeping themselves safe from abuse, an increase from 51 percent the year before." The Times adds, "The survey said 87 percent of the new accusations involved abuse that occurred before 1990, some of it as early as 1950. Only nine accusations concerned abuse last year. … But victims' groups have argued that recent accounts of abuse and the church's resistance to extending the statute of limitations on it are renewing doubts about the bishops' commitment to solving the problem." The Times notes, "The president of the bishops' conference, William S. Skylstad of the Spokane Diocese, himself faces accusations of sexually abusing a girl in the early 1960's, which he denies. And earlier this year, after a priest in Chicago was arrested on charges of molesting boys, the archdiocese there came under fire when it was disclosed that the police had shared accusations of abuse with church officials as early as last August. The archdiocese did not remove the priest until January."

The Washington Times (3/31, Duin) reports, "The report, commissioned in 2002 by the USCCB's Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People, tracks what the country's 195 Catholic dioceses are doing to end a sex-abuse crisis that has involved 12,537 youths -- mostly boys and young men -- and 4,827 priests. … Accusations against Catholic priests decreased 28 percent last year, but the cost in millions of dollars to the nation's Catholic dioceses shot up 219 percent last year, the USCCB said. … Specifically, $139,582,157 was paid out in sex-abuse cases in 2004 -- for settlements, attorneys' fees, victim therapy and other costs. Last year, that amount rose to $445,686,548, including the $100 million that California's Diocese of Orange agreed to pay to 90 claimants in January and $120 million the Covington, Ky., diocese agreed to pay to more than 100 victims in June."

Insurers See Drug Benefit As Opening Door To Greater Presence In Medicare. The New York Times (3/31, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports that for "many big insurers, the new Medicare program is shaping up as a great opportunity. And prescription drugs may be only a starting point." So far, "about 18 million Americans are participating in the new drug program, known as Medicare Part D. If things play out the way some big insurers hope, the drug program could prove to be a feeder system into a much greater private presence in Medicare — a longstanding goal of the Bush administration." Insurers "like Humana, which says it has signed up 1.7 million Medicare drug plan members, know that the real money is not in providing drug insurance. The rewards are much richer in other types of Medicare policies, including complete managed care plans called Medicare Advantage, which are operated by the private insurers but subsidized by Medicare."

Company Says It Has Cloned Champion Cutting Horses. A Texas company says it has cloned two champion cutting horses for $150,000 each and would create as many as 30 ore cloned horses over the next year. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/31, A1, Gillis, 744K) reports, "The plans by ViaGen Inc. of Austin represent by far the most ambitious effort yet to turn horse cloning into a paying business. There's little doubt that ViaGen, with one of the world's top cloning scientists in its stable, can pull off the necessary laboratory work, and not a single government rule or regulation stands in the way. But it remains to be seen how far the U.S. horse industry will go in embracing the technique that produced Dolly the sheep a decade ago and has since come to symbolize many people's fears about modern genetic science."

Webb Eulogizes Weinberger. In the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M), James Webb, a former Navy Secretary and a Democratic candidate for the US Senate from Virginia, eulogizes former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, noting, "In this town of inflated egos and ruthless ambition, I have never met a more gracious man. And in a lifetime that, beginning with my father's military service, spans every secretary of defense, I can think of no one who has ever held that office with more competence, intellect and understanding of our country's place in the world." Webb adds, "It is painful for those who knew and respected Cap Weinberger to see his name, even in his obituaries, associated with the Iran-Contra affair, an endeavor that he himself had advised against. But his loyalties were astounding, even legendary among the Reagan inner circle."

NYTimes Criticizes "Piecemeal State-By-State Approach" To Stem Cell Research. An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) says that Maryland is about to become the fourth state to authorize the use of state funds for embryonic stem cell research, joining California, New Jersey and Connecticut "in recognizing that the federal government's abdication of support for embryonic stem cell research has effectively shifted the issue to the states." The Times adds, "This piecemeal state-by-state approach is an absurd way to conduct research that may have extraordinary importance if it pans out. Few residents of states that ban therapeutic cloning will refuse lifesaving therapies developed in other states. So it seems unfair to rely on a handful of states to fill the gaps left by the federal abdication."

WPost Urges Local Governments To Help Homeless. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/31, A18, 744K) says the growing number of homeless people in Washington "has strained the capacity of shelters and other social services. And while the problem of homelessness used to be mainly an urban one, concentrated in the District, now it is felt equally in the suburbs, where half of the region's homeless are thought to live. … It may be impossible to eliminate homelessness altogether, but minimizing it should not be beyond the means of such rich localities. Perhaps a third of the suburban homeless here have jobs. They are making a go of it, and they deserve a greater helping hand from local governments."

China, Russia Rebuff Rice's Suggestion On Iran Sanctions. The New York Times (3/31, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting…with representatives of the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, raised the idea of imposing unspecified sanctions on Iran, but she received a decidedly cool reaction from China and Russia," who "bluntly declared on Thursday that they had no interest in imposing sanctions of any sort or in taking any further action against Iran, though both countries did express concern about the nuclear program." The Financial Times (3/31) adds, "Moscow underlined its opposition to sanctions, and was backed by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the UN nuclear watchdog," and "some diplomats said the event highlighted the continuing international divisions on how to move forward."

In contrast, the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) emphasizes international solidarity on the Iran issue, leading that Rice "warned that 'the international community is united' in its dispute with Iran over its nuclear program," although it later admits "the comments hinted at the strains in the anti-Iran alliance." The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, LaFranchi, 61K) says "the brief Berlin meeting resulted not so much in a 'strategy'" but in "a reinforced show, after Wednesday's Security Council action, of international opposition to a nuclear-armed Iran."

The Washington Post (3/31, A16, Kessler, 744K) reports "senior diplomats from the five veto-wielding members of the UN Security Council and Germany warned Iran on Thursday to halt sensitive nuclear activities and return to the negotiating table," but "strains were apparent as Russia and China appeared to rule out sanctions or military action." Knight Ridder (3/31, Strobel) says "there was agreement" on the "general goal," but "there was no agreement apparent on tactics in the weeks ahead." The Washington Times (3/31, Kralev, 90K) headlines its story "Russian Official Contradicts West On Tehran,"

Iran Vows To Continue Uranium Enrichment Despite UN Demands. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 4, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Defiance from Iran about its nuclear program. The country is vowing to go ahead with uranium enrichment a day after the UN Security Council demanded that Tehran stop immediately. An Iranian diplomat said the program is 'not reversible.'" The AP (3/31, Jahn) also reports that Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Tehran's chief representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, "defiantly rejected a U.N. Security Council demand for a halt in uranium enrichment, saying Thursday that Tehran's activities are 'not reversible.'" His statements "cast a pall on a meeting of top officials of the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany."

ElBaradei Says Iran Not "An Imminent Threat." The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Fleishman, Rubin, 958K) reports, "UN Atomic Energy chief Mohammed ElBaradei urged the international community Thursday to steer away from threats of sanctions against Iran to prevent the dispute over the country's nuclear intentions from spiraling out of control." ElBaradei, speaking in Doha, "emphasized that Iran is not 'an imminent threat' and urged countries to 'lower the pitch' in their effort to stop Iran's nuclear work."

Earthquake Kills At Least 17 In Iran. The New York Times/AP (3/31) reports, "A strong earthquake followed by an even stronger aftershock jolted western Iran early Friday, killing at least 17 and injuring hundreds, state media reported."

Suicide Bomber Kills Three In Jerusalem. The New York Times (3/31, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "A Palestinian suicide bomber, possibly disguised as an observant Jew, blew himself up at a gas station in the West Bank on Thursday evening, turning a car into a fireball and killing three Israelis inside the vehicle, Israeli news reports said." Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades "claimed responsibility for the blast, which came hours after the newly installed Palestinian cabinet, led by Hamas, took up its duties in the Palestinian Authority government offices." The new Palestinian interior minister, Said Siam, "who is in charge of the police, announced that Palestinian militants would no longer be arrested by the Palestinian security forces."

Rice Says US Will Decide On Palestinian Aid Soon. The AP (3/31, Gearan) reports that Secretary Rice said "the United States should soon decide how it will give more aid to the Palestinians that would not be diverted to bankroll the Palestinian government led by the militant group Hamas." She added that "the level of future U.S. aid is one question mark, as is the problem of deciding what kinds of projects to fund through nongovernmental organizations or other means and 'what kinds of aid might in fact get diverted and so you want to avoid that.'" Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar maintains that "the Palestinian Authority's new government would not cave to international pressure to change its ways and that it has no plans to negotiate with Israel."

Abrams, Welch Visit Tel Aviv While Rice Suggests US Might Support Unilateral Separation. The Financial Times (3/31, Morris) reports White House Advisor Eliot Abrams and Assistant Secretary David Welch "met Israeli leaders yesterday for the first time since Tuesday's election after Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, indicated Washington did not rule out support for unilateral measures in the West Bank by the next government. … However, she said the US would not yet lend its support to unilateral moves until it knew more about them."

Likud Reacts To Election Debacle. The Washington Times (3/31, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "Israel's right wing found itself searching for a leader and a program yesterday after the shock of Tuesday's elections, in which the long-dominant Likud Party was reduced to one of several minor parliamentary factions. Calls are being heard for former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to be replaced as leader of Likud amid charges that he has alienated moderate voters from the nation's most dominant party of the past 30 years." The Times adds, "Rising as a new champion of the right is Avigdor Lieberman, whose party of Russian immigrants, Yisrael Beiteinu, finished with 11 seats to Likud's 12 in the final results, which were announced yesterday."

Dionne Says Israeli Election Was Dominated By Domestic Concerns. E. J. Dionne Jr. writes in his column in the Washington Post (3/31, A19, 744K) that "The world expected Israel to have an election on national security, but the voters decided that it was about the economy, stupid," as "the big winners were a group of parties that ran against Israel's rising social inequality." The "domestic social concerns rose to the top of voters' minds precisely because the security situation is frozen," and "voters can cast aside their economic concerns for only so long, even in a nation facing an existential threat."

US, EU Jointly Haul China Before WTO. The Financial Times (3/31, Swann, Minder, Mackintosh) reports, "The US and the European Union on Thursday joined forces for the first time to challenge China before the World Trade Organisation, sweeping aside diplomatic niceties weeks before a visit of the Chinese president to Washington." The Times calls the car parts complaint "provocatively timed ahead of Hu Jintao's visit." USTR Rob Portman "indicated that diplomacy would not be allowed to stand in the way of defending American industry." The Wall Street Journal (3/31, Hitt, 2.11M) reports Portman "said the 'United States has raised this issue repeatedly,' but with no success. 'As a mature trading partner, China should be held accountable for its actions and be required to live up to its responsibilities,' said Mr. Portman." Portman "said he called China's ambassador to the U.S. on Wednesday and 'expressed my disappointment' that the complaints 'had not been resolved through dialogue.'"

The Washington Post (3/31, D5, Blustein, 744K) reports the move "comes amid pressure on the administration from members of Congress to take a tough stance on China's trade practices, especially as the trade deficit with China swelled to $201.6 billion last year, the biggest US gap ever with any country." The New York Times (3/31, Porter, 1.19M) notes "the complaint is only the second brought against China since it joined the trade organization in 2001; the United States filed a complaint in 2004 over China's tax treatment of domestic and imported semiconductors."

China Seeing Surge In Protectionist Sentiment. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, Chen, 2.11M) reports that an economic uproar in China "has turned on foreigners, targeting the many outside investors that have piled into China and prospered -- even while fueling much of the country's growth. … The debate parallels the resurgence of protectionist sentiment in the U.S., which has been driven in part by concerns over China's clout." The "debate inside China is causing the government to rethink its approach. In banking, for instance, some economists and state officials argue that the government has sold foreign stakes in its major state-run commercial banks too cheaply. … The concentration of industries in foreign hands has become a common theme."

WSJournal Suggests "Vietnam-Like Compromise" For Vatican, China. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) says that Vatican is working hard at restoring ties with China, but Beijing "insists that the Holy See drop its recognition of Taiwan in exchange for the right to minister to the mainland faithful. … This is an old game," but it is "particularly odious for China to play that card on spiritual matters." The Journal adds that the Vatican "would be well-advised to demand some serious concessions in return. … Both sides might do well to agree to a Vietnam-like compromise. In Vietnam the Holy See is recognized, but must consult with the Communist government before naming new clergy. While that offends Catholic purists, it's given Vietnam's Communist Party a better image; the Church, a new flock; and the people of Vietnam, a moral purpose the party can't provide."

US Military's Efforts To Help Pakistani Earthquake Victims Noted. The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, Montero, 61K) reports from Islamabad, Pakistan, "In the last six months, some 1,200 US military personnel and a fleet of 24 helicopters have delivered over 15,000 tons of humanitarian aid, in what has been called the largest disaster relief operation in US military history. The 'angels of mercy,' as US helicopters have been called, have delivered not only aid but much needed goodwill in Pakistan, softening an otherwise rocky relationship with the United States." The Monitor adds, "Polling in recent months has shown a marked improvement for the US image among the Pakistani public as a result of the American helping hand."

Lantos Expresses Concerns About Nuclear Deal With India. The AFP (3/31) reports, "India's alleged training of Iranian troops could dampen vital US Congress support for a bilateral landmark civilian nuclear deal, a ranking Democrat warned Thursday." Tom Lantos, "the top Democrat on the House of Representatives' powerful international relations committee scrutinizing the nuclear deal, expressed concern to visiting Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran during talks here over New Delhi's training of the Iranian navy, the lawmaker's spokeswoman Lynne Weil told AFP."

Meanwhile, the AP (3/31, Klug) reports Saran said the "landmark civilian nuclear cooperation deal with the United States would not boost India's nuclear weapons arsenal said Thursday." In "often strong words," he "attacked the criticism that has surrounded a pact critics say would weaken efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. He told an audience at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, that India's record on nuclear issues has long been one of restraint and responsibility."

The Los Angeles Times (3/31, Richter, 958K), under the headline "US-Indian Nuclear Deal No Shoo-In," says the proposed deal "is meeting with a chilly reception from lawmakers, who are predicting that instead of swift approval, the initiative faces revisions and delays, if not outright rejection." The White House "had hoped to win congressional approval by the end of May for the deal," but "the initiative has found few high-profile champions on Capitol Hill or elsewhere, while becoming a target for criticism from the right and left that it could further undermine international efforts to stem the spread of nuclear weapons."

India Moves To Prevent Sex-Determined Abortions. The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, Baldauf, 61K) reports that New Delhi doctor Anil Sabhani "faces two years in jail in the first-ever conviction under a 12-year old Indian law that forbids doctors from revealing the gender of a fetus to its parents. The law was aimed at preventing the all-too-common and growing practice of sex-determined abortions, which have left India with far more boys than girls. Women's rights activists welcomed the convictions, but added that it will take more than a few high- profile trials to change India's centuries-old cultural preference for boys." Girls "are often seen as a drain on family wealth, since the girl's family is required by centuries of tradition to provide a dowry to her husband's family when she marries."

Sierra Leone Court Asks Hague Tribunal To Try Taylor. The New York Times (3/31, Polgreen, Simons, 1.19M) reports the Sierra Leonean government "asked the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands to provide a venue for" indicted former Liberian president Charles Taylor. "Mr. Taylor has many loyalists in the region, so his presence is a potential threat to the fragile peace that exists here and in Liberia. Secret talks between the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Dutch government about transferring Mr. Taylor to The Hague began several weeks ago." Such a transfer would require an UNSC resolution. The ICC, established in 2002, has no jurisdiction over the 1990s crimes for which Taylor, "one of Africa's most notorious warlords," is accused.

The Washington Post (3/31, A15, Timberg, 744K) reports Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf "said Thursday that she supported a bid to move the war crimes trial to The Hague and that Taylor's dignity and rights must be guaranteed as the case advanced." The Christian Science Monitor (3/31, McLaughlin, 61K), among other sources, also reports on the Taylor trial in a story headlined "Era Of Impunity Wanes For African Leaders."

Venezuelan Candidate Opposes Election Boycott. The New York Times (3/31, Forero, 1.19M) reports that while most of Venezuela's "fragmented opposition" is boycotting the presidential election this year, Julio Borges "is running for office," working "against long odds to win over supporters of President Hugo Chávez." Borges "argues that boycotting elections only adds to [President Hugo] Chávez's power and has already made Venezuela in effect a one-party state. Proponents of a boycott say Mr. Chávez has undermined the institutions of democracy, so they seek to undercut his legitimacy by spoiling elections."

Trachoma Remains Endemic In Third World. The New York Times (3/31, Dugger, 1.19M) reports that trachoma, a disease which disappeared from the US and Europe as living standards improved, remains "endemic in much of Africa and parts of Latin America and Asia, its last, stubborn redoubts." Blinding damage from the disease "builds over decades of repeated infections that begin in babies. The infections are spread from person to person, or by hungry flies that feed from seeping eyes." The Times adds, "As prevalent as trachoma remains, the W.H.O. has made the blinding late stage of the disease a target for eradication within a generation because, in theory at least, everything needed to vanquish it is available. Controlling trachoma depends on relatively simple advances in hygiene, antibiotics and" an inexpensive eyelid operation, but "the extent of the disease far exceeds the money and medical workers available."

French Constitutional Court Affirms New Labor Law. France's Constitutional Council has upheld the constitutionality of a new labor law yesterday in what the New York Times (3/31, Smith, 1.19M) calls "a blow to opposition Socialists who had asked the council to strike it down but extending the crisis now facing the government." Meanwhile, French students "kept up pressure, blocking roads and railways, tying up traffic and halting train service in several cities. The country's influential union syndicates have promised another day of nationwide strikes and protest marches on Tuesday." The Times adds that the ruling "throws the onus for resolving the crisis on President Jacques Chirac, who alone has the power to send the law back to Parliament. But he is widely expected to back his embattled prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, who insists that the law be put into effect."

The Washington Post (3/31, A13, Moore, 744K) reports, "The 10-member Constitutional Council ruled that high youth unemployment rates justified the law, which would give workers under age 26 fewer job protections than older employees. The council also said 'different treatment' for young workers was justified because the law was enacted in the interest of improving job opportunities for them." The Post adds, "Chirac's office said the president would address the country on national television Friday night for the first time since students and labor unions launched demonstrations that often have ended in violence and confrontations with riot police in Paris and other cities across the country."

Author Says Public Supports Student Demonstrators. In an op-ed translated from the French by the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M), author Corinne Maier writes, "The point of the new labor law is to encourage businesses to hire young people without worrying they'll be stuck with them forever. … It's true that French society is hierarchical and rigid, and the disadvantages of employment "flexibility" (a word the French detest) have so far fallen mostly on the weakest: minority groups, women with few marketable skills and young people. … What will happen next? The young demonstrators and the major unions demand the withdrawal of the C.P.E.; surveys show that two-thirds of the public are in sympathy with them." Maier adds, "Mr. de Villepin is getting little support in his own camp as he stands firm. And Paris waits to see what springtime will bring next."

Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/31, 2.11M) Afro-Cuban doctor Dariel Ferrer "sinned against the Revolution," when "noting the country's abysmal state of health care," he "established an independent health and human rights clinic." In Cuba, "his work scandalizes the state. It has rewarded him by shutting him out of the official medical community and refusing to allow him any form of gainful employment. … Dr. Ferrer is a victim of what human rights observers say is the one of the most brutal crackdowns in the island's history, one that has received little notice in the US."

At Least 44 Dead In Bahrain Ferry Accident. ABC World News Tonight (3/30, story 5, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The US Navy has joined a rescue mission after a passenger ferry capsized off the coast of Bahrain today. At least 44 passengers died. Dozens of survivors were pulled from the waters." The CBS Evening News (3/30, story 6, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (3/30, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) also reported the story.

NYTimes Says US Embassy Should Drop Fight Over Congestion Surcharge In London. An editorial in the New York Times (3/31, 1.19M) says the American Embassy in London is refusing to pay a traffic congestion surcharge when its diplomats drive around the city. The Americans "say the fee is a tax, and add that the Vienna Convention protects diplomats from taxes abroad. … The British make a good case that the charge is not a tax, but a toll for the use of selected streets. Their diplomats, they note, regularly pay tolls on American roads and bridges." The times adds, "This is one war the United States government doesn't need to take on. It has a real one going on. And the British -- they're on our side."

TERRORISM NEWS:

At Sept. 11 Trial, Tale Of Missteps And Management (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 — Three weeks of testimony and dozens of documents released in the sentencing of Zacarias Moussaoui have offered an eerie parallel view of two organizations, Al Qaeda and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and how they pursued their missions before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Al Qaeda, according to a newly revealed account from the chief plotter, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, took its time in choosing targets — attack the White House or perhaps a nuclear plant in Pennsylvania? Organizers sized up and selected operatives, teaching them how to apply for a visa and how to cut a throat, a skill they practiced on sheep and camels. Despite the mistakes of careless subordinates and an erratic boss, Osama bin Laden, Mr. Mohammed tried to keep the plot on course.

Mr. Mohammed, a Pakistani-born, American-trained engineer, "thought simplicity was the key to success," says the summary of his interrogation by the Central Intelligence Agency. It is all the more chilling for the banal managerial skills it ascribes to the man who devised the simultaneous air attacks.

If Mr. Mohammed's guiding principle was simplicity, the United States government relied on sprawling bureaucracies at feuding agencies to look for myriad potential threats. The C.I.A. had lots of information on two hijackers, Nawaf al-Hazmi and Khalid al-Midhar, but the F.B.I. did not know the men had settled in San Diego, where Mr. Mohammed had instructed them to "spend time visiting museums and amusement parks" so they could masquerade as tourists.

At the F.B.I., a few agents pursued clues that would later prove tantalizingly close to the mark, but they could not draw attention from top counterterrorism officials. A Minnesota F.B.I. agent, Harry M. Samit, warned in a memorandum that Mr. Moussaoui was a dangerous Islamic extremist whose study of how to fly a Boeing 747-400 seemed to be part of a sinister plot.

"As the details of this plan are not yet fully known, it cannot be determined if Moussaoui has sufficient knowledge of the 747-400 to attempt to execute the seizure of such an aircraft," Mr. Samit wrote on Aug. 31, 2001. He had already urged Washington to act quickly, because it was not clear "how far advanced Moussaoui's plan is or how many unidentified co-conspirators exist."

But to high-level officials, the oddball Moroccan-born Frenchman in Minneapolis was only one of scores of possible terrorists who might be worth checking out. An F.B.I. official in Washington edited crucial details out of Mr. Samit's memorandums seeking a search warrant for Mr. Moussaoui's possessions, and said that pressing for it could hurt an agent's career, Mr. Samit testified.

The picture of a large and lumbering bureaucracy trying to defend against a small and flexible enemy is striking, said Timothy J. Roemer, a member of the national Sept. 11 commission.

"It's like the elephant fighting the snake," said Mr. Roemer, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana. "One of the impressions of Al Qaeda and Khalid Sheikh Mohammed is their ability to change course and put new people into their plan and dynamically respond to the challenges day to day."

The United States government, he said, "is almost the opposite."

"We're slow to change," he said, "slow to adjust, and we're building a huge bureaucracy."

The court testimony, Mr. Roemer said, has reinforced his belief that "Moussaoui was an Al Qaeda mistake and a missed opportunity for the F.B.I."

The jury at Mr. Moussaoui's sentencing trial in federal court in Alexandria, Va., began deliberating on Wednesday about whether he qualifies for the death penalty for not telling American officials of the approaching terrorist attacks. If jurors decide he does qualify, they will then have to make a second decision as to whether he should be executed.

The outlines of the events on both sides in the weeks leading to the Sept. 11 attacks are well known. But the voluminous evidence presented at the trial have added details and color to the public history of the plotters and how American counterterrorism officers failed to stop them.

There are snippets of highly classified National Security Agency cables and glimpses of the C.I.A. inspector general's report on the agency's performance before the attacks, which remains secret. There are numerous new F.B.I. e-mail messages and memorandums that fill in the details of agents' suspicions and why they were not heeded.

But the 58-page "Substitution for the Testimony of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed," a detailed account of what Mr. Mohammed has told investigators since his capture in Pakistan in 2003, and an attached two-page statement written by him, give the most direct view to date of the man who conceived and organized the attacks.

"I know that the materialistic Western mind cannot grasp the idea, and it is difficult for them to believe that the high officials in Al Qaeda do not know about operations carried out by its operatives, but this is how it works," Mr. Mohammed wrote in his statement to his interrogators. "We do not submit written reports to our higher ups. I conducted the September 11 operation by submitting only oral reports."

Mr. Mohammed comes across as a hands-on, midlevel manager who sometimes handled details, like perusing a San Diego telephone book he bought at a market in Karachi, Pakistan, for English-language schools and flight schools.

But he delegated what he could to others. He had Abu Turab al Jordani, a Qaeda veteran from Jordan, train the less sophisticated "muscle" hijackers, teaching them to use their knives on animals and how to storm a jetliner cabin. He allowed Mohammed Atta, appointed "emir" of the hijackers, to make final decisions on targets and on the date of the attack.

Mr. bin Laden repeatedly pressed Mr. Mohammed to move ahead with the hijacking plot, the document says. He pushed, for example, to strike on May 12, precisely seven months after the 2000 attack on the U.S.S. Cole. Ever the pragmatist, Mr. Mohammed put him off. In fact, Mr. Mohammed "noted that he disobeyed bin Laden on several occasions by taking operatives assigned to him by bin Laden and using them how he best saw fit."

One restriction on the plot was the small number of Qaeda devotees who had, or could get, visas to enter the United States. Mr. Mohammed used Mr. Midhar and Mr. Hazmi because they had visas — despite his doubts about their minimal English and lack of sophistication.

But he also considered Mr. Moussaoui less reliable because of time he had spent in the West. Mr. Mohammed "stated that Westerners have a different point of view because of their freedom," the summary says.

The sentencing trial made clear the frustration of the Minneapolis F.B.I. office in its repeated efforts to interest bureau headquarters in Mr. Moussaoui.

Gripping testimony came from Mr. Samit, who arrested Mr. Moussaoui on Aug. 16 and quickly became convinced that he was a terrorist who knew about an imminent hijacking plot. Mr. Samit said that he had sent about 70 warning messages about Mr. Moussaoui, but that they had produced no results.

The agent said he had been puzzled at the reluctance of Michael Maltbie, a supervisor with the Radical Fundamentalist Unit at bureau headquarters, to seek a search warrant for Mr. Moussaoui's belongings from a special intelligence court.

Mr. Samit seemed unable to satisfy Mr. Maltbie's demand that he provide a tangible link between Mr. Moussaoui and a foreign power, a requirement for a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. He thought he had sufficient evidence from two French intelligence reports showing Mr. Moussaoui had recruited someone to fight in Chechnya for an Islamist group allied with Mr. bin Laden.

But on Aug. 24, 2001, a frustrated Mr. Samit sent an e-mail message to Charles Frahm, a friend and, at the time, an F.B.I. liaison to the C.I.A., asking for information to help make his case. "We're trying to close the wiggle room for F.B.I. headquarters to claim there is no connection to a foreign power," he wrote.

Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers asserted that Mr. Maltbie had undermined the effort to obtain a search warrant by deleting some details from Mr. Samit's requests. Mr. Samit said Mr. Maltbie had told him he was reluctant to press for a warrant because doing so would be risky for his career and "he was not about to let that happen to him."

At the time, the bureau had become wary of applying to the intelligence court because a well-regarded supervisor had angered the court's chief judge in a previous case.

Days later, with the attacks in New York and Washington, the scale of the destruction astonished even Mr. Mohammed. According to the summary, he said he "had no idea that the damage of the first attack would be as catastrophic as it was."

Moussaoui Jury Pauses For Query, Resumes (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Jurors in the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui completed their first full day of deliberations yesterday, with no indication of how they would resolve the question of whether the convicted Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator is eligible for execution.

The 12-member panel paused only to ask the judge a brief question concerning the definition of weapons of mass destruction. Moussaoui is charged with conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction, one of three counts that could bring him a death sentence.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told jurors at a brief court session that the term meant using an airplane as a missile or bomb. And with that, jurors disappeared again into their deliberation room on the seventh floor of the federal courthouse in Alexandria before quitting for the day at 4:30 p.m.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 airplane hijackings that killed nearly 3,000 people. He is the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The jury is considering whether Moussaoui is eligible for the death penalty under federal law. If jurors unanimously decide that he is, they will reconvene for a second phase of the trial that will determine whether Moussaoui will be executed; if they decide that he is not eligible, Moussaoui will be sentenced to life in prison.

According to a verdict form released yesterday by the court, jurors will answer three main questions when they vote on whether to send the case forward to a second phase. They will assess whether prosecutors proved that Moussaoui intentionally lied to federal agents when he was arrested in August 2001, whether he lied "contemplating that the life of a person would be taken" and whether at least one victim died Sept. 11 because of the falsehoods.

Although Moussaoui was sitting in jail during the attacks, prosecutors argue that he should die because he lied to the FBI when he was arrested after his behavior aroused suspicion at a Minnesota flight school. Had Moussaoui confessed his knowledge of the plot, the government contends, the Sept. 11 strikes could have been stopped.

Moussaoui admitted to much of that argument when he testified this week, saying that he had misled federal agents to allow the plot to go forward -- and that he had intended to crash a hijacked plane into the White House on Sept. 11. His attorneys contend that Moussaoui was aggrandizing his role in the plot during his testimony. And even if he had lied to agents in August 2001, the defense contends, federal officials knew far more than Moussaoui did about al-Qaeda's plans yet still failed to stop the attacks.

'Weapons Of Mass Destruction' Defined For Moussaoui Jury (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Jurors deliberating Thursday in the Zacarias Moussaoui sentencing trial asked for legal guidance on a capital murder charge that alleged he conspired to use "weapons of mass destruction."

The jury of 12 asked U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema for a legal definition of that phrase, and she told them that in this case it meant turning airplanes into "missiles, bombs or similar devices."

The charge is a component of one of the key allegations against the admitted Al Qaeda terrorist. Moussaoui, 37, was arrested three weeks before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. He testified Monday that his intended role in the conspiracy was to crash a fifth airplane, into the White House, that day..

The jury is to decide whether Moussaoui, who has pleaded guilty, is eligible for the death penalty because he lied to FBI agents after his arrest.

Prosecutors maintain that had he cooperated with authorities about the Sept. 11 plot, the government could have obtained enough information to stop the 19 hijackers.

The defense contends that the federal law enforcement apparatus at that time was so disjointed that officials never would have unraveled the plot even with Moussaoui's help.

DOJ_NMG_0024418

Thursday was the first full day of deliberations. Jurors did not reach a verdict and are to resume work today.

In another development, the court unsealed transcripts of a closed March 21 hearing between prosecutors and defense lawyers in which it was disclosed that the U.S. attorney's office in Philadelphia was investigating the conduct of government lawyer Carla J. Martin.

Martin, a senior attorney with the Transportation Security Administration, is accused of improperly tampering with Federal Aviation Administration witnesses whom prosecutors and defense lawyers had planned to call during the trial.

According to evidence and testimony against her, Martin sent the witnesses copies of court transcripts and coached them on their planned testimony, all in violation of a February order by Brinkema.

The judge was incensed, and severely restricted the amount of aviation testimony in the trial. As it turned out, prosecutors called just one federal aviation official.

"I'm advised by the U.S. attorney's office that there may very well be a prosecution of her; at least they're looking at the possibility," Brinkema said of Martin.

The judge had wanted Martin to take the stand and explain her conduct. But Brinkema said in the closed hearings that Martin's lawyer, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., was "not ready to recommend she testify yet."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Robert A. Spencer said the matter was referred to the Philadelphia office because of the conflict with the prosecutors trying Moussaoui.

Spencer's fellow prosecutor David J. Novak told the judge they had been "unhappy with Ms. Martin before this episode happened."

Martin has declined to comment.

Her lawyer initially said she was eager to tell her side of the story, but he has declined to discuss the matter since.

Deliberations Continue In Moussaoui Trial (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP, March 31, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. - Jurors in the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui headed into a third day of deliberations Friday to determine whether the confessed al-Qaida conspirator is eligible for the death penalty.

The jury has deliberated for more than seven hours since getting the case late Wednesday. On Thursday jurors asked about the definition of "weapon of mass destruction." One of the three convictions for which Moussaoui could be executed is conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction.

The jurors were told that a plane used as a missile - the tactic employed on Sept. 11, 2001 - qualifies as a weapon of mass destruction.

Moussaoui is the only person in this country charged in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. He pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack aircraft and other crimes. The sentencing trial will determine his punishment: death or life in prison.

The jury must find that Moussaoui was responsible for at least one death on Sept. 11 for him to be eligible for execution.

Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks, but prosecutors argue federal agents would have been able to thwart or at least minimize the attacks if he had revealed his al-Qaida membership and his terror plans when he was arrested and interrogated by federal agents.

Also, court transcripts indicated federal prosecutors in Philadelphia have launched a criminal investigation of Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin. Moussaoui's death-penalty trial was nearly derailed after U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema found that Martin improperly coached multiple witnesses on their testimony and lied to defense lawyers.

Prosecutor Investigating TSA Lawyer (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 31, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Va.-Federal prosecutors in Philadelphia are investigating the conduct of a government lawyer who nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui by coaching witnesses on their testimony.

The criminal investigation of Carla J. Martin, a lawyer with the federal Transportation Security Administration, was revealed in recently unsealed transcripts of a closed March 21 hearing in the Moussaoui case.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in the hearing that she had been "advised by the U.S. Attorney's Office that there may very well be a prosecution of her, at least they're looking at the possibility."

Rob Spencer, the lead prosecutor in the Moussaoui case, responded that "the matter has been referred to a prosecutor in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and I believe they are handling the matter."

Rich Manieri, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Philadelphia, declined comment. Prosecutors in Alexandria recused themselves from the investigation.

Moussaoui's defense lawyers have said Martin should face criminal charges for witness tampering.

Martin's misconduct delayed the Moussaoui trial for a week and almost derailed it completely when it was revealed a week into the trial.

Martin coached seven aviation witnesses on their testimony, urging them to read transcripts of the trial's first day and warning them to be prepared for certain topics on cross-examination. All of this violated a judge's order barring witnesses from exposure to trial proceedings, for fear that they would shape their testimony based on what they had heard.

Martin was apparently concerned that prosecutors overstated the Federal Aviation Administration's ability to prevent the 9/11 attacks and wanted witnesses to be prepared for tough questions on cross-examination.

After Brinkema learned the extent of Martin's misconduct in a special evidentiary hearing, she barred the government from presenting any evidence about aviation security to the jury. She reconsidered after prosecutors said that would gut their case, and she allowed the government to present an aviation witness who was not tainted by Martin's misconduct.

Martin has refused to testify about her actions. Her lawyer, Roscoe Howard, has said she will explain herself to Brinkema at the appropriate time.

During the March 21 hearing, prosecutors said Martin had a minimal role in helping prepare the government's case, and said they actively sought to keep Martin out of the process for a variety of factors.

"First of all, there were personality issues," said prosecutor David Novak. More importantly, though, he said prosecutors found her to be a poor conduit to the TSA on issues like preparing sensitive documents for use at trial.

"Our view is that she wasn't hearing what our point was and it wasn't being conveyed to people who are," Novak said.

Mr. Moussaoui's Confession (WP)

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

GIVE ZACARIAS Moussaoui credit: Years into his bizarre circus of a trial -- after all his deranged court filings and speeches, his pleas and retracted pleas, his attempts to act as his own lawyer and his denunciations of his long-suffering court-appointed lawyers -- he still knows how to grab a big moment and milk it. This week, he took the witness stand and confessed -- "boasted" might be a better word -- that he was, as the government alleged, a part of the Sept. 11 conspiracy and that he was meant to fly a fifth plane into the White House, along with convicted "shoe bomber" Richard Reid, as part of the coordinated attacks that took place that day.

Mr. Moussaoui's riveting testimony devastates his defense and acknowledges everything prosecutors need to prove and then some.

Not only did he lie to the FBI to protect the operation after his capture the month before the attacks -- the allegation to which he admitted last year. He also bought a radio to hear news of the operation's success. He knew that the World Trade Center was a target. He coldly described his delight at learning of the destruction and carnage. After such a display, what jury could fail to vote for the death penalty?

But there is reason to worry that Mr. Moussaoui's testimony is a bit more dramatic than the reality of his involvement. For one thing, it contradicts his own prior statements: He has claimed in the past not to have been involved in Sept. 11 but to have been preparing for a separate attack on the White House. It also contradicts the statements of al-Qaeda bigwigs in U.S. custody, which -- in a bizarre twist -- the defense put before the jury in an effort to discredit its own client. Khalid Sheik Mohammed, for example, claimed that Mr. Moussaoui was sent here as part of a second wave of strikes. It even exceeds what the government itself has alleged.

The government and Mr. Moussaoui, at this point, are both pushing for his execution -- as vividly illustrated by his bizarre offer to testify for the prosecution. Their motives differ. The government is prosecuting his crime, while Mr. Moussaoui appears to be attempting to martyr himself. The danger is that in such a confluence of interests the truth falls by the wayside.

That would be dangerous, in part because the government's theory under which Mr. Moussaoui is eligible for death is an expansive one that could open the door for executions of low-level conspirators in a range of criminal enterprises. Mr. Moussaoui without question acted as an al-Qaeda operative who arrived in this country intending to do it great harm. Less clear is what role, if any, he played specifically in the events of Sept. 11. That he now wishes to claim a big one may imply honest pride in his work or simply a desire to die for his organization's greatest success -- a desire no jury ought to oblige. The unenviable task of the jurors, who now have the case, will be to sort true confession from idle boasting.

9/11 Trial Raises Concern (USAT)

USA Today, March 31, 2006

The most chilling testimony at the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui didn't come from the defendant, despite his surprise claim that he was to fly a fifth plane into the White House on 9/11.

It came from a government witness who attested in heart-rending detail to the stubborn resistance and monumental missteps that kept the FBI from capitalizing on Moussaoui's arrest four weeks before 9/11.

Many of the facts were known, but FBI agent Harry Samit's testimony gave them new detail and poignancy — and raised questions about the nation's preparedness for the next terror attack.

Moussaoui was arrested Aug. 16, 2001, in Minnesota, after Samit was tipped that an inexperienced student had paid cash to a local flight school to learn to fly jumbo jets. Moussaoui had spoken openly of hating America and of wanting to wage jihad, or holy war.

In the next weeks, Samit wrote memos that referred 70 times to Moussaoui and literally begged for permission to seek a warrant to search his belongings. His bosses rejected every request. There are many explanations for this, none satisfactory: The FBI's priority before 9/11 was catching and convicting traditional criminals, not stopping attacks. An antiquated system of paper case files kept crime fighters from sharing leads via computer. A legal "wall" built between intelligence and criminal investigators to prevent misuse of information restricted coordination. Incompetence and lethargy among superiors.

Could this scenario happen again?

Some holes have been plugged. The legal wall has been torn down. Surveillance has increased. New laws make it easier to seek a warrant in a case like Moussaoui's. Agencies share more.

But old gaps remain, and new ones have opened — at the FBI and in other anti-terrorism efforts as well. To identify problems, look no further than recent headlines:

• After five years, the FBI is still hampered by some of the same computer problems. And two of the bosses who obstructed Samit — Michael Maltbie and David Frasca — remain employed in other jobs at the FBI; the bureau won't say whether they've been disciplined.

• On Tuesday, the Council on Foreign Relations, a non-partisan think tank, reported that the United States hasn't mounted the high-priority effort needed against the most devastating threat it faces — nuclear terrorism. Stealing a nuclear device is tough, the author found, but not impossible.

• The same day, government officials testified that undercover investigators slipped through security at the Canadian and Mexican borders with enough radioactive material to make two small "dirty bombs." Border agents were fooled by counterfeit documents, according to the Government Accountability Office.

• On Wednesday, USA TODAY reported a brain drain at the Homeland Security Department, which has lost top leaders for its most crucial missions, including cyber security, technology and disaster response.

DOJ_NMG_0024421

The nation has determined foes — people like Moussaoui who are bent on killing Americans at any cost. Stopping them requires good intelligence, judgment and luck. Unless the government learns from the past and finds smarter ways to fight terrorism, it becomes its own enemy.

U.N. Expert Wants To See Purported Prisons (AP-Y2)

By Bradley S. Klapper

AP2, March 30, 2006

The United Nations' special investigator on torture said Thursday he was certain that there are secret U.S. prisons in Europe and he wants access to them.

Manfred Nowak said he had proof that secret U.S. prisons continue to operate in Europe.

"I am 100 percent sure. I have evidence," Nowak said in an interview with The Associated Press.

He cited a U.S. refusal to provide details or records of interrogations later used in terrorism trials in Germany. He did not explain how that was proof of the ongoing existence of U.S. prisons in Europe, and he did not offer other examples.

Allegations of clandestine U.S. detention centers in Europe have sparked separate investigations by the European Parliament and the Council of Europe, the continent's leading human rights watchdog.

"It is totally unacceptable, even in the fight against terrorism, that a highly democratic country such as the United States of America is keeping secret places of detention," said Nowak, an Austrian law professor who reports on torture allegations to U.N. rights bodies and the General Assembly.

U.S. officials in Geneva were not immediately available to comment.

The United States neither confirms nor denies the allegations of secret prisons, because it refuses to comment on intelligence matters. It has noted that the Council of Europe's report found no specific evidence to support claims of the existence of detention camps in Europe like the one in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

In a report released last month, Nowak and four other U.N. experts called on the U.S. government to close down Guantanamo Bay and "refrain from any practice amounting to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

The United States slammed the U.N. report, noting that the U.N. experts had declined an invitation to visit the camp because they would not be given full access to the detainees.

As with Guantanamo, Nowak said he would only visit the secret prisons if he was granted full access to prisoners. He noted that Beijing had allowed him to interview prisoners during a visit to China last year and that before that trip Washington pressured the Chinese to permit the interviews.

He said that he hoped Washington would reconsider its policy on terror suspects and allow him to investigate allegations of torture in detention centers outside the United States.

"How can I assess whether torture or ill-treatment is practiced in any prison in the world if the only people with whom I can talk are the prison guards and the doctors, but not the detainees?" he asked.

The United States is holding about 490 men at the military detention center; some have been there for more than four years. They are accused of links to Afghanistan's ousted Taliban regime or to al-Qaida, but only a handful have been charged.

Nowak also said that he would go to Chechnya this year because Russia had accepted his condition of direct access to prisoners. He declined to speculate on how widespread the use of torture by Russian security forces might be in the volatile southern province, and said he was still negotiating with Moscow on which detention centers to visit.

Intelligence Redo Is Harshly Judged (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard A. Posner sharply criticized the restructuring of U.S. intelligence agencies last week, telling CIA lawyers that the overhaul has done nothing to rectify flaws exposed by al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and that the changes "in the end . . . will amount to rather little."

DOJ_NMG_0024422

Posner, who has written extensively on intelligence matters, questioned "the wisdom and consequences" of the intelligence overhaul passed by Congress in December 2004, which he said was based on "a deep misunderstanding of the limitations of national security intelligence."

That misunderstanding, Posner said, came from a naive belief that intelligence agencies can somehow be made infallible. "Failure in a democratic society," he said, "demands a response that promises, however improbably, to prevent future failures. [And] the preferred response is a reorganization, because it is at once dramatic and relatively cheap."

Posner made his remarks last Friday at an off-site conference of the CIA's office of general counsel, and a revised text was made available to The Washington Post.

CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano said yesterday that the judge was invited because he is a well-known writer on intelligence issues and that "the CIA believes its officers should hear a range of informed opinion on issues affecting their work." Posner has a book being published next week, "Uncertain Shield: The U.S. Intelligence System in the Throes of Reform." His book "Preventing Surprise Attacks: Intelligence Reform in the Wake of 9/11" was published last spring.

In Posner's analysis, the director of national intelligence (DNI), created by Congress to be the president's top intelligence adviser, was given too much to do. DNI John D. Negroponte oversees the CIA and 15 other intelligence agencies, including those at the Pentagon. Negroponte's staff, which has grown to about 1,000, "has become a new bureaucracy layered on top of the intelligence community," Posner said.

In the process, he said, the DNI's office has absorbed "many of the responsibilities of the CIA and demoted the agency to little more than a spy service." He points out that Negroponte runs the National Counterterrorism Center, which used to be part of the CIA. The agency also prepared the President's Daily Brief, the most sensitive intelligence delivered to President Bush and his top national security team each morning, but that now is prepared by the DNI.

At the same time, the DNI has floundered in its task of coordinating the agencies within the intelligence community, according to Posner, in part because of "three distinct and largely incompatible intelligence cultures that are poorly balanced: military intelligence, civilian intelligence and criminal investigation intelligence."

The military culture, with its "up-and-out promotions system . . . discipline and strong mission orientation," views the CIA with "a degree of hostility and disdain, which the agency reciprocates," Posner said. In addition, CIA and Pentagon intelligence officers compete in strategic intelligence work, a situation aggravated by the fact that the military operates the spy satellite agencies, whose capabilities it often does not wish to share.

Meanwhile, the FBI culture, focused in the past on catching criminals, is having problems with intelligence gathering because, as Posner put it, "the aim is to prevent the crime, not punish the criminals." Counterterrorist intelligence, he said, requires "casting a very wide net, following up on clues, assembling bits of information, and often failing because there is as yet no crime."

Complicating these differences, he noted, was the "profound political imbalance" extant among the three intelligence cultures. The military "is immensely popular, immensely powerful politically" and "ambitious to expand its intelligence activities under the forceful leadership of Secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld and Under Secretary for Intelligence [Stephen A.] Cambone." Posner added that for "all these reasons" Pentagon intelligence is "out of the practical control of the DNI."

He said the FBI "is also immensely popular . . . and politically powerful . . . and stubbornly resistant to change." The CIA was left, Posner said, "in a situation of considerable vulnerability, as an unpopular agency and therefore a natural scapegoat" for intelligence failures of Sept. 11 and prewar Iraq.

Posner said that the DNI should have been given only a coordinating role in U.S. intelligence, and that the CIA director, now Porter J. Goss, should have remained the president's senior intelligence adviser. That approach would have eliminated the requirement that the DNI's office build its own bureaucracy of analysts, he said.

Ex-spy Hunter Drops Intelligence Post Bid (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024423

Former CIA spy hunter Paul Redmond, who helped catch notorious Moscow mole Aldrich Ames, has withdrawn from consideration to become the Bush administration's top counterspy, U.S. intelligence officials say.

Mr. Redmond had been selected to be national counterintelligence executive, but backed out after the FBI held up his formal appointment by conducting a lengthy background investigation, said officials speaking on the condition of anonymity.

Carl Kropf, a spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI), declined to comment.

"The selection process for the national counterintelligence executive is under way," Mr. Kropf said. "Until a final selection is made, we decline to discuss the status of any individual currently under consideration for this important position."

Mr. Redmond could not be reached for comment. In addition to uncovering Ames in 1993, Mr. Redmond conducted the damage assessment into the case of FBI counterintelligence agent Robert Hanssen, who spied for Moscow for 16 years before his 2001 arrest.

The national counterintelligence post and the deputy position in what is called NCIX remain vacant following the resignations of Michelle Van Cleave in January and Ken deGraffenreid a month earlier.

The office was recently placed under DNI John D. Negroponte as part of intelligence reform efforts, setting off a dispute over the role of counterintelligence.

President Bush signed an executive order in March 2005 calling for aggressive, offensive counterintelligence activities against foreign spies.

However, intelligence officials under Mr. Negroponte, including DNI Mission Manager for Collection Mary Margaret Graham, are opposing the new policy and instead favor making counterintelligence a passive support function for U.S. spying.

Counterspy posts at the CIA and FBI also remain vacant or held by acting officials at a time when foreign spying continues to plague the administration.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III told a congressional committee earlier this week that Chinese spying is a "major threat" to the United States.

A Pentagon report on the Iraq war made public March 24 highlighted Russian spying against the U.S. military and its military facility in Doha, Qatar. The report said documents obtained in Iraq showed that Russian intelligence passed U.S. war plans and other operational military data to Saddam Hussein's forces before the war.

The disclosure so far has not led to an investigation.

Asked about the Russian spying, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told reporters Tuesday that he was not informed about it before its publication in the Iraq war report. "It certainly would be something that one would look into," he said.

A spokesman for the U.S. Central Command said yesterday that there were no immediate plans to conduct an investigation into the documents related to the compromise at Doha.

A Pentagon spokesman also had no immediate comment.

The muted response to the Russian spying report contrasts sharply with other statements by Mr. Rumsfeld and CIA Director Porter J. Goss. Both have denounced intelligence disclosures to the press as undermining U.S. national security.

Intelligence Office Has Swollen, House Panel Says (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House Intelligence Committee voted Thursday to withhold funding from the nation's intelligence director over concerns that his office, which was created to streamline operations in the nation's spy community, is instead becoming bloated and bureaucratic.

At the same time, Republicans on the House panel defeated a Democratic push to suspend hundreds of millions of dollars in spy agency funding until the Bush administration provided more information about a controversial domestic espionage program being conducted by the National Security Agency.

The measures were considered as part of the 2007 intelligence authorization bill, which sets the spending priorities for the nation's spy agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0024424

The move to withhold funding still must be approved by the full House as well as the Senate. But it reflects rising frustration among House lawmakers with an office that was created less than two years ago to solve communication breakdowns and other problems that plagued the intelligence community leading up to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq.

The bill would require the nation's intelligence director, John D. Negroponte, to present a detailed rationale for any additional increases to his staff or risk losing a portion of his budget. The measure was endorsed by Republicans and Democrats.

"We're concerned about some of the steps that are going on" at Negroponte's office, said Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. Hoekstra said Negroponte needed to demonstrate that any further expansion would improve coordination among intelligence agencies, and would not amount to "putting in more lawyers and slowing down the process."

Rep. Jane Harman (DVenice), the ranking Democrat on the committee, cited similar concerns.

"We don't want more billets, more bureaucracy, more buildings," Harman said. "We want more leadership."

The action by the committee represents one of the most pointed public rebukes of Negroponte and the course he has set in assembling a staff to oversee the activities of the nation's 16 intelligence agencies.

A spokesman for Negroponte, Carl Kropf, said that the intelligence director's office had not yet seen the House bill. Kropf declined to respond to criticism that Negroponte's office was becoming bloated, except to say that "we are within the limits of the law that established" the director of national intelligence.

Since Negroponte was sworn in less than a year ago, his staff has grown to about 700 employees, according to U.S. intelligence officials. The legislation that created the position provided for a few hundred initial slots, but allowed for the director to add as many as 500 employees through transfers from other agencies.

The intelligence office has named many high-level officials to oversee such intelligence activities as collection and analysis across multiple agencies.

Beyond his own staff, Negroponte is also directly responsible for new centers that coordinate the nation's espionage efforts against terrorism and weapons proliferation.

House Intelligence Committee officials declined to say how much money would be withheld from the intelligence director's office, or exactly what Negroponte would need to include in a report to the panel to get the money released.

Hoekstra described the report the committee was seeking from Negroponte as an "architecture study" of the intelligence office. Other congressional officials said the report would need to justify any additional hires and to explain the functions of existing offices.

In other action, Republicans on the committee defeated a Democratic amendment that sought to force the Bush administration to reveal the budget for the controversial NSA espionage program.

The Democratic measure would have withheld 20% of the NSA's budget unless the White House agreed to disclose how much was being spent on the domestic eavesdropping program.

Democrats have complained that the White House is refusing to provide information on the program to all members of the intelligence committee. Hoekstra noted that 11 of the 21 members of the House panel were getting briefed on the NSA operation, but he said the committee was still engaged in a "tug of war" with the administration for greater access.

Panel Rejects Effort To Withhold Funds To NSA (WP)

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The House intelligence committee rejected yesterday a proposal to withhold money from the National Security Agency if the White House did not reveal information about the cost of the agency's warrantless surveillance program.

In a session closed to reporters, only Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), who heads a subcommittee that oversees the NSA, voted with the Democrats to support the measure to withhold one-fifth of the agency's budget.

The committee also rejected legislation that would force the Bush administration to carve out $3 million for a board created in late 2004 to protect Americans' civil liberties from government infringements. Democrats have complained for months about what they consider to be Republican foot-dragging in establishing the civil liberties panel, formally known as the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board.

The measures would have been part of a bill that would set intelligence funding next year.

The White House has resisted fully briefing the House and Senate intelligence committees on the much-discussed NSA program that monitored -- without court warrants -- the international calls and e-mails of people in the United States when terrorism was suspected. In a continuing thaw between the White House and Congress, however, 11 of the House intelligence committee's 21 members were briefed this week on more details of the highly classified program.Higher Education Act Renewed by House

The House approved a bill yesterday aimed at making college decisions more clear and affordable for families. How much the measure would help remains in dispute.

Republicans renewed the Higher Education Act 221 to 199, in a near party-line vote. Most Democrats objected after failing with their version, which would have cut in half the interest rate on student loans this July.

The measure would order simplified steps for people seeking federal aid and would place pressure on colleges to refrain from steep tuition increases. It also would require schools to provide clear information about their costs to the Education Department, to be posted on its Web site as a tool for families.

But Democrats and Republicans could not agree on how the federal government should help people deal with rising tuition. Republican leaders said forcing colleges to be more accountable for costs will help families.TSA Errors, Unisys Bills Led to Cost Overruns

Mismanagement by the Transportation Security Administration and overcharging by its contractor, Unisys Corp., led to cost overruns on a $1 billion contract to build a computer network for the agency, a government report said.

In October, The Washington Post obtained copies of federal auditors' reports showing that, among other abuses, Unisys charged higher per-hour labor rates than were justified for lower-level employees.

Less than halfway through the seven-year contract, $834 million has been spent, according to the report from the Homeland Security Department inspector general's office, yet TSA facilities still lack the technology they need.

Prosecutors Say They Can't Substantiate Informant's Statements (AP)

By DON THOMPSON, The Associated Press

AP, March 30, 2006

SACRAMENTO (AP) — In a potential blow to their terrorism case against a father and son, federal prosecutors on Thursday said there is no evidence to support statements by their key witness that a top aide to Osama bin Laden attended a Lodi mosque in the late 1990s.

The surprise move was designed to dissuade the defense from calling witnesses who would challenge the story's credibility.

The witness, an FBI informant, told agents when they recruited him in 2001 that he had seen a high-ranking al-Qaida official and two other international terrorists when he lived in Lodi during the late 1990s.

Naseem Khan said he was "100 percent sure" he saw bin Laden's physician, Ayman al-Zawahiri, attending a local mosque three times a day.

In a statement read to jurors, prosecutors agreed they could not support the informant's claims, which have been criticized by defense attorneys and terrorism experts.

"The government has no information indicating that al-Zawahiri was in Lodi, Calif., in 1998 or 1999, aside from the information provided by Naseem Khan," prosecutors said in a joint statement with defense lawyers that was read to jurors by defense attorney Johnny Griffin III.

At the time, the three terror suspects were being sought in connection with the bombings of U.S. buildings in Africa and Saudi Arabia.

The admission by prosecutors raises more questions about the credibility of Khan, a 32-year-old convenience store clerk from Oregon who befriended the defendants and secretly recorded hundreds of hours of conversations with them.

DOJ_NMG_0024426

Griffin told reporters outside court that the government's statement about Khan "shows that he is a liar."

Umer Hayat and his 23-year-old son, Hamid, have been in federal custody since June, when they were arrested shortly after the younger Hayat returned from a two-year visit to Pakistan. It was there that prosecutors say Hamid Hayat attended an al-Qaida training camp.

He is charged with three counts of making false statements and with providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

Umer Hayat, 48, faces 16 years in prison if convicted of two counts of making false statements to FBI agents. Both have pleaded not guilty.

FBI agents testified earlier this week that they discounted Khan's reported sighting of al-Zawahiri and the two other wanted terrorists, Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali.

At the time Khan said he saw them in Lodi, Ali was suspected in the bombing of a U.S. embassy in Africa while al-Nasser was wanted in the bombing of a U.S. military housing complex in Saudi Arabia.

The FBI nevertheless hired Khan as an informant, giving him about $220,000 in pay and expenses since then. His mission was to infiltrate the Pakistani community in Lodi, an agricultural town about 35 miles south of Sacramento.

FBI agent Rachel Pifer testified that she believed Khan was merely mistaken when he told the story about the three terror suspects. In the months immediately after the 2001 terror attacks, many people came forward believing they had information about potential terrorists, she said.

"A lot of people had mistaken identity at that point in time," she said.

Other information Khan gathered turned out to be correct, Pifer said.

The statement read to jurors Thursday came on the second day of the presentation by the defense, which is attempting to undermine Khan's credibility.

One of the FBI agents the defense called to the stand worked undercover with Khan in Lodi. His testimony seemed to support an argument advanced by Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi.

She said her client was prone to fanciful storytelling and maintains that he never attended a terrorist training camp.

The agent, Terry Rankhorn, said he met Hamid Hayat three or four times in gatherings arranged by Khan, when both were posing as computer experts. Rankhorn said he thought Hayat was prone to exaggeration, such as the time Hayat said he was able to obtain an unusual brand of cigarettes because he had prominent relatives in Pakistan.

"His air appeared to me ... to be more boasting than actual substance," Rankhorn testified.

A computer expert, Rankhorn also said he found no incriminating files or documents on Hamid Hayat's computer.

Both Sides Agree No Evidence Of Al-Zawahri Sighting (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 31, 2006

The prosecution and defense agreed Thursday in a formal, written stipulation that there is no evidence to support the claims of an FBI informant that he saw one of the world's most wanted terrorists in Lodi in 1999.

Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III read the agreement to both juries sitting in the trials of Hamid Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat, on terrorism-related charges.

"The government has no information indicating that Ayman al-Zawahri was in Lodi, California, in 1998 or 1999, aside from the information supplied by Naseem Khan," the stipulation says.

Khan, 32, who has been the prosecution's star witness in the dual trials of the Hayats, startled the federal courtroom three weeks ago when he testified before the Hamid Hayat jury that he saw al-Zawahri coming and going at the Muslim mosque in Lodi in 1998 or 1999.

Through Khan's testimony, as well as the testimony of FBI agents, details of the informant's story have continued to emerge.

Al-Zawahri is Osama bin Laden's chief deputy and is under federal indictment in New York City in connection with the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya.

DOJ_NMG_0024427

Sacramento FBI Special Agent Rachel Pifer, who was Khan's "handler" from November 2001 to September 2002, testified Thursday that, after hearing Khan's story about al-Zawahri, she initiated an inquiry with the bureau's New York City office.

She said that office replied "it would be remote but not impossible" that al-Zawahri was in the United States at that time.

Pifer said she concluded the information was "probably not true" before she "opened Khan up as an informant" on Nov. 14, 2001.

Under questioning by Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, the agent said she believes Khan simply made an honest mistake, and she continues to deem him "a credible and reliable source of information."

Questioned by prosecutor David Deitch, Pifer said the FBI "received a lot of reports of mistaken identity" in the wake of the bureau's release of a list of its 22 most wanted terrorists.

Khan told his al-Zawahri story during his first meeting with FBI agents on Oct. 17, 2001, exactly a week after the bureau went public with its list.

Al-Zawahri "is an Egyptian exile who is reputed to be the No. 2 man in and a co-founder of al-Qaida," according to the list.

Also at Khan's first meeting with agents, at his Bend, Ore., apartment, he said another man on the list, Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, was with al-Zawahri in Lodi in 1999 during Ramadan, a time of fasting, worship and contemplation for Muslims. That information has also been discounted by terrorism experts and the FBI.

Ali, also an Egyptian under indictment in New York, "is facing five counts of participating in the broader terrorist conspiracy, including training Somali tribes opposed to U.S. troop presence," according to the list.

At a subsequent meeting with agents on Oct. 26, 2001, Khan added Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser to his list of top terrorists he said he spotted in Lodi while living there in the late 1990s.

Al-Nasser has been indicted in the Eastern District of Virginia for the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers military housing complex in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia. Nineteen Americans were killed in the attack and hundreds more were wounded.

Much of the government's cases against the Hayats rests on secretly recorded conversations the pair had with Khan in 2003. Khan wore a concealed recording device in his role as an FBI operative. The bureau has paid him more than $217,000 in salary and expenses since he signed on as an informant.

Hamid Hayat, 23, is charged with supporting terrorism by undergoing training in Pakistan and returning to Lodi in May to await orders to wage violent jihad against enemies of Islam in the United States. He is also charged with initially lying to the FBI to conceal his training and intentions.

Umer Hayat, 48, is charged with initially lying to the FBI to cover for his son and to hide his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training in Pakistan.

More information emerged Thursday about Khan getting permission from the FBI to tell his live-in girlfriend in Oregon that he was an informant for the bureau - a subject that was touched on earlier in the trial.

Sacramento FBI Special Agent Leticia Lucero testified that she told Khan in August to tell his girlfriend, after the Hayats had been arrested and charged, after Khan's confidentiality agreement with the bureau had expired and after a wave of national publicity about the charges.

"I wanted her to know before she got calls trying to find him," Lucero said.

FBI Agent Recalls Hamid Hayat 'boasting' And Bragging (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 31, 2006

Government further acknowledges no proof that al-Qaida member was in Lodi

SACRAMENTO — Hamid Hayat didn't know it at the time, but when a new Muslim convert helped him purchase and set up a computer, that man was actually an undercover FBI agent.

The agent, Terry Rankhorn, had even gone through a religious conversion ceremony as part of his undercover assignment. Until Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat, were arrested last June, the agent had mingled for several years in Lodi's Muslim community, often alongside a paid informant.

Rankhorn, an eight-year FBI special agent who called himself "Tariq" when working undercover, spoke to Hamid Hayat about four times and testified at the 23-year-old's trial Thursday that he was "very cordial" and also bragged about his relatives.

One time, Rankhorn told a federal jury, Hamid Hayat said his uncle was a highly placed politician in Pakistan who could get him rare cigars, among other things.

"It seemed to be more boasting than actual fact," the agent testified when Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, asked Rankhorn if he believed the Lodi man.

Hamid Hayat is charged with lying to the FBI about allegedly attending terror training camps in Pakistan, and his attorney has insisted that her client regularly bragged and lied, and that he ultimately told FBI agents what they wanted to hear. The young man, who was born in Stockton and spent half his life in Lodi and half in Pakistan, is also charged with providing material support to terrorists.

His father, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver, is charged with lying to the FBI about his knowledge of the camps and his son's alleged involvement with them. Both are on trial in Sacramento, where two juries are hearing the case.

Defense attorneys spent parts of Wednesday and Thursday rebutting the government's case by questioning the motives of their star witness, the paid informant who worked alongside Rankhorn.

Naseem Khan, 32, was ultimately paid a salary of nearly $150,000 over the past four years, his FBI handler, Leticia Lucero, testified Thursday. But Khan's work ultimately cost more than $230,000 because the FBI also paid for his cars, airfare, meals and other expenses.

He was working at a convenience store in Oregon when FBI agents knocked on his door to investigate a money laundering scheme.

The Sacramento FBI office had been investigating the case since before 9/11, and their investigation took them to a Lodi apartment, Pifer testified Thursday. Agents were told that the man they sought had moved to Oregon, but after talking to Khan, they realized they had the wrong person, she said.

That day about five weeks after 9/11, Khan told agents he had seen Ayman al-Zawahiri — Osama bin Laden's right-hand man who is second on the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists — countless times in Lodi in 1998 and 1999. That claim was instantly questioned by Lodi residents and experts alike, and Pifer said the FBI had also doubted it.

Defense attorneys had planned to cast further doubt on Khan's claim, but on Thursday government prosecutors offered an agreement, which was then read to the jury: "The government has no information indicating that al-Zawahiri was in Lodi, California, in 1998 or 1999, aside from the information provided by Naseem Khan."

Asked if the apparently false information made agents doubt Khan's credibility, Pifer said it did not.

"A lot of people had mistaken identity at that time, so it's not outrageous that he thought he saw some of those people. In addition, a lot of his other reporting we were able to verify," she said. "When he would go out into the community, we didn't tell him what we were looking for, and we would corroborate that information."

Johnny Griffin, Umer Hayat's attorney, said outside court that Khan did likely speak the truth about some things, but that he probably made up other things in order to keep the interest of the FBI, which was focusing on terrorism.

"It all speaks to his motivation to curry favor with the FBI so he can get paychecks," Griffin said.

For instance, Griffen said, Khan recorded conversations with the Hayats and used the word "training" when they talked about madrassahs, or religious schools, "so he could later elaborate that he meant 'terrorist training camps.'"

Threatening Letter Investigated (LODINS)

By News-Sentinel Staff

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 31, 2006

Lodi police and the FBI are looking into a letter sent to the News-Sentinel stating that it is among several targets of al-Qaida.

The single-page letter was delivered this morning and was turned over to the Lodi police, who forwarded it to the FBI.

"There is clearly a possibility this is a prank, but we have to take this seriously," Capt. David Main said.

A spokeswoman for the FBI, Special Agent Karen Ernst, said her agency is aware of the letter and is working with local police to track down its origin. She declined further comment.

Indicted State Department Official Still Holds His Job (AP)

AP, March 30, 2006

DETROIT (AP) — A U.S. State Department security agent who has been charged with lying on the witness stand during a major terrorism trial remains employed by the department, an official said Thursday.

Harry Raymond Smith III continues to work for the State Department, a department official said. The official could not say what Smith's assignment is.

Smith, 49, was indicted Wednesday along with former Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard G. Convertino, 45, on charges of conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false declarations in connection with the botched prosecution of four North African immigrants. Convertino, who resigned from the Department of Justice in May, was the lead prosecutor in the case, and Smith helped in the investigation and testified for the government at the trial.

Convertino denied the charges Wednesday. A lawyer for Smith described him as a dedicated public servant and said a vigorous defense is planned.

Two of the four defendants in the terrorism trial, Karim Koubriti and Abdel-Ilah Elmardoudi, were convicted in 2003 of conspiring to provide material support and resources to terrorists. The Bush administration hailed their convictions as a victory in the war on terror.

However, a federal judge overturned the verdicts at the Justice Department's request after prosecutors discovered that some documents that could have aided the defense during the trial were not turned over by the government as required.

Former Federal Terrorism Prosecutor Faces Charges (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, March 31, 2006

The lead prosecutor in a Detroit terrorism trial that the government once heralded as a signal victory in the war on terrorism has been indicted on obstruction of justice and other charges related to the case.

The federal indictment says that former prosecutor Richard Convertino and a State Department security officer, Harry Smith, conspired to mislead the jury about evidence during the 2003 trial of the case, United States v. Koubriti, in which three Middle Eastern men were accused of operating a "sleeper cell" and convicted on a variety of terrorism and fraud charges. Theirs were the first and only jury convictions stemming from the FBI's investigation into the 9/11 terrorist attacks. But the federal judge handling the trial, Gerald Rosen, threw out the convictions after the Justice Department issued a scathing report accusing Convertino of withholding evidence that could have been beneficial to the defense.

Convertino, 45, and Smith, 49, were charged with conspiracy, obstruction of justice, and making false declarations in the case. Smith was a security officer at the American Embassy in Amman, Jordan. He helped in the Koubriti investigation and also testified as one of Convertino's witnesses at the trial.

As part of his prosecution, Convertino had alleged that the layout of an Amman hospital closely matched a sketch found in the three defendants' apartment and that the men had "cased" the hospital for a possible terrorist strike. But defense attorneys disputed that assertion and challenged Smith about the supposed absence of photographs that would show discrepancies between the sketch and the site.

In the case against Convertino and Smith, the government says they failed to disclose photographs of the Queen Alia Hospital to the defendants and lied that they could not obtain photographs of the hospital, even though Smith had not only taken his own photos but, not satisfied with the quality, had asked colleagues to shoot some more pictures for Convertino. The indictment charges that Convertino concealed the additional photographs during the trial.

The grand jury also charged Convertino with obstruction of justice in a second criminal case in the Eastern District of Michigan, described only as United States v. John Doe. In that case, prosecutors said Convertino allegedly gave false information to a judge during a sentencing hearing to obtain a sharply reduced sentence for a defendant. Convertino has described the charges that have been leveled against him as a smear campaign by the government.

Convertino is suing his boss in Detroit as well as former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other Justice Department officials, accusing them of "gross mismanagement" of terrorism cases. His attorney, William Sullivan, said today that the indictment is "manifestly false" and another example of "government reprisal for his whistleblower lawsuit."

Sullivan said the Koubriti case was just another example of how Convertino had "dedicated himself to preserving the safety of his community." Matthew Leitman, Smith's attorney, said that his client is a "dedicated public servant" who has "risked his life to defend his country and its elected officials" and that he would be vindicated in court.

Throughout the Koubriti trial, defense attorneys complained that Convertino had engaged in prosecutorial misconduct. He denied it. But Rosen, angered by Convertino's failure to obey his strict orders on disclosure of evidence potentially beneficial to defendants, ordered Ashcroft to conduct a complete review of the case, which resulted in Rosen's throwing out the convictions of the three men.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bill Seeks To End Color-coded Terror Alert (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

A bipartisan push on Capitol Hill to strip the hue from the government's color-coded terrorist alert system is gaining momentum.

A package of legislation moving through the House eliminates the Department of Homeland Security's use of colors to change the threat level, and calls for more specific threat information to be shared with the private sector and local governments.

"The color code doesn't provide any information to people, what it does is foster a climate of anxiety without giving useful information to people," said Rep. Zoe Lofgren, California Democrat, who worked with Rep. Rob Simmons, Connecticut Republican, on the legislation.

"It's not a proper way to give a nationwide response to actual threats."

The current system, implemented by former Homeland Security chief Tom Ridge, has frustrated governors and local officials nationwide who say they are forced to spend millions responding to threat level rises without information as to whether it directly affects their region.

The House Homeland Security subcommittee on intelligence, information sharing and terrorism risk assessment, chaired by Mr. Simmons, yesterday approved the plan by voice vote. It now awaits action by the full committee.

"There are no plans to change the color-coded system at this time," said William Knocke, Homeland Security spokesman.

"The system itself has matured over time as the country's baseline of preparedness rises and our threat analyses improves."

The last time the alert level was raised was July 7-12 after the London subway bombings.

Mr. Ridge tweaked the system in 2004 when specific economic areas were thought to be terrorist targets in New York, New Jersey and in Washington, and limited the increase in security and spending to those specific cities.

The terrorist alert system was introduced in March 2002 in five color-coded stages; low (green) guarded (blue) elevated (yellow) high (orange) and severe alert (red).

The country has been on elevated level since the code was introduced and the terrorist threat has been raised five times to high nationwide.

The White House briefly went to severe alert when a private aircraft accidentally crossed over its restricted airspace in 2005. The country has never been on low or guarded alert.

The legislation also gives full authority to Homeland Security officials to issue an increase in threat levels. In the past, conflicting warnings were sometimes issued from the Justice Department then led by Attorney General John Ashcroft, which created confusion, the legislation notes.

Report: TSA Got Little For $1 Billion (AP-Y2)

By Leslie Miller

DOJ_NMG_0024431

AP2, March 31, 2006

A company awarded a $1 billion contract for airport security equipment performed so poorly that the Homeland Security Department's inspector general recommended that the project be put out for bid again.

The inspector general, Richard Skinner, found in a report released Thursday that Unisys received most of the $1 billion without providing the Transportation Security Administration much of the equipment "critical to airport security and communications."

"The original funding is almost exhausted but many airports still do not have basic information technology and a telecommunications infrastructure," the report said.

The federal officials who head airport security at hundreds of airports complained that Unisys supplied antiquated equipment and that their radios didn't always communicate with each other inside the same concourse — a crucial function during an emergency.

"We are not pleased with the level of services provided as the services are not state of the art and in fact are archaic," wrote one federal security director.

Another complained that some cell phones — "a hodgepodge of $20 Radio Shack sale rack phones" — were so old they actually have a mechanical bell that rings.

The inspector general did note that TSA had an enormous task to take over airport security from private contractors. The agency had inadequate funding and staffing to oversee the contract, the report said.

The inspector general recommended that TSA put the contract out to bid again once the $1 billion is exhausted.

TSA agreed to do so and said it has strengthened its procurement oversight.

"TSA has implemented several changes since the DHS OIG (Department of Homeland Security Office of Inspector General) opened this audit and continues to make significant improvements within the Office of Acquisition," agency chief Kip Hawley wrote in a memorandum.

The inspector general noted that TSA knew the contract could exceed $5 billion, but set a ceiling at $1 billion. The report said that when the inspector general asked TSA to explain the low ceiling, agency officials said it was based on "specific requirements." However, the inspector general said the officials "could not document which specific requirements."

The TSA, which was created shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, needed information technology and telecommunications for what it anticipated would be 65,000 employees at headquarters, 429 airports, 21 field offices and a command center, the report said.

Unisys was to have provided dial-up connections, laptops, pagers and cell phones by Nov. 19, 2002. Six weeks later, the company was to have delivered high-speed connections, phones, encrypted radios and an electronic surveillance system. Eventually, Unisys was to provide command centers at airports, advanced wireless communications and interoperable radios.

The inspector general said that the company had only supplied the first phase by Sept. 30, 2004.

Blue Bell, Pa.-based Unisys did not immediately reply to a request for comment.

Port Security Measures Advance In Congress (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

Bills that aim to improve the security of the nation's ports and other key infrastructure advanced in both the House and Senate yesterday, weeks after public uproar scuttled a Dubai-owned company's bid to operate terminals at six U.S. ports.

The Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee yesterday approved 20-0 a bill that would reform the interagency panel charged with approving such foreign deals -- forcing more thorough investigations and congressional involvement.

And a House Homeland Security subcommittee approved by voice vote legislation that would boost funding for the nation's ports and improve port-security programs.

Many lawmakers were caught off-guard by February press reports of the approval of the deal involving DP World, based in the United Arab Emirates. Lawmakers said the panel charged with approving such deals -- the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) -- should have notified them of the situation and should have given far greater weight to homeland security and terrorism concerns when making its decision.

"Congress and the American people require greater confidence in the process," said banking committee Chairman Sen. Richard C. Shelby, Alabama Republican.

"CFIUS did not move with the times," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, referring to enhanced security concerns in a post-September 11 world.

Part of the concern is that the CFIUS rarely conducts a 45-day investigation of such deals, opting instead for 30-day reviews, as it did with the Dubai deal.

Under Mr. Shelby's bipartisan bill, deals would go through the 30-day review to determine whether they merit a longer investigation, and any CFIUS member could request more time to decide. The 45-day investigation would be required if a deal involves a foreign-government-owned company and critical U.S. infrastructure, such as ports, that could affect national security.

The bill would place the defense secretary as co-chairman of CFIUS and would add the director of national intelligence as a panel member. It would require CFIUS to notify Congress of pending deals and to develop a system to rank each country according to its adherence to nuclear security standards and relationship with the United States.

Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, has a competing bill that would scrap the CFIUS panel and reconstitute it under the Homeland Security Department.

Mr. Shelby said there isn't much support for that idea in the business community.

"Treasury's the proper place" for foreign business deal reviews, he said.

Meanwhile, a House Homeland Security subcommittee approved a bill -- sponsored by Rep. Dan Lungren, California Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat -- that would authorize a little more than $4 billion over five years to improve port security, install radiation portal monitors at U.S. seaports and develop a recovery plan in case of a transportation attack.

Panels Approve Bills About Ports Issues (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 30 (AP) — Two Congressional panels approved measures on Thursday in efforts to stem the furor over the attempted takeover of significant terminal operations at some large American ports by a company owned by the United Arab Emirates.

In the House, a Homeland Security subcommittee cleared legislation that aims to improve cargo inspections and strengthen security at ports. By voice vote, the subcommittee on economic security, infrastructure protection and cybersecurity sent the wide-ranging bill to the full committee, which is to vote on the measure in late April.

And the Senate Banking Committee voted 20 to 0 to approve a measure that would bring the federal panel that approved the DP World ports deal under tighter oversight by Congress.

The multiagency panel, called the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, would be required to investigate any proposed transaction that involved a foreign government or "critical infrastructure" of the country.

Senators said the bill, which was sent to the full Senate, strikes a balance between national security concerns and economic interests, with foreign investment in this country exceeding $530 billion in 2003-5.

Senate Panel Backs Tougher Takeover Review (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024433

Foreign takeovers of sensitive US assets could face a national security review of up to 120 days under legislation unanimously passed by the Senate banking committee on Thursday.

The bill drawn up by Senator Richard Shelby, chairman of the banking committee, aims to make reviews conducted by the Treasury-led interagency panel that investigations foreign acquisitions, or Cfius, more onerous and will give Congress more oversight over the confidential vetting process.

Passage of the bill, which now faces a vote in the Senate and has yet to be taken up by the House of Representatives, follows weeks of intense negotiations between lawmakers and a coordinated lobbying campaign by the business community.

"As critical as foreign investment is...our national security is paramount. Once it is bargained away, it may never be recovered,'' Mr Shelby said.

Lobbyists expressed satisfaction that, despite the extended review period permitted in certain circumstances, the draft legislation was far weaker than proposals first put forward by Mr Shelby last week. That initial draft would have subjected nearly every foreign deal to an automatic 75-day investigation.

Nevertheless, David Marchick, an attorney with Covington & Burling who handles Cfius cases, said the measures were "very tough". "It definitely toughens the Cfius process," he said.

The debate over how to balance security with an economy open to international investment follows the congressional backlash last month against the acquisition by a Dubai company of five US port terminals, a case that aggrieved lawmakers who said the deal had not been adequately vetted by the Bush administration.

Other deals, including Toshiba's takeover of Westinghouse and the likely merger between Alcatel and Lucent, will face Cfius reviews in coming months.

The business-friendly compromises agreed on Thursday by Mr Shelby followed negotiations with Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Christopher Dodd.

"They took off some of the rough edges. Every member understood the importance of foreign investment and jobs," said Larry Burton, executive director of the Business Roundtable, a lobby group,

The Roundtable remained concerned about "unprecedented" notification requirements in the bill, which it said could increase transactions becoming political, and reporting requirements that "would create opportunity" for information to be sent to Congress to be used for commercial purposes instead of national security purposes.

"The legislation...protects our national security in a responsible way that does not jeopardise our competitive position in the world," Mr Hagel said.

Under current law, Cfius reviews transactions that could impact national security for 30 days and conducts an additional 45-day investigation for any deal that raises concerns before it makes a recommendation to the president. The president then has 15 days to respond to the recommendation. In the past, most deals have been approved following a 30-day review.

Mr Shelby's bill would allow a secretary, or deputy or undersecretary, of a single Cfius agency to extend the investigation of a deal by a further 30 days if there was "credible evidence" that the foreign entity may take action to threaten national security. It requires Cfius to alert key lawmakers of its investigations - a process that was previously classified - and designates the department of defence as a vice-chair of the review panel.

Mr Shelby's bill would also force the White House to create a ranking of countries according to their relationship with the US to be considered in Cfius reviews. Lawmakers said the provision should be further debated before it is voted on by the whole Senate.

"Once you've labeled a country...it becomes a liability," said Mr Dodd. The provision was a "precarious way to go".

Don Evans, the former commerce secretary who is chief executive of the Financial Services Forum, an association that lobbies on behalf of the biggest banks in the world, praised the passage of the revised bill and said he would continue to work with members of Congress "to ensure that changes to foreign investment rules are considered carefully and thoughtfully".

Senate Advances Foreign-Investment Legislation (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024434

WASHINGTON -- The Senate moved forward on legislation to increase government oversight of foreign investments in the U.S. after heavy lobbying by Wall Street and business groups resulted in changes that softened some of the bill's tougher provisions.

In the wake of the Dubai ports uproar and with an election eight months away, Republicans and Democrats are competing to advance measures that would increase executive-branch and congressional scrutiny over foreign mergers and acquisitions in the U.S. But U.S. business interests, with some Senate support, have fought back, arguing that lawmakers risk scaring off crucial investors and making life harder on U.S. companies overseas.

The Senate Banking Committee unanimously approved a bill to extend the existing review process in a wide array of cases and to broaden the definition of investments, calling for scrutiny to include all types of "critical infrastructure." Working off a bill sponsored by committee Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.), the measure also would require the Treasury Department to notify Congress of proposed deals under review, thus opening up a process normally kept in secret.

The bill, which must now go to a full Senate vote, would stand as the most significant tightening of U.S. foreign-investment rules in almost 20 years. It seeks to alter the workings of the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., the interagency panel that provoked a public outcry after it approved Dubai Ports World's bid to manage five U.S. ports.

In a speech yesterday, Treasury Secretary John Snow warned that foreign investment in the U.S. is "being put in jeopardy now by legislation that is well-intended." He said the administration also worried that signals from the U.S. could lead other countries to shut themselves off to foreign investment.

Bowing to business concerns, the committee adopted an amendment by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.) to limit the range of cases that would require a full 45-day investigation on top of a preliminary 30-day review. The one group of companies that will face an automatic full investigation are foreign state-owned firms, though other deals that pose a national-security risk also will face the same scrutiny.

"Investments for us are about speed," said George Nolen, the chief executive of Siemens USA, who expressed relief that the amended bill wouldn't create new layers of bureaucracy for companies like its German-based parent, Siemens AG. "Sen. Shelby has put together a pretty good platform," he said.

The legislation drew scrutiny from major U.S. multinational companies and investment firms, as well as most of the major business groups. The groups expressed satisfaction but still had reservations at what emerged from the committee.

Deep worries remain, however, over the fact that the bill will require that Congress be notified of all impending reviews, a provision that could open the process to political squabbles and even pressures from business competitors. Whenever a foreign company seeks to acquire any company involved in critical infrastructure, the bill also would require notification of state officials and congressional representatives in the district where the U.S. company is based, which critics say will only intensify the political leverage.

In another disputed section, the revised legislation tweaked an earlier requirement that the administration rank all countries according to their relations with the U.S. and their support for weapons-control deals. Instead, the bill calls for the government to create a system "assessing and classifying" countries according to the same criteria. The list, which would be kept secret, would then be used to assess the risks involved in approving foreign acquisitions.

Under the Senate bill, the administration will have to report to Congress why it approved or rejected any transaction, but the bill wouldn't give lawmakers the power to veto a deal, as many critics feared.

The House isn't expected to introduce its own legislation until next month. But some Bush administration officials hope that they can support more-moderate revisions in the House to take the place of the Shelby bill.

Foreign-Investment Bill Advances (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

Seeking to apply lessons from the Dubai ports controversy, an influential Senate panel yesterday approved a bill that would tighten scrutiny of foreign takeovers while dropping several provisions that U.S. business leaders feared would dampen investment from abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0024435

The bill, approved 20 to 0 by the Senate Banking Committee, would revamp the process by which an interagency panel reviews foreign purchases of U.S. companies for possible national security problems. Criticism of the panel, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, erupted last month following revelations that it had approved a takeover by Dubai Ports World, a United Arab Emirates-based company, of a firm that manages significant operations at six East Coast ports. The uproar in Congress forced Dubai Ports World to promise to sell the U.S. port operations.

Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.), chairman of the Banking Committee, led a chorus of panel members who cited the ports case as evidence that CFIUS needs fixing. Noting that the heads of the agencies represented on the foreign investment committee, such as the secretaries of the Homeland Security, Defense and Treasury departments, didn't know about the deal until it made headlines, he said that "demonstrates that the system is woefully short of transparency and has no recognizable requirements for accountability."

The bill, which now goes to the full Senate, would make it easier for individual agencies on the committee to extend the time required to complete a review of a transaction.

It would also require special scrutiny of deals in which the acquiring company is owned by a foreign government, as Dubai Ports World is. In those cases, the deal would undergo a 45-day investigation followed by a presidential decision on whether to allow the purchase. That would apply to many if not all Chinese takeovers of U.S. companies, since the government in Beijing still has major stakes in big Chinese corporations.

Still, the Banking Committee's action came as a relief to business groups that worried the ports flap would prompt lawmakers to adopt much more dramatic measures that could make the U.S. investment climate less appealing to buyers from overseas. The House is planning to start work on its own bill in a few weeks.

"Great outcome," said Todd Malan, president of the Organization for International Investment, a group representing the U.S. subsidiaries of foreign multinational corporations. "There are still things that are going to be on our wish list" as the bill moves to the Senate floor, "but they just don't amount to things that are so significant that they would be barriers to foreign investment."

Gone from the bill, for example, is a provision that would have required a 45-day investigation for any foreign purchase of "critical infrastructure." Industry representatives complained that the term was too broad and would hamper too many deals.

Some lawmakers had argued that Congress should have veto power over CFIUS decisions, but that provision never got into the version of the bill presented yesterday by Shelby and Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.), the Banking Committee's ranking minority member. Giving Congress such a big say would politicize the process and make investors skittish, critics warned.

Instead, the bill requires the foreign investment committee to notify certain congressional leaders of deals it is reviewing before it approves them. Many experts in foreign investment think such a procedure might have averted the Dubai ports fiasco because top lawmakers would have had the chance to make sure their concerns were addressed in the review.

DOJ, DOD Stress Self-powered Communications (FCW)

By Michael Arnone

Federal Computer Week, March 31, 2006

If Hurricane Katrina taught first responders anything, it's that communications systems must survive a natural disaster before they can be used to coordinate response efforts.

That's what officials from the Defense and Justice departments told Congress today as they explained some of the steps they are taking to improve information sharing before the 2006 hurricane season starts June 1.

"The survivability of our systems is critical," Vance Hitch, DOJ's chief information officer, told the House Government Reform Committee.

The federal government must work with industry to create self-powered communications technology that can operate without traditional infrastructure, said Linton Wells, principal deputy assistant secretary of Defense for networks and information integration.

"The federal government must continue to expand its capability to rapidly deploy commercial off-the-shelf networks, making use of satellite links, wireless local-area networks, laptop computers and 'plug-and-play' equipment to bridge the gap created by a devastated civil infrastructure," Wells said in a statement.

Common operating standards and equipment are the long-term solution to interoperable communications in disaster response, Hitch said. The Justice, Homeland Security and Treasury departments are making progress toward implementing such standards through the Integrated Wireless Network (IWN), he said.

A communications system for 80,000 federal law enforcement officers nationwide, IWN will improve the departments' ability to communicate with one another by having them use common standards and equipment, Hitch said.

The participating agencies have almost finished procurement for IWN and expect to award a contract soon, he said. The agencies plan to roll the program out over five years.

IP, which bridges formerly incompatible systems, is an advance in communications interoperability that can be used more quickly, Wells said.

Better coordination at the federal, state and local levels is also necessary to improve information sharing, said Peter Verga, principal deputy assistant secretary of Defense for homeland defense.

To prepare for the 2006 hurricane season, DOD has assigned a strategic planner to DHS and is reviewing other employees assigned to DHS to ensure the right people are in place, Verga said.

DOD is working with the National Geospatial Intelligence Agency to develop a system to acquire reconnaissance data of initial damage conditions, Verga said.

The department is helping other agencies revise the National Search and Rescue Plan, and working to provide state National Guard forces with more information about military deployments during disaster response, Verga said.

A main area that needs improvement is social networks among different first responder groups, Wells said. All first responders should train and exercise together to create trusted relationships across disciplines and form bonds that facilitate communication in crisis situations, he said.

Ground Zero Still In Limbo As Talks Fail (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

Gov. George E. Pataki's last-ditch effort to strike a deal with the developer Larry A. Silverstein to speed up the rebuilding at ground zero crashed yesterday, when he was unable to convince New Jersey or City Hall officials that it made financial sense.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and representatives of Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey vowed to work with Mr. Pataki to put together a new framework for rebuilding at the World Trade Center site, one that would be likely to diminish Mr. Silverstein's role.

The seemingly irreparable breakdown, coming after months of negotiations and with construction expected to start within days, is clearly a personal and political disappointment for the governor.

Over the last three years, Mr. Pataki tied his legacy, his reputation and perhaps his presidential ambitions to construction of the Freedom Tower and the restoration of the city's skyline after the devastating attack on Sept. 11.

After a furious series of meetings this week, the Pataki administration and Mr. Silverstein were inching back toward an agreement much like one that had been on the table when talks reached a dramatic late-night impasse on March 14.

But Mr. Pataki's solution was coming under increasing fire in public from Mayor Bloomberg and Governor Corzine. They said it would have enriched the developer at public expense, while putting the project itself in jeopardy.

Mr. Pataki had hoped to present his proposal yesterday to the board of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the trade center site. His framework would have relieved Mr. Silverstein of financial responsibility for building the $2 billion Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most troubled of the five towers planned for the 16-acre site. But the developer would have retained the right to build three towers on the most valuable parcels on Church Street.

At the end of a 90-minute meeting yesterday morning at the authority's Park Avenue office, it was clear to the Pataki administration that neither Mayor Bloomberg nor Governor Corzine, who shares control of the authority with Mr. Pataki, were willing to go along.

So, the New York governor's office was forced to notify authority commissioners that ground zero was off the agenda.

"Governor Pataki is insisting on moving forward," said Charles A. Gargano, the state's chief economic development official and vice chairman of the Port Authority. "Our goal is to come to a framework agreement, to work out the structure to address many of these issues."

In public, officials from New York, New Jersey and City Hall were careful to avoid criticizing one another yesterday. Indeed, Mayor Bloomberg even said that Mr. Pataki had done a good job under difficult circumstances.

But state officials who were granted anonymity so that they could speak with fewer political constraints defended the deal they had nearly signed with Mr. Silverstein. They said that it would have ensured the completion of all the buildings at ground zero at a quicker pace, while imposing strict deadlines on the developer.

Further, they said, they had forced Mr. Silverstein to make concessions on his rent, the allocation of insurance proceeds and his share of infrastructure costs.

Among the public officials, tension was clearly just below the surface yesterday. Mr. Gargano said that the framework the state had erected for a deal was still on the table. Yet city officials and Anthony R. Coscia, the authority's chairman and a New Jersey appointee, suggested that it was time to start over on an arrangement that all sides could embrace.

If the turn of events was a blow to Mr. Pataki, it also hurt Mr. Silverstein, who leased the World Trade Center six weeks before it was destroyed. The developer has repeatedly vowed to start work on the Freedom Tower next month. But he may not want to start spending tens of millions of dollars without fully knowing what his role will be in the future when it comes to rebuilding the entire complex.

Yesterday, Mr. Silverstein said that he had negotiated in good faith with Governor Pataki, making significant progress on all the critical issues, including rent and the allocation of $2.9 billion in insurance proceeds. Mr. Silverstein, who has been alternately applauded and vilified for his role, rejected any suggestion that he was at fault and blamed government ineptitude.

"We now find that the process has apparently gotten bogged down inside the Port Authority, which is as frustrating to me as I'm sure it is to New Yorkers," Mr. Silverstein said in a statement. "We hope that the different leaders and branches of government will quickly come together so we can move past the uncertainty and get on with what is our paramount obligation — rebuilding the World Trade Center."

But Mr. Coscia put the onus on Mr. Silverstein and brushed aside talk of a rift with Governor Pataki. He said the city and both states would now work together on a unified proposal to offer Mr. Silverstein.

"The issues we find with the Silverstein proposal are equally of concern to New York, New Jersey, Governor Pataki and Mayor Bloomberg," Mr. Coscia said. "My expectation is that there is a growing unanimity of opinion among two governors and the mayor, and that is likely to enhance the chance of having an agreement."

The collapse of the talks is not the only trouble at ground zero. Work has begun on the Sept. 11 memorial, but that project is already over budget and fund-raising has been sluggish. There was a nasty public battle over a planned cultural center and continuing doubts about the economic viability of the Freedom Tower, which is widely considered to be too big, in the wrong place and nearly impossible to lease to corporate tenants, who view it as an obvious terrorist target.

Some downtown executives and community leaders are also worried that the continuing uncertainty at ground zero will undermine the fragile recovery in Lower Manhattan. Although the office vacancy rate downtown is relatively high, they are hoping that rising rents and a tight Midtown market will once again make Lower Manhattan an attractive alternative.

"The business community is eager for a resolution at ground zero so Lower Manhattan can continue it's momentum toward a full recovery," said Eric Deutsch, president of the Alliance for Downtown New York.

The latest crisis was prompted, in part, by the scheduled April groundbreaking for the Freedom Tower. Although Mr. Silverstein continues to insist that he has the money and the desire to do the job, state and city officials and authority executives have grown increasingly concerned that he could run out of money, default on his lease and walk away with tens of millions in profit after completing only two towers.

To be fair, Governor Pataki championed the skyscraper as a symbol of New York's resilience and insisted that it be built first, over Mr. Silverstein's objections. The developer and government officials subsequently reached agreements in 2003 and 2004 on what would be built and when.

DOJ_NMG_0024438

Last December, Mr. Coscia of the Port Authority suggested that Mr. Silverstein surrender a major part of the World Trade Center site as a way of addressing the financial problems.

Mayor Bloomberg, who had been largely focused on the redevelopment of the Far West Side in 2004 and 2005, became increasingly focused on Lower Manhattan, backing Mr. Coscia.

The developer refused, not wanting to relinquish what he said were the most valuable parcels.

The Pataki administration then began weeks of negotiations with Mr. Silverstein that left Mr. Coscia and Mayor Bloomberg without seats at the bargaining table. Even after the impasse on March 14, Silverstein executives complained that they were making concessions to Mr. Pataki's negotiators, while reading in the newspapers about new demands by City Hall or New Jersey.

Mr. Coscia said yesterday that two fundamentally different interests were in play.

"Silverstein Properties is pursuing their business interests to further the profitability of this effort," he said, "and we have a responsibility to protect the public's interest."

Trade Center Rebuilding Talks Again Hit Snag But Will Continue (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

Talks to jump-start the long-delayed rebuilding of the World Trade Center became stymied again as the region's two governors and New York City's mayor failed to agree on a negotiating stance with the site's private developer, but talks are continuing nonetheless.

New York Gov. George E. Pataki and New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine, who control Ground Zero's owner, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, and New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg couldn't settle upon a position to take with real-estate developer Larry Silverstein, who owns the legal right to rebuild the office space there, several people involved in the negotiations say.

The three men held discussions in recent days hoping to craft a plan in time for the Port Authority's board of commissioners to approve at their monthly meeting yesterday afternoon. That didn't happen.

But participants said talks would continue. "The parties involved here are probably closer than they've ever been before," said Port Authority Chairman Anthony R. Coscia, from New Jersey.

The talks signal a shift of focus away from Mr. Silverstein to the complex web of government involved in rebuilding. Mr. Silverstein and Port Authority negotiators had agreed upon the broad outlines of a deal on Tuesday. But those terms needed to be approved by the bistate agency's commissioners, who are appointed in equal number by the governors of New York and New Jersey. Mr. Bloomberg is involved because he controls $1.67 billion in tax-free bonds for the project.

According to one of the negotiators, the lack of a deal makes the start of the site's signature skyscraper, the Freedom Tower, "unclear." A groundbreaking was planned for April.

The three government entities disagree on how much of a rent reduction to give to Mr. Silverstein. Mr. Silverstein's lawyers and Port Authority staff agreed Tuesday that the developer would forgo the rights to rebuild two of the five office towers, including the signature Freedom Tower, and around $1 billion in insurance money. The Port Authority would reduce the value of rent Mr. Silverstein owes under his $3.2 billion, 99-year lease, by $300 million to $400 million in net-present-value terms, after accounting for the reduction in the amount of space Mr. Silverstein would develop.

A Port Authority official said one of the sticking points is assurances made by New York State that it could persuade the federal government to rent close to one million square feet of space in the Freedom Tower for $47.50 a square foot, a number that would reduce the Port Authority's risk in the $2.2 billion tower.

Levee Repair Costs Triple (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

The Bush administration said yesterday that the cost of rebuilding New Orleans's levees to federal standards has nearly tripled to $10 billion and that there may not be enough money to fully protect the entire region.

DOJ_NMG_0024439

Donald E. Powell, the administration's rebuilding coordinator, said some areas may be left without the protection of levees strong enough to meet requirements of the national flood insurance program. Those areas probably would face enormous obstacles in attracting home buyers and investors willing to build there.

The news represents a shift for the administration; President Bush had pledged in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina to rebuild New Orleans "higher and better." Now, some areas may lose out as they compete for levee protection. Powell's announcement, in a conference call with reporters, prompted denunciations from state and local officials who said the federal government is reneging on promises to rebuild the entire region.

"This monumental miscalculation is an outrage," said Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D). "This means that, just two months before hurricane season, the Corps of Engineers informs us they cannot ensure even the minimum safety of southeastern Louisiana. This is totally unacceptable."

The change followed a surprise announcement from the Army Corps of Engineers that the levee reconstruction project, most recently estimated at $3.5 billion, would now cost $9.5 billion if insurance-certified levees were extended throughout the region.

Powell had said in December when the administration announced a $3.1 billion levee plan that Bush's commitment to rebuild the Gulf Coast "would be satisfied as it relates to the safety and security of the people." In February, after Congress approved $2 billion for the project, Bush said an additional $1.5 billion would be needed. The Senate will consider the request next week.

Yesterday, Powell acknowledged that now "we are faced with some new and tough policy decisions."

The news shattered the fragile relationship between Washington officials and Louisiana leaders, who have assumed that the rebuilding effort would cover the entire New Orleans area.

State and local leaders said the U.S. government had broken a trust and appeared to backing away from commitments to rebuild. Louisiana officials also questioned why federal engineers are just now announcing that the task would cost $6 billion more.

"Every time we turn around, there's a new obstacle," said Rep. Charlie Melancon (D-La.). "The estimates were done for rebuilding the levees, and a number was given to the administration and to the Congress. Now all of a sudden they say they made a $6 billion mistake?"

Melancon said he wondered whether the changes reflected the comments made by officials such as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) after the storm questioning the wisdom of rebuilding the low-lying city.

"I have been concerned since November that people here in Washington didn't really want to help. . . . I think the people are starting to see where the problems are," Melancon said.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) said the announcement confirmed his warnings since November that Washington is "stonewalling" and seeking "way too little money" for levee repairs.

The new cost estimates, just as hurricane season is approaching, are "enormously frustrating," he said.

A spokesperson for New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) said he had no comment.

In the conference call yesterday, Powell reiterated the promise that the levees will be at least as strong as they were designed to be before Hurricane Katrina hit on Aug. 29.

"If a hurricane such as Katrina hit the area, there would not be catastrophic flooding," he said. But, he said, there might be some "manageable" flooding.

Powell said that science, "not any bureaucracy, politics nor any member of the political branches," determined the cost revisions. Bush "is concerned with the well-being of the area's residents," he said, but "he wants to make sure we make the right rebuilding decisions, not just for the residents but for the American taxpayers."

Indicating that not all of the $6 billion will be forthcoming, Powell said he will be in discussions with state and local leaders about which portions of the region should be protected with insurance-certified levees, and also how much the state and local governments can pay.

"We're dialoguing with the state and local officials," he said, adding that if there is an agreement, maps clarifying where and how homeowners can rebuild could be released in 10 days. "We haven't decided what [amount] to ask for."

He played down the difference between the ordinary levees and those that meet the standards of the insurance program, saying the $6 billion in improvements is "an insurance issue, and not necessarily a safety issue."

Whether the levees meet the flood insurance standards is considered a key piece of the rebuilding puzzle, however.

In areas where the levees do not meet the standards, buildings may have to be constructed up to 20 to 35 feet above ground, a Powell aide acknowledged. Also, in a city where there is a desperate need for housing investors, areas with less-than-optimal levees could scare off flood-wary developers.

To help state and local officials choose which areas might be protected by insurance-certified levees, Powell broke the four-parish New Orleans region into 10 areas and listed the populations and cost of building such levees.

In the analysis, three Plaquemines Parish sections, southeast of the city, look ripe for cost-cutting. Less than 2 percent of the area's population lives there, but it would cost nearly $2.9 billion to build certified levees.

By contrast, protecting Algiers, where 13 percent of the region's population lives, would cost $129 million.

The reason the cost estimates have risen so dramatically is that the science of hurricanes and hurricane protection is evolving, Maj. Gen. Don T. Riley, director of civil works for the Army Corps of Engineers, said yesterday.

The loss of coastal wetlands protecting New Orleans from storms, as well as the lowering of the ground level in the area, have reduced the city's natural safeguards from flooding -- and altered assumptions.

Moreover, new storm data from the past 20 years suggest that powerful storms are more likely to hit New Orleans than previously believed. The previous levee design was meant for less powerful storms, but the recent surge of activity has changed ideas about what kinds of storms the city should be prepared for.

"As we learn, we will adjust our methodology and our estimates," Riley said. "To do it properly takes time."

Levee Plans Fall Short Of FEMA Standards (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

New Orleans's levees do not meet the standards that the Federal Emergency Management Agency requires for its flood protection program, federal officials said yesterday — and they added that the problem would take as much as $6 billion to fix.

FEMA has long based its flood planning on whether an area is protected against a flood that might have a 1 percent chance of occurring in any year, also known as a 100-year flood. Without that certification, the agency's flood maps have to treat the entire levee system as if it were not there at all, which means that people hoping to build in the affected areas might have to rebuild their homes at elevations of 15 or even 30 feet above sea level in order to meet new federal building standards.

But since Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans, the agency has toughened its 100-year standard, based on new information about land subsidence and the increasing severity and frequency of hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico. There is also new data about weak soils in the area and the failure of some of the city's floodwalls.

As a result, the levees that the Army Corps of Engineers is now building will not meet the new FEMA standard. Donald Powell, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, said Thursday that the Corps now believes it cannot meet that standard without spending additional billions to upgrade the flood protection system still further.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana expressed outrage over what she called a monumental miscalculation and said it was shocking to learn that $6 billion more might be needed for the hurricane protection system.

"This means that, just two months before hurricane season, the Corps of Engineers informs us they cannot ensure even the minimum safety of Southeastern Louisiana," Ms. Blanco said in a statement. "This is totally unacceptable."

But Mr. Powell said in a news briefing yesterday that the $2 billion that the Army Corps of Engineers is currently spending and the $1.4 billion in additional funds it has requested will make the system stronger and better than it has ever been. Asked if he would feel comfortable living in the area despite the government's inability to certify the levees, he responded, "after the Corps completes its work, yes."

Mr. Powell called the difference "a regulatory issue, not necessarily a safety issue." When the current work on the levees is complete, he said, there might be flooding from a storm like Hurricane Katrina, but the levee system would not fail catastrophically again.

Although people can rebuild without the federal flood maps today, many homeowners may well decide that the risks of rebuilding are too great. The Louisiana Recovery Authority has said that its plan to provide grants to those who rebuild will favor those who meet FEMA requirements.

Mr. Powell said that to start the process of getting the new flood maps, the federal government only needs to state that it does intend to meet the certification standard — a process that it can undertake for the entire system at the full $6 billion, or pick and choose projects to cut costs.

The flood advisory documents, which will begin the process of creating final flood maps, could emerge within days, Mr. Powell said. It will take up to 18 months to complete the maps.

In the briefing, Mr. Powell said that rebuilding the city could take 25 years — a sentiment shared by many disaster recovery experts. He added, however, "It could be much shorter than that, depending on how they plan their future. I'm going to be doing everything I can to make this as short as possible."

Matt McBride, a member of the community group in Broadmoor, a New Orleans neighborhood that was inundated during Hurricane Katrina, said many city residents would be disappointed by the levee announcement. While many people in his neighborhood were committed to rebuilding, he said, "It's just one more headache on top of the hundreds that we're dealing with."

Officials Add $6 Billion To Price Tag Of Levees (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

In what could be a significant setback to rebuilding New Orleans, federal officials said Thursday that it would cost an additional $6 billion to make the levee system strong enough that flood insurance could be issued in the area.

That amount would be in addition to the $3.5 billion already being spent to repair the levees damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Without federally issued flood insurance, rebuilding could not proceed in many areas.

The new assessment was disclosed Thursday by Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding.

The problem evolved in recent weeks when disparate federal agencies began grappling with complex rules and regulations that affect federal flood insurance, the technology of predicting hurricanes and certifications of levee safety standards.

As a result, Powell found himself this week having to disclose to senior Bush administration officials and congressional leaders that what looked like a price tag of $3.5 billion to upgrade and repair levees in and around New Orleans had exploded almost threefold, to $9 billion.

"It is complicated, it is complex," Powell said in an interview.

The complication began as part of an effort by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to update 90,000 flood maps across the nation, which show where individuals and businesses can locate developments that would be unlikely to flood in 100 years and thereby qualify for the National Flood Insurance Program.

The flood maps that apply to New Orleans changed dramatically after Katrina, requiring a higher degree of protection from levees. Recent scientific research showed that the area had undergone a tremendous geologic subsidence, lowering the area's elevation. Climatic changes also might increase the risk of hurricanes.

As FEMA completed an early version of its flood maps, it went to the Army Corps of Engineers and asked it to certify that its levees would protect the city against the 100-year flood that FEMA had projected.

But in a surprise move, the corps said it could not certify that its levees would hold against a 100-year flood, and it refused to offer the certification.

If the corps cannot certify the levees under FEMA rules, then in terms of flood insurance it would be as if New Orleans had no levees at all, federal officials said. The corps estimated that it would cost as much as $6 billion to make upgrades that would allow for the certification.

Maj. Gen. Don T. Riley, the corps' chief for public works, said in an interview that certifications sought by FEMA would require "significantly higher" levees than the current 12- to 17-foot storm walls and earthen mounds that surround the city.

Even if the corps built such a system, it would not protect against another Katrina, which Riley estimated was a 150-year storm. Moreover, the demand by Louisiana officials for levees that could protect against a Category 5 hurricane, the worst possible storm, would require an even larger-scale system that is the subject of a $20 million study, Riley said.

The immediate crisis of how to come up with $6 billion is under sharp debate.

One option would be to abandon certain sections of the region, such as Plaquemines and St. Bernard parishes or the Lower 9th Ward, which are driving a significant part of the costs. Central New Orleans would not require any significant additional spending, though the city's West Bank, its eastern flank and Jefferson Parish would require high spending to protect.

Under federal rules, local and state agencies must put up 35% of the cost of levee improvements. So far, the federal government has waived that requirement.

But as costs continue to mount, congressional leaders are becoming hesitant to do so.

Powell said in a news conference Thursday that he hoped rebuilding some sections of the city would take five years but that he could not rule out a reconstruction period of 25 years, noting Katrina was the greatest natural disaster in the nation's history.

New Orleans Recovery Could Take 25 Years (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP2, March 30, 2006

A full recovery in New Orleans could take 25 years as homeowners, businesses and tourists are coaxed back to the city devastated by Hurricane Katrina, the Bush administration's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator said Thursday.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Don Powell said that much of the city's rebirth will hinge on factors he said were "out of our control," including restoring housing, ensuring safety and encouraging robust investment by the private sector.

"We kind of want it to happen overnight, or I do, but it's going to take some time," Powell said. "This could be five to 25 years for it all to fit into place."

Powell also said the Army Corps of Engineers now estimates it will cost an additional $5.9 billion to repair levees enough to fully protect and insure nearly 1.1 million residents of the greater New Orleans area.

That is in addition to the $3.5 billion the Bush administration has so far sought to bring the levees back to at least their pre-Katrina levels by June 1, the start of the 2006 hurricane season.

Powell said the Corps recently told him the administration must commit to spending as much as $5.9 billion more before it could fully certify the levees, as needed to issue flood maps that determine insurance rates and allow rebuilding to begin.

Powell said he does not know how many more federal dollars Washington will commit to the region, or whether some of the money will come from state and local governments. "We haven't decided what to ask for," Powell said.

But he said that decision and the release of new flood maps would likely happen in a "relatively short period of time — in a matter of days."

Over the next 60 days, Powell said, the Corps will be strengthening levees and building storm-proof pumping stations and flood gates to close certain parts of New Orleans' canals in the event of a major storm.

"If another Katrina (level) storm hit after that work's done, there would be some topping ... but the flooding would be all manageable," Powell said. "I think New Orleans is always subject to some kind of flooding, but it would not be catastrophic-type flooding."

In Baton Rouge, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco called the nearly tripling of the estimated cost of levee repairs "an outrage." She demanded that Congress come up with the money. She said the $3.5 billion investment so far has focused primarily on rebuilding the flood protection on the east bank of New Orleans.

Without the additional cash, Blanco said, the Lower Ninth Ward and St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes likely wouldn't receive the levee repairs needed to give them the protection they had before Katrina.

"Obviously all sections will not be secure," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0024443

The White House so far has asked for $108 billion in Gulf Coast relief and recovery aid, all but $19 billion of which has been approved by Congress. The remainder is under consideration by lawmakers. The new levee costs are not included in that spending pot, Powell said.

In a conference call with reporters later, Army Corps of Engineers Maj. Gen. Don Riley said the new costs are the result of ongoing repairs and studies of the levees.

"As we learn, we will adjust our methodology and our estimate," Riley said. "To do it properly, it takes time. Our main interest is in getting this right for the people of New Orleans."

What the storm-ravaged region will look like in upcoming years is largely up to state and local officials, Powell said, though the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development will have authority to "tweak" some of the housing plans.

The four parishes that make up New Orleans and its immediate suburbs have been waiting for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to issue the flood maps for months.

WAR NEWS:

Jill Carroll: Finally Free (CSM)

By Dan Murphy And Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 31, 2006

CAIRO AND BAGHDAD - Katie Carroll went from a deep sleep to instantly awake when she saw the Iraq country code on her caller ID.

She grabbed the phone. It was 5:45 a.m and the ringing heralded the news about her twin sister, Jill, who had been held hostage in Iraq for nearly three months. "Katie, it's me," said the voice on the other end of the line. "I'm free."

It was Jill herself, safe after 82 days.

"Then she burst into tears and I did, too," says Katie.

Journalist Jill Carroll was freed in Baghdad Thursday ending a period of captivity marked by an enormous global outpouring of support and calls for her release.

"I'm just really grateful. The overwhelming emotion is gratitude. I am glad this day has arrived and thank whatever forces, divine and otherwise, that helped bring about this day," says Jill.

On Jan. 7, Monitor freelancer Carroll traveled to interview Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi in Baghdad's western Adil neighborhood. He was not in his office, and, after waiting some 20 minutes, Carroll and her Iraqi driver and interpreter left.

After traveling about 300 yards, they were attacked by gunmen. Carroll was seized, and her interpreter, Allan Eniwya, was killed.

Thursday, Carroll's captors simply drove her to Amariyah, stopped the car, pointed her in the direction of the Iraqi Islamic Party (IPP) office at about 12:20 p.m. local time and then drove off.

Carroll, who was on assignment for the Monitor when she was kidnapped, gave a short interview to Baghdad TV, which is owned by the IIP, before being transported to the Green Zone by the US military. She was told the interview was for internal party uses only, and didn't realize it would be broadcast. In that interview Carrroll said that for most of her ordeal she was kept in a darkened room which she later described as a "cave."

"I really don't know where I was. The room had a window but the glass you know, you can't see," she said, making a motion with her hand as if the window was blocked, "and you couldn't hear any sound, and so I would sit in the room."

"If I had to take a shower I walked, you know, two feet, to the next door to take a shower or go to the bathroom and come back." From time to time, she says, she had contact with Iraqi women and children in the house which she found comforting.

She was only allowed to watch television and read a newspaper once and had little information about what was going on in the world at large.

"I was treated well, but I don't know why I was kidnapped," Carroll told the TV station about her kidnappers. In videotaped statements her captors had implied they would kill her if Iraqi prisoners held by coalition forces weren't released. But Carroll said, "They never hit me. They never even threatened to hit me."

DOJ_NMG_0024444

Carroll says she asked an IIP official to call the Monitor's Baghdad hotel. He refused, and called the Washington Post's Baghdad office. Carroll is close personal friends with two of the Post's Iraqi staffers.

Her next call was to twin sister Katie. She then called her parents, Jim and Mary Beth.

The first thing she told me today was, 'I love you,'" says Mary Beth. "She said, 'Every single day I was in captivity, I cried over how worried you must be, and what a burden this must be for the family.' "

In fact, the day before release, Katie Carroll had appeared on the Arab TV station Al Arabiyah, where she had talked of the effect of the kidnapping on the family and pleaded for information that might lead to her sister's release.

"I was dreaming that this would be the way I'd find out - that she'd call me in the middle of the night like this," says Katie. "She sounded great. I just want to thank everyone who's prayed and given us support through this time, and we're obviously looking forward to some private time with Jill."

Monitor Editor Richard Bergenheim said Thursday: "This is an exciting day, we couldn't be happier. We are so pleased she'll be back with her family. The prayers of people all over the world have been answered."

President George Bush had said Carroll's release was a top priority for his administration, and her freedom was welcomed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at a press conference in Berlin. Ms. Rice spoke of the "great delight and great relief of the United States, the people of the United States and, I'm sure, the people of the world at the release today of Jill Carroll."

Carroll's release followed half a dozen false leads in the effort to free her - people who contacted the Monitor or the Carroll family. Some demanded exorbitant ransoms, but never managed to produce a "proof of life." One scam artist, calling himself a repentant member of the kidnapper group and seeking a payoff, turned out to be a young Nigerian and was arrested in Germany. Other would-be players said they had contacts and could free her, but never delivered.

Her support among Iraqis appeared to be quite strong. Several Iraqi newspapers and television stations took up her cause. They reported her story, editorialized for her freedom, and donated public-service announcements designed by the Monitor's Baghdad correspondents that pleaded for Carroll's release.

Even the mother of a young Iraqi woman detained for months by the government without charges and finally released in late January was willing to speak publicly on Carroll's behalf. Politicians across the Iraqi political spectrum, especially leaders from the Sunni sect also spoke out emotionally on Carroll's behalf.

Across the Muslim world, voices not normally heard on behalf of an American, called for Jill's release: Hamas in the Palestinian territories, the Muslim Brotherhood in Cairo, and many others.

Hope rose with the release of the remaining three Christian Peacekeepers hostages last week. But it had been nearly two months since Carroll's last video was dated, and many experts were privately beginning to express discouragement about her status. It had been quiet too long, and without a single confirmed attempt to negotiate.

For the Monitor's "Team Jill" - an informal group of editors and writers who worked on her case, each assigned separate tasks - it was a difficult time.

Washington bureau chief David Cook every day passed a photo of Carroll taped to the door of the bureau's building. "You'd come in the door and see her picture and think, 'have I done everything I could today to help get her out?'" says Cook.

Monitor editor Bergenheim said no money had been exchanged for Carroll's release.

Following Carroll's arrival at the IIP office Thursday, the party's Secretary General Tariq al-Hashimi led a ceremony in which he handed the freed journalist gifts, and praised her release.

Mr. Hashimi is a rival for influence among Iraq's Sunni Arab minority of Adnan al-Dulaimi's, the politician Carroll had sought to interview on the morning of Jan. 7. Mr. Dulaimi has repeatedly denied involvement. Dulaimi has said that his political rivals - both Shiite and Sunni - were trying to hurt his political standing.

Leading IIP member Naser al-Ani said her appearance at their office, in a blue Islamic robe and wearing a light green headscarf identical to the one she wore in a Feb. 28 video issued by her captors, was completely unexpected. He said guards at the office "thought she was a party member - dressed Islamically like that, they thought she worked in [the Iraqi government's] Women's Affairs department."

Mr. Ani said she was dropped off near the office, in a Sunni stronghold in Western Baghdad. In a press conference, Hashimi said she bore a letter from her captors that she gave to the IIP guards.

DOJ_NMG_0024445

A measure of the extent to which she was cut off from the outside world was that she didn't know if her driver had escaped on Jan. 7 during the abduction. News of his safety was a great relief to Carroll, her father Jim Carroll said.

"She knew about Alan, but did not know about [the driver]," Mr. Carroll says. "She started to break down when we were talking about it, so I didn't pursue that too much."

Shortly before her release, her kidnappers also warned Carroll about talking to the US or going to the Green Zone, alleging to her that it was "infiltrated by the Mujahideen" and that she might be killed if she cooperated with the Americans, her family says.

When the US military arrived at the IIP offices to escort her to the Green Zone, she was at first reluctant to go. But in a brief phone call the Monitor's staff writer Scott Peterson in Baghdad, he persuaded her that was the best and safest course of action.

Kidnappers in Iraq have tried to scare former hostages like this in the past. When Italian journalist Guiliana Sgrena was released by her captors in February last year, they told her there was a CIA threat to kill her, and that she should rush to the airport rather than go to the Green Zone. As her car sped down the airport road, at the time one of the most dangerous stretches of Iraq, the US military opened fire on the car, killing Nicola Calipari, the Italian intelligence agent who helped secure her release.

Italy's Corriere della Sera newspaper said the kidnappers had phoned the US military with an anonymous tip and the cars description, warning that it was a car-bomb.

At the time of writing, Ms. Carroll is receiving medical attention in the Green Zone.

Fully in character to all those who know her, Jill has repeatedly expressed concern for Allan and his family, and all the friends and family who've been worrying about her through her ordeal - particularly her parents and her sister.

'Like Falling Off A Cliff For 3 Months' (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 30 -- Jill Carroll wondered from day to day whether she would grow old or die a hostage.

"It was like falling off a cliff for three months, waiting to hit the ground," the 28-year-old American reporter said Thursday after being released by her kidnappers.

A shuffle from car to street to the branch office of a Sunni Arab political party and then to its headquarters brought Carroll to freedom on a beautiful spring day in Baghdad.

When she walked into the Iraqi Islamic Party's branch, she was still wearing one of the head scarves and enveloping embroidered dresses given to her by her captors. The black gloves of a conservative Muslim woman, also given to her by her captors, hid her hands.

Shortly after Carroll's arrival, the head of the party telephoned The Washington Post's Baghdad bureau. Carroll, a freelance journalist who wrote for the Christian Science Monitor, said she wanted to see familiar faces and had had many friends on The Post's staff since the early days of the war. Devoted to mastering Arabic and Middle Eastern culture and to covering Iraq, she was particularly close to the paper's young Iraqi interpreters and reporters.

In the party leader's chair-lined offices, with Sunni politicians looking on, Carroll and her friends were reunited. They embraced and cried through her first conversations in English in more than 80 days.

Then, with a cellphone borrowed from one of the politicians, Carroll woke up her twin sister, father and mother in the United States, punching in their numbers one after another.

Katie, Dad, Mom. It's Jill. I'm fine. I'm free.

She borrowed another cellphone when the first one lost power. She begged her family's forgiveness.

Three months without exercise had made her face round. Her captors had treated her well, she said, and she never dared turn down their offers of meals or candy for fear of giving offense. I'm fat, she said.

She asked for news of the world. She was shocked to hear of the prayers on her behalf, of the media coverage, of the vigils and balloon releases at the foot of the Eiffel Tower.

Kidnapped Jan. 7, three weeks after Iraq's national elections, she was shocked as well to hear that Iraq had still not formed a new government.

DOJ_NMG_0024446

"You know that shelf?" she asked. She meant a mirror-backed knickknack cabinet in the entry of the Post house in Baghdad. For one reason or another, it had become a place to put photos of close friends killed over the nearly three years of war in Iraq.

The cabinet had three shelves. Two of the shelves already held a photo, both of them, coincidentally, of young women.

"I kept thinking about that shelf," Carroll said. "I didn't want to be that third shelf."

Post staffers had had the same thought. They removed the shelf and hid it the day after she was kidnapped.

One of Carroll's hardest days had been Wednesday, the day before her release, she said, when she broke down and cried hard, muffling the sound with her abaya in the room where she was being held. She prayed.

Coincidentally, her twin sister, Katie, appeared that same day on al-Arabiya television, saying it had been nearly two months since the last news or video of her sister. "I also hope that those with Jill have come to know her -- that they recognize what a wonderful person she is and realize that they can show the world that they are merciful to an innocent woman by returning her safely home to us," Katie Carroll said.

Hours later, Carroll's captors dropped her off in a Baghdad neighborhood, outside an office of the Iraqi Islamic Party. The politicians inside gave her juice, candy, water and tissues.

Composed, Carroll negotiated her way through the first of many politically laden conversations she would have Thursday, trying to stick to what she wanted and didn't want to say.

The party officials asked her to write out and sign a statement saying she had not been harmed in her brief time at their offices. They had her record a question-and-answer session on camera that they said was for their records. It showed up on television shortly afterward.

Party leader Tariq al-Hashimi presented her with an embossed Koran in a plush box. The Koran was for the true followers of Islam, Hashimi said, and he mentioned the Iraqi people. Accepting it, Carroll said her suffering was nothing compared with theirs.

'Good Day' In Iraq For Freed U.S. Journalist (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD — The quaking woman in the abaya had tears in her eyes and spoke English — the first sign to a startled receptionist that this visitor was different from the usual grieving widow or mother so common in this violent country.

When she finally managed to explain, in broken Arabic, that she was Jill Carroll, it was not sympathy but a rare outburst of joy she sparked.

The idealistic American freelance correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, kidnapped by gunmen nearly three months ago, had been released unharmed Thursday, a splash of good news during one of post-invasion Iraq's bleakest stretches.

"I was treated very well," said Carroll, 28, smiling and seemingly in good health and spirits, in an interview broadcast on the television channel of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's main Sunni Arab political organization.

"They never hit me," she said, wearing a gray and beige head scarf and a light blue gown. "They never even threatened to hit me. I'm just happy to be free and want to be with my family."

Carroll's abduction and her disturbing videotaped messages, released by her abductors to Arabic-language satellite channels, had been emblematic of Iraq's continuing lawlessness and violence.

Carroll was held for 82 days by the little-known kidnappers, who demanded that Iraqi and U.S. officials free all female prisoners as a precondition for her release. In the last footage of her, aired Feb. 9 on a Kuwaiti station, Carroll urged negotiators to quickly meet the kidnappers' demands. The Monitor said Carroll's family and the paper pursued half a dozen false leads during the ordeal.

Kidnappings, sometimes for ransom and other times as acts of political terrorism, have become a daily hazard in Iraq. Thousands of Iraqis and hundreds of foreign civilians have been seized, their bodies occasionally showing up in sewage ditches days later.

DOJ_NMG_0024447

The perpetrators are shadowy groups suspected of having ties to official security organs as well as the Sunni Arab-led insurgency. This month, Tom Fox, an American activist kidnapped in November, was found dead in Baghdad. His three British and Canadian colleagues who were also abducted were later rescued by British-led forces.

Carroll said she was treated well by her captors, who killed her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32, during the Jan. 7 abduction, which occurred as she left the office of a Sunni politician in Baghdad.

In the interview on the Iraqi Islamic Party's Baghdad TV channel, Carroll said she was given good food, kept in a room with a shower and was allowed to read a newspaper and watch television once, and did not know where in Iraq she was being held.

Her freedom came as a surprise, she said.

"They just came to me and said, 'We're going,' " she said on television. "They didn't tell me what was going on."

The kidnappers apparently drove Carroll to western Baghdad shortly after noon and dropped her off, pointing her to a branch office of the Iraqi Islamic Party in Amiriya, a volatile district known as a haven for insurgents.

They warned her not to talk with Americans or go to the Green Zone because it was infiltrated by insurgents, adding she might be killed if she cooperated with Americans, according to an account on the Monitor's website.

Wearing an all-covering traditional robe, Carroll walked up to the receptionist and handed over a note explaining who she was, party officials said.

Weeping and trembling, the Michigan native asked for help in broken Arabic.

"She looked to me as if she was happy but afraid at the same time," said one party official in Amiriya, who asked that his name not be published. "All that I understood from her was that she wanted to go to her family."

Party officials summoned a convoy of guards and armored vehicles to take her to the party's central Baghdad headquarters, where she calmed down, contacted her family and friends abroad and in Baghdad.

Carroll then took part in the Baghdad TV interview before she was handed over to U.S. forces.

Reporters for the Washington Post, for whom Carroll freelanced early in the war, showed up at the party office, where they wept and hugged. Carroll borrowed a cellphone from a Sunni politician, waking up her twin sister, Katie, her father and her mother, one after the other, the Post reported. "It's Jill," she said. "I'm fine, and I'm free."

According to the Post's account, Carroll received only sporadic news from the outside world during her captivity. She was shocked by the heavy news coverage of her kidnapping and the publicity surrounding her case, including the display of a poster of her from Rome's city hall.

She said she was surprised that Iraqi politicians elected to office three weeks before her capture had yet to form a government.

Carroll was told that the Baghdad TV interview she did was for internal party uses only and didn't know it would be broadcast, the Monitor reported. Iraqi Islamic Party officials could be seen handing gifts to a smiling Carroll in the television footage.

Mindful of her kidnappers' warnings, she agreed to go to the U.S.-protected Green Zone only after another Monitor reporter convinced her that it was the best option, the newspaper said.

She began to cry when the subject of her slain interpreter was raised, the Monitor said.

By Thursday evening, Carroll was inside the Green Zone, Baghdad's administrative headquarters, getting unspecified medical attention as she waited to leave the country.

"This is a good day," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who met with Carroll after her release, told reporters. "She is safe, she is free and she appears in good health and great spirits."

Carroll's abduction, by a group calling itself the Revenge Brigades, proved a lingering embarrassment for Sunni politicians negotiating with more powerful Shiite rivals for positions of power in the government talks.

In the U.S., family members and employers expressed relief at Carroll's release. Her father, Jim, told the Associated Press that he was "thrilled and relieved."

"Our hearts are full," said a statement by Carroll's family posted on the website of the Christian Science Monitor. "We are elated by Jill's safe release."

DOJ_NMG_0024448

Asked about the news while at a conference in Cancun, Mexico, President Bush told reporters, "I'm really grateful she was released and thank those who worked hard for her release, and we're glad she's alive."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed "delight" at the news.

"This is something that people across the world have worked for and prayed for," she said during a visit to Berlin.

Meanwhile, Iraq's violence, often overlaid with sectarian tensions between the country's majority Shiite Muslims and minority Sunni Arabs, continued.

At a media briefing Thursday, U.S. Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch told reporters that the average number of Iraqi casualties in the weeks since Feb. 11 had risen to 75 dead and wounded a day, higher than at any point over the last two years.

The military reported the death of a U.S. soldier in Fallouja of injuries sustained in combat Tuesday.

Several midmorning explosions rattled the capital. A car bomb targeting the convoy of a police commando leader with the Shiite-led Interior Ministry injured five of his guards. Another car bomb in front of a restaurant in northeastern Baghdad left one person dead and nine injured.

Roadside bombs targeting Iraqi police convoys and U.S. forces killed at least one and injured nine. In Baghdad's Shiite Sadr City neighborhood, gunmen kidnapped four police officers from their car.

At least half a dozen mortar rounds struck different parts of the city, killing at least three civilians and injuring six.

Gunmen assassinated a well-known soccer player as he practiced. Manar Mudhafar Abdul Jabbar was a member of the Zawra club, among Iraq's most famous teams.

Salam Jabar, a member of the Islamic Dawa Party of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, was assassinated in the Jamiya neighborhood in northern Baghdad.

Jabar was also a prominent businessman, and his killing may be linked to a series of attacks on Iraqi merchants and businesses.

Police said gunmen targeted at least three bakeries in troubled sections of Baghdad, killing at least five bakers and injuring at least three. Most of the victims were Shiites, police said.

Gunmen opened fire on a group of Iraqis lining up for their monthly food rations in Dora, injuring four civilians. The district of southern Baghdad is a target of frequent sectarian attacks.

Qais Abdul Kareem, a high-level Ministry of Industry official kidnapped Wednesday evening, was found dead in the middle-class Zayona district.

The body of Abdul Qader Hussein, a shopkeeper in the mixed Sunni-Shiite Sadiya neighborhood, was found with signs of torture.

The bodies of two unidentified men, both handcuffed and bearing signs of torture, were found in western Baghdad.

A roadside bomb in the city of Kirkuk, claimed by Iraq's Kurds, Arabs and Turkmen minority, killed one police officer and injured four.

Times staff writers John Johnson Jr. and Raheem Salman and special correspondent Asmaa Waguih contributed to this report.

Reporter Freed In Iraq, 3 Months After Abduction (NYT)

By Kirk Semple And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 30 — Jill Carroll, the American reporter kidnapped in Baghdad nearly three months ago, was freed Thursday, saying she had spent most of her time in a small room but had been well treated by her captors.

Ms. Carroll, 28, was dropped off in a Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad at midday and walked into the nearby offices of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni political group, dressed in a light-green head scarf and gray dress. From there, she was taken to the Green Zone, the heavily fortified area in central Baghdad, where the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, said she was in "good health and good spirits."

"I was treated very well; it's important people know that," Ms. Carroll said in an interview with an Iraqi, conducted in the Sunni party's offices and shown on television later in the day. "They never threatened me in any way."

"All I can say right now is I am very happy," said Ms. Carroll, who in an earlier video praised her captors and the insurgents fighting the Americans. "I am happy to be free and I want to be with my family."

Ms. Carroll, a freelance reporter, was kidnapped at gunpoint on Jan. 7 as she left the offices of a prominent Sunni politician. Her kidnappers had threatened to kill her. In videotapes released during her captivity, Ms. Carroll wept and pleaded for her freedom. In the interview shown Thursday, she said she was never told why she was being held. The kidnappers shot to death Ms. Carroll's Iraqi interpreter as the abduction unfolded. "They didn't tell me what was going on," she said.

The shadowy and little-known group that released Ms. Carroll said it had freed her because the American government had agreed to some of its conditions. The group, called the Revenge Brigade, had demanded that the United States release all Iraqi women from its prisons. In late January, the American command announced that it had freed five Iraqi female detainees, but said that the release had nothing to do with the kidnappers' demands.

In a news conference here, Mr. Khalilzad said no American officials in Iraq "entered into any arrangements with anyone" to secure Ms. Carroll's release. Four other Iraqi women were still being held in American detention centers, American officials said. Editors at The Christian Science Monitor, the newspaper that was employing Ms. Carroll at the time of her abduction, also said they had conducted no negotiations with her kidnappers.

Ms. Carroll, who grew up in Michigan and graduated from the University of Massachusetts, was part of a small corps of intrepid young freelance reporters in Baghdad. She had learned more Arabic than many and had cultivated a keen interest in Iraqi society.

In a videotape posted Thursday on the Internet, made before her release, Ms. Carroll denounced the American presence in Iraq and praised the insurgents fighting here. In the video, Ms. Carroll smiled, laughed once and gestured in a seemingly relaxed manner, saying she felt guilty about being released while so many Iraqis were still suffering.

Ms. Carroll, apparently knowing she would be released, denounced what she described as the "lies" told by the American government and predicted that the insurgents would defeat the Americans in Iraq. "I feel guilty. I also feel that it just shows that the mujahedeen are good people fighting an honorable fight, a good fight. While the Americans are here, the occupying forces, you know, treating the people in a very, very bad way. So I can't be happy totally for my freedom because there are people still suffering in prisons, in very difficult situations."

Ms. Carroll was seated in front of a white background, where she answered questions put to her in accented English by a man standing offscreen. The video was distributed by SITE, a Washington, D.C.-based group that tracks jihadist Web sites.

These kind words for her captors were a sharp contrast to her demeanor on the videotapes made shortly after her kidnapping, in which she appeared distraught, weeping and terrified. Ms. Carroll's seeming sympathy for her captors suggested either that she was pretending in hopes of gaining her release or that, after suffering weeks of extreme duress, she had fallen under the sway of her kidnappers.

The light-green head scarf that Ms. Carroll was wearing at the time of her release, and the head scarf she wore in most of the videos shown during her captivity, is the typical dress for Iraqi women. Ms. Carroll was wearing one at the time of her abduction, in large part to conceal her identity as an American reporter on Baghdad's chaotic streets.

Dr. Alan Manevitz, a psychiatrist and trauma expert at New York Presbyterian Hospital, said it would not be surprising if she suffered from a degree of Stockholm syndrome, a condition in which hostages become sympathetic to their captors. The name comes from a bank robbery in Sweden in 1973 in which hostages were held in a vault for six days.

"It's a form of brainwashing in a deprived state where victims emotionally bond with the captors in order to survive," Dr. Manevitz said. He stressed that he did not know Ms. Carroll and could speak about the syndrome only in general terms. "People can feel helpless and hopeless, and any small act of kindness — not killing her, giving her food, letting her have a shower — can lead to bonding with the captor." The captor, he said, becomes both tormentor and savior.

Ms. Carroll's whereabouts had been unknown since her abduction, carried out by armed men who cut off her car down the street from the offices of Adnan Dulaimi, the Sunni politician. Ms. Carroll, an accomplished swimmer, broke free of her kidnappers and was chased down the street, according to witnesses. Her interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32, was shot dead as he tried to make a call on his cellphone, while her driver managed to run away.

Dozens of people are kidnapped on Baghdad's streets every day — most of them for ransom — and they are often sold while in captivity from one group to another. Though she made no mention of being traded from one group to another, it was unclear on Thursday whether Ms. Carroll had been released by the same men who had captured her. The motives of the group were unknown as well; some officials speculated that the kidnappers had originally grabbed Ms. Carroll in the hope of securing a ransom and began to demand the release of the Iraqi women after it seemed less probable to them that they would get money.

In the weeks after her kidnapping, Ms. Carroll's captors released three videotapes, which showed her in increasing distress. The kidnappers' deadline passed, and there was no further word of her. On Feb. 28, Iraq's interior minister told ABC News that Ms. Carroll was still alive, that he knew who had kidnapped her and that he believed she would be released soon.

In the United States, Ms. Carroll's family reacted joyously to word of her release, as did the editors of The Christian Science Monitor. "My cousin, Mary Beth Carroll — Jill's mother — and all of our family are delighted, thrilled and ecstatic that Jill has been released," Peter Alonzi said in a statement he read outside her home in Evanston, Ill. "My wish is that this joyous occasion will offer hope to all the mothers of Iraq whose children have been kidnapped. May they all be returned safely and swiftly to their mothers' arms.' "

Tariq al-Hashemi, the general secretary of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said at a news conference that Ms. Carroll walked into the office and handed officials a paper written in Arabic asking that the party help her.

Alaa Makki, another leader in the party, said Ms. Carroll seemed wary about talking about her captors.

"We asked her, 'Why did you come to the I.I.P.? Why did you choose the I.I.P.?' " he recalled. "She said, 'I really don't know.' "

He went on: "She said, 'I promised the kidnappers not to speak.' She was a little bit frightened. She was very careful. She didn't give much information."

In the interview shown on television on Thursday, Ms. Carroll said she had been almost entirely cut off from the outside world. She did not know where she had been held, and said her room had a window but that it was obscured. She was well fed and was permitted to take showers and go to the bathroom whenever she wanted. She was able to watch television and see a newspaper only once.

"I didn't really know what was going on in the outside world," she said.

Her release, she said, was as mysterious as her capture. "I don't know what happened," she said. "They just came to me and said, 'O.K., we're letting you go now.' "

Ms. Carroll is the only American woman to have been kidnapped in Iraq and, according to her family, was motivated by a desire to publicize the hardships facing the Iraqi people. Her story of pluck and empathy seemed to capture the public's imagination.

In addition, her plight struck close to home for many of the journalists here in Baghdad who covered it and for whom kidnapping has become one of the foremost threats.

Ms. Carroll traveled to the Middle East in 2002 with a dream of covering a war. In the American Journalism Review last year, she wrote that she moved to Jordan six months before the start of the war "to learn as much about the region as possible before the fighting began." She worked for a newspaper in Amman and took Arabic lessons.

Once in Baghdad, she began working for a number of publications, including The Christian Science Monitor. As conditions worsened for American and other Western reporters working in Iraq — and major news organizations began investing heavily in armed guards and armored cars — Ms. Carroll continued mostly on a shoestring budget. At the time of her kidnapping, she was traveling in an ordinary car, unprotected by guards.

By the time of her abduction, Ms. Carroll was a well-known face at the Hamra Hotel, the home of many Western reporters. She had grown close to Marla Ruzicka, an American aid worker, and when Ms. Ruzicka was killed in a suicide bombing in 2005, Ms. Carroll organized a memorial service for her at the Hamra.

In lighter moments, Ms. Carroll often got water polo matches going in the hotel's pool, where she usually emerged as the fiercest competitor.

Journalist Jill Carroll Freed By Her Captors In Baghdad (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

DOJ_NMG_0024451

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 30 -- American journalist Jill Carroll, abducted at gunpoint in January, was released Thursday after nearly three months of intensive efforts to free her and public pleas on her behalf from a worldwide chorus of relatives, politicians and religious leaders.

"I was treated very well. That's important people know that," Carroll said in an interview broadcast on the TV station run by the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab organization. "They never said they would hit me, never threatened me in any way. I was just happy to be free, and I want be with my family."

Carroll, 28, a freelance writer who had been working for the Christian Science Monitor, was delivered Thursday morning to a party office in the west Baghdad neighborhood of Amiriyah. She had been kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 when gunmen ambushed her car, killing her Iraqi interpreter, Allan Enwiyah, 32. Her driver escaped unharmed.

A statement from Carroll's family, posted on the Monitor's Web site Thursday, said: "Our hearts are full. We are elated by Jill's safe release." It also offered prayers for those still held hostage in Iraq.

President Bush, whose spokesman had called Carroll's safe return an administration priority, said in Cancun, Mexico, "I'm really grateful she was released and thank those who worked hard for her release, and we're glad she's alive."

Carroll's release came one week after three members of the Chicago-based advocacy group Christian Peacemaker Teams, taken hostage in November, were rescued by American and British soldiers. Another group member who had been abducted with them, Tom Fox of Clear Brook, Va., was found shot to death March 9.

More than 425 foreigners, and several times that many Iraqis, have been taken hostage since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to U.S. officials who track abductions. The number of Western journalists, contractors and aid workers kidnapped in Iraq has surged since late last year after a lull of several months.

Throughout Carroll's 82-day ordeal, her parents and twin sister, Katie, and supporters throughout the United States, Europe and the Middle East campaigned for her release by appearing on English- and Arabic-language television networks and placing advertisements in Iraqi and regional media.

The blitz, which included a large rally in the streets of Paris and a giant photo of her face hung on City Hall in Rome, stressed that Carroll, an Arabic speaker who had lived in the Middle East for more than three years, appreciated and admired Iraqi culture and had traveled to the war-torn country to report on the plight of its people.

In an article she wrote last year for the American Journalism Review, Carroll said she had moved to Jordan months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq "to learn as much about the region as possible before the fighting began."

In a late-morning interview with reporters in his yard in Chapel Hill, N.C., broadcast by CNN, Jim Carroll said he had spoken with his daughter at 6 a.m. and learned that she was in "good health" and "mentally strong."

"It was a fantastic conversation," he said. "It's been a long haul."

Just after noon Thursday, Tariq al-Hashimi, secretary general of the Iraqi Islamic Party, called The Washington Post's Baghdad bureau to say that Carroll had been released by "unknown people."

"I have sent armored cars to bring her to the [party] headquarters," he said. "She requested me to talk to you and inform you directly and will be here within half an hour. Will you come here? She is okay. She is safe. She is more or less scared. I told her to calm down and we would take care of her."

Upon her arrival at party headquarters about 1 p.m., party officials asked Carroll, clad in a gray-and-blue scarf and traditional robe, to sit for an interview that they said would be solely for their records.

The interview was broadcast about two hours later on Baghdad TV, the party's satellite station. Carroll said she did not know where she had been held captive nor why her kidnappers decided to release her.

"I don't know what happened," she said in the interview, which was rebroadcast around the world. "They just came to me and said, 'Okay, we're letting you go now.' "

She declined to describe her captivity in detail but said she had been fed well and had access to showers. She said that she rarely received news from the outside world and that the lack of freedom and the uncertainty were hard to bear.

"It was difficult, because I didn't -- I didn't know what would happen to me," she said.

After leaving the party office, Carroll met with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who in a news conference Thursday afternoon thanked the Iraqi Islamic Party and all Iraqi politicians who had lobbied for her release. The United States did not make any agreement with Carroll's captors or pay any ransom, he said.

In a statement on its Web site, the Monitor said neither the paper nor Carroll's family had negotiated her release or paid a ransom.

"Furthermore, we have no information that would lead us to believe that any other party negotiated Jill's release or paid a ransom," the statement said.

David Cook, the Washington bureau chief for the Monitor, said he learned of Carroll's release when Jim Carroll called his cellphone at 6:10 a.m.

"Frankly, when I saw it, I thought, 'Oh, some reporter must be bothering Jim.' Because I'm the one who's supposed to chase the reporters away," Cook said later. "And then he told me what was happening, and it was wonderful. It was just stunning."

The identity of Carroll's captors was never fully clear. She appeared in three videos delivered to satellite television networks in the region. In one that aired in January, a little-known group calling itself the Vengeance Brigades threatened to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all female prisoners held by U.S. forces in Iraq were released. Later that month, five female detainees were freed, a move U.S. military officials said was the result of a standard review of their cases.

Carroll was last seen Feb. 9, telling supporters in footage first broadcast on a Kuwaiti television station that time to win her release was running out. Her captors imposed a Feb. 26 deadline for their demands to be met.

In a final video released Thursday, Carroll was shown speaking positively about her captivity and the mujaheddin, Arabic for holy warriors, who she said were holding her.

From Iraq, A Happy Ending (USAT)

USA Today, March 31, 2006

Jill Carroll, an American reporter snatched in a bloody kidnapping on a Baghdad street and held hostage for three months, was released unharmed Thursday — a rare bit of good news from Iraq.

At a time when Bush administration officials are blaming the news media for the erosion of public support for U.S. involvement in Iraq, Carroll's story is a reminder of the extraordinary dangers facing reporters trying to get the story there.

Carroll, 28, is a freelance journalist on assignment for The Christian Science Monitor magazine and who also wrote for other news outlets, including USA TODAY. She was on her way to an appointment with an important Iraqi political figure Jan. 7 when her car was ambushed, her driver attacked and her translator killed.

Carroll didn't parachute unprepared into this complex and troubling story. To better relate to Iraqis, she learned Arabic and in public wore the traditional veiled dress favored by Iraqi women. She is known to colleagues and friends for her sympathy for the Iraqi people and determination to present a balanced picture of life in that troubled land.

But Iraq has become a killing field for journalists. At least 86 journalists and support staff, many of them Iraqis, have been killed there in the past three years; 69 journalists died in all of World War II. ABC News anchor Bob Woodruff is still recovering from serious injuries in a bomb blast while he was reporting there in January.

The deadly threats include kidnapping, a thriving industry in the chaos of the post-Saddam era. Hundreds of foreigners have been taken hostage and at least 55 executed by their captors since 2003.

The targets include not only journalists but also peace advocates, relief workers and others trying to help rebuild Iraq — all victims of the country's irrational killers. Carroll's ordeal is a measure of the cost of such commitment.

“All I ever wanted to be was a foreign correspondent,” Jill Carroll wrote from Baghdad last year in a magazine article that described the risks of working there. Readers of this and other publications have been served well by her courage.

U.S. Reporter Carroll Set Free In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Mariam Fam, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Wearing a green Islamic head scarf, American reporter Jill Carroll walked into an Iraqi political party office yesterday, set free nearly three months after being kidnapped in a bloody ambush that killed her translator.

"I was treated well, but I don't know why I was kidnapped," Miss Carroll said on Baghdad television only weeks after she appeared weeping in a video put out by kidnappers who had threatened to kill her.

Her family thanked "the generous people around the world who worked officially or unofficially" to gain her freedom. Her father, Jim, said he was asleep in his North Carolina home when the phone rang about 6 a.m.

"Hi, Dad. This is Jill. I'm released," the voice on the other end said, he told CNN.

No details were given about the circumstances surrounding her release. The U.S. ambassador said there was no ransom paid by the American Embassy, but his remarks left open the question of whether "arrangements" were made by others.

In Washington, a Pentagon spokesman said the U.S. military was not involved in Miss Carroll's release.

President Bush said, "I'm just really grateful she's released, and I want to thank those who worked hard to release her and we're glad she's alive."

Miss Carroll, 28, was kidnapped Jan. 7 in Baghdad's western Adil neighborhood while going to interview Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi for the Christian Science Monitor. Her translator was killed in the attack about 300 yards from Mr. al-Dulaimi's office.

The previously unknown Revenge Brigades took responsibility. The group threatened twice in videotapes to kill Miss Carroll.

"They never hit me. They never even threatened to hit me," she said yesterday, wearing a gray Arabic robe.

"I'm just happy to be free. I want to be with my family."

Miss Carroll said she was kept in a furnished room with a window and a shower, but she did not know where she was.

"I felt I was not free. It was difficult because I didn't know what would happen to me," she said.

She said she was allowed to watch TV once and read a newspaper once.

Asked about the circumstances of her release, she said, "I don't know what happened. They just came to me early this morning and said, 'OK, we are letting you go now.' "

Police Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said Miss Carroll was released near an office of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the main Sunni political organization, in western Baghdad. The party released a statement that Miss Carroll walked in at 12:15 p.m. carrying a letter written in Arabic asking the party to help her.

Miss Carroll then was transferred to party headquarters, given gifts that included a Koran and was met by fellow journalists and American officials before leaving about 2:30 p.m., according to the statement.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad met with Miss Carroll and said she was in good spirits and anxious to go home. The Italian news agency ANSA said Miss Carroll underwent a medical checkup at the American hospital in the Green Zone.

Mr. Khalilzad also said no kidnappers were "yet" in custody, and no one in the U.S. mission was involved in paying a ransom.

However, German authorities have arrested a man, the FBI said yesterday, who is accused of trying to extort $2 million from the Monitor newspaper by promising to win Miss Carroll's release.

"No U.S. person entered into any arrangements with anyone. By 'U.S. person' I mean the United States mission," Mr. Khalilzad said.

The Christian Science Monitor said it was not aware of any negotiations involving money for Miss Carroll's release.

"We're not shading. We're not hiding. We're just saying what we know. And to our knowledge, no one was paid by anyone," said David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief.

Miss Carroll's family said it would focus on helping her recover. Jim Carroll told the AP at his house in Chapel Hill, N.C., he was waiting to learn more about his daughter's plans before making travel arrangements.

In a statement issued by the Monitor, the family said, "Our hearts are full. ... We would like to thank all of the generous people around the world who worked officially or unofficially -- especially those who took personal risk -- to gain Jill's release."

During Miss Carroll's months in captivity, she had appeared in three videos broadcast on Arab television, pleading for her life.

Her captors had demanded the release of all female detainees in Iraq by Feb. 26 and said Miss Carroll would be killed if that did not happen. The date came and went with no word about her fate.

American Journalist Jill Carroll Freed After Nearly 3 Months (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef And Shatha Al Awsy

Knight Ridder, March 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Jill Carroll's nearly three months of captivity ended around 12:20 p.m. Thursday when she walked into an Iraqi Islamic Party office in western Baghdad and handed the front-desk clerk a note asking for help.

The kidnapped American journalist, a freelancer for the Christian Science Monitor, had been snatched just a few miles away on Jan. 7 while leaving a Sunni politician's office. Her whereabouts had been unknown until a car dropped her off in front of the party's office, guards at the building said. She appeared healthy.

In an interview broadcast on Baghdad television, Carroll said she was treated well during her 82 days of captivity. Still wearing a hijab, which covered her hair, Carroll said she was fed well and allowed to go to the bathroom by herself. She emphasized that she was never threatened. She said she occasionally heard news, but she didn't know what led to her release, including whether a ransom had been paid.

"You would have to ask the mujahadeen (religious fighters) that," she said. "They came to me and said, `OK, we are letting you go now.'"

On the Christian Science Monitor Web site, Editor Richard Bergenheim said no ransom had been paid. In three tapes released to Iraqi media during her captivity, a group called the Vengeance Brigade said it was holding Carroll.

In the last tape, the kidnappers threatened to kill Carroll unless all female prisoners in Iraq were released by Feb. 26. U.S. officials freed five of the nine prisoners around that time, but they said that their release was unrelated to the demand. The deadline passed with no word of Carroll, but Minister of Interior Bayan Jabr said two days later that he believed she was alive.

Officials at the Ministry of Justice said five female detainees remain in Iraq.

Carroll's arrival at the Iraqi Islamic Party on Thursday initially caused confusion. The note, written in Arabic, said that she was a hostage and asked officials there to deliver her to her country, said employees at the Iraqi Islamic Party office.

However, the employees said Carroll looked like an Iraqi, perhaps an employee of the party's women's section. She was wearing an Islamic gown, and her hair was veiled. She also wore a khamar, a piece of cloth that covered most of her face. Only her red spectacles were visible.

The front-desk clerk went to the office manager and said a woman wanted to talk to him. "I'm too busy," the office manager, who wanted to be referred to only by the nickname Abu Hassan, replied. He got up only at the clerk's insistence.

After he read the note, Abu Hassan said, Carroll took off the khamar, revealing her face.

Workers at the office said they didn't know what to do next. No one spoke English, so Carroll tried to communicate in broken Arabic, telling the staff that she was a hostage. But Hassan said he was nervous, given the security situation, and feared that she could be untrustworthy. He called the party's general secretary, Tariq al-Hashimi, who spoke English, and asked him to talk to Carroll. Hashimi said he assured Carroll that she was safe and sent a convoy of cars and guards to pick her up and take her to party headquarters.

"She was very nervous. And she was very scared of everybody around her. She just wanted to go home," Hassan said.

On average, about 35 Iraqis are kidnapped every day. More than 400 foreigners have been snatched since April 2003. Carroll's kidnapping captured international attention as her newspaper colleagues, friends and family frequently appealed to her captors, telling them about her reverence for Iraqis and her commitment to telling their stories.

While at Hashimi's office, Carroll called her father. Jim Carroll, in an interview outside his North Carolina home, said he received the call around 6 a.m. (or 2 p.m. Baghdad time).

She said: "Hi, Dad. This is Jill. I'm released."

Courage In Coverage (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024455

Yesterday's release of American journalist Jill Carroll makes this a good moment to celebrate the work that reporters are doing every day in Iraq. They are taking huge personal risks to bring back the news -- not "good news," as some supporters of the administration often seem to want, but the news.

Anyone taking potshots at the "mainstream media" should read the description of what it's like to cover Baghdad that appears in the April/May issue of the American Journalism Review. The story opens with a description of NPR's Deborah Amos, dressed in Arab clothes, anxiously scanning the street for bombers and kidnappers as she heads for an interview in the protected Green Zone. And that's an easy assignment.

Like most resident correspondents, National Public Radio reporters such as Amos live and work in the "Red Zone" -- meaning the real Iraq. These reporters are in daily contact, through their Iraqi staffs, with the nightmare the Iraqi people are experiencing. When their reporting contrasts with the more upbeat accounts coming out of the Green Zone, the reporters in the Red Zone generally have been right, for a simple reason: They are closer to the story.

Jeffrey Gettleman of the New York Times showed what you learn out in the Red Zone in stories Sunday about the spread of gruesome revenge killings: "By conservative counts, nearly 200 civilian men have been executed in the past two weeks and dumped on Baghdad's streets. Many have been hogtied. Some have had acid splashed on their faces. Others have been found without toes, fingers, eyes." Gettleman, who had been away from Iraq for more than a year, wrote that something fundamental had changed: The violence had "turned inward" into sectarian warfare.

A strong warning about the rise in sectarian violence came from my Post colleague Ellen Knickmeyer. She reported in February, after a revered Shiite mosque in Samarra was destroyed, that Shiite militiamen were brutally killing Sunnis. Her sources said Iraqi and international officials tallied more than a thousand bodies. Her reports were criticized by U.S. officials in the Green Zone, who said the number was far smaller. The dispute obscured the deeper truth that Knickmeyer was reporting: the sharp increase in brutal killings by Shiite death squads. Fortunately that point wasn't lost on U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who has warned in recent days that America will not support an Iraqi government that doesn't crack down on the Shiite militias.

Western journalists in Baghdad depend increasingly on our Iraqi colleagues, who are some of the bravest reporters in the world. Several of the best Iraqi journalists have created their own blogs. In one, 24 Steps to Liberty, an Iraqi reporter described the living hell of Baghdad's al-Rabie Street on Sunday: "Driving in this street after six p.m. makes every thought of killing, kidnapping, insurgents, and everything bad . . . become present in your mind. That is what the Iraqis see every night."

Another brave Iraqi reporter, whose blog is Treasure of Baghdad, recounted this week a terrifying experience at his home when people opened fire nearby. "I first thought these were the 'men in black' breaking into the houses of my Sunni neighbors trying to kill them, then I thought these might be Sunni insurgent[s] trying to break into the houses of the few Shiite families that live in the same street." His father cocked his rifle to defend the family, but the gunmen went away.

American journalists report the successes of U.S. policy, and there have been some lately, at a level above the mean streets of Baghdad. Iraqi political leaders have been meeting to try to form a national unity government, and the Iraqi army is showing signs of becoming a better fighting force. But there are also some horrific stories: Time magazine published a disturbing account in its March 27 issue about how U.S. Marines are believed to have killed 15 Iraqi civilians in their homes in Haditha last November after a roadside bomb attack. This may prove a shocking tale when more details emerge about what happened, but it's a story that journalists must report.

Supporters of the Bush administration sometimes argue that journalists should report more good news. Certainly we need to tell the stories of the thousands of brave and decent Americans and Iraqis who are trying every day to make the country better. And if an Iraqi unity government can take hold and restore stability, there will be a stampede of reporters to cover this success. But a reporter's job is to tell the truth, even when it hurts. Americans should be grateful that reporters such as Jill Carroll are risking their lives to chronicle this agonizing story -- and tell Americans not what they want to hear, but what they need to know.

Parents Maintain Vigil For Lone Soldier Missing In Iraq (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, March 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0024456

BATAVIA, Ohio — Carolyn Maupin speaks to her son only in her prayers. She implores him to stay strong. She begs him to keep faith.

And four times during the past two years, she says, she has heard him answer.

"He'll say, 'I'm OK, Mom. I'm OK,' " Maupin says of her son, Sgt. Keith "Matt" Maupin, who disappeared almost two years ago when his convoy was attacked in Iraq. "One time he said, 'I'll be home, Mom. I'll be home.' "

Maupin, 22, holds a unique and tragic place in the war in Iraq. He is the only American soldier who remains missing since the war began three years ago.

On April 9, Carolyn Maupin and Keith Maupin, Matt's father, will mark the second anniversary of his disappearance.

On the day he vanished — April 9, 2004 — Maupin escorted a convoy of fuel trucks headed for Baghdad's airport. Along the way, insurgents attacked. They lobbed grenades at the trucks, some of which burst into flames. Mortar shells exploded nearby. And Maupin disappeared.

A week later, the news station Al-Jazeera broadcast a video showing Maupin, looking healthy but dazed, seated in front of masked gunmen. Then in June 2004, a dark and grainy video surfaced. It showed a blindfolded man being shot in the head. An off-camera voice identified the victim as Matt Maupin.

No body was recovered, however, and military officials who analyzed the video said they could not verify that the man who had seemingly been executed was Maupin.

"There was no conclusive evidence to show it was Matt," says Shari Lawrence of the U.S. Army Human Resources Command.

As a result, the search for Maupin continues. "We've been following up on any potential leads," says Paul Boyce, a U.S. Army spokesman.

Boyce says soldiers are on standing orders to look for Maupin as part of their regular duties. Neither the military nor Maupin's family know where he is or who took him. But the Maupins believe, without question, that their son is alive and waiting to be rescued.

With the release Thursday of journalist Jill Carroll, Carolyn Maupin hopes her son might follow soon. "It gives me more hope that Matt's out there," she says.

For two years, Carolyn and Keith Maupin have dedicated their lives to Matt. Their primary mission: to make sure their son comes home, no matter how long it takes.

"We will not let Matt be forgotten," Carolyn says after replacing the wilting yellow ribbons in her front yard with crisp new ones. "I don't want him left behind. I don't want him left there."

Maupin, a fitness fanatic who was studying nutritional science at a local college, joined the Army Reserve for the tuition aid, his mom says. She protested, telling him the family would manage. "He said, 'Mom, I want to do more than just manage,' " she recalls.

Shortly after Maupin disappeared, his parents founded the Yellow Ribbon Support Center. Keith Maupin says he even left his job to spend more time there.

The non-profit, which operates out of a strip mall, is a bustling hub of patriotism. In the past two years, the center has shipped more than 4,500 packages to troops in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In each box, next to the Girl Scout cookies, beef jerky and packets of microwave popcorn, volunteers include a packet of pictures of Maupin. A sticker on the back of each picture asks for prayers.

Every Friday, a Pentagon official calls with an update. Though the calls buoy the Maupins, who are divorced, the mystery haunts them.

"I wonder if he hears the bombs of the soldiers and their rifles," says Carolyn Maupin, 58. She envisions her son in a room somewhere, his captors milling around him.

Keith Maupin's vision is similar. He sees his son in a shed with a cot.

For Keith, 55, falling asleep is sometimes difficult. He fondly recalls his bass fishing excursions with Matt. "He's my hero," he says of his son.

DOJ_NMG_0024457

Carolyn is prone to worry, and her eyes betray fatigue. She misses the silly moments she shared with her son, like laughing uproariously during reruns of The Golden Girls.

She carries his letters from Iraq in her purse. They are curling at the edges and flimsy from her touch.

"I wouldn't come here on a bet. This place sucks," he wrote in an e-mail from Kuwait on March 3, 2004, about a month before he disappeared. He inquired about his nephew, the dog and the cat, and asked his mom if she had washed his fire-engine red 1998 Mustang.

"I just wrote to let you know I'm still alive and that I can't wait to come back to America," the e-mail reads.

Carolyn and Keith Maupin can't wait for him to come back, either.

Carolyn's small ranch house is full of altars to her son, reminders of his service to the country and his disappearance. Plastic storage totes contain more than 10,000 letters from well-wishers.

Inside Matt's room, his Christmas presents from 2004 remain wrapped and waiting. At the foot of his bed sits a cardboard box his mother can't bring herself to open.

The Army sent the box after his disappearance. Carolyn knows it contains his glasses and other items that search dogs sniffed out in the days after the attack.

"It's too personal right now," she says. "I'll just save this for Matt when he gets home."

Carolyn has thought about going to Iraq and searching for her son herself. She says she may consider it more seriously if he remains missing when the rest of the troops come home.

If she goes, she says, she plans to climb to the top of the highest hill and scold her son in her strictest, most maternal tone.

"I want to yell 'Matthew Maupin, get yourself up here right now!' " she says with a smile. "He'll know my voice."

A Mix Of Motives In Kidnappings (USAT)

By Mark Memmott And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 31, 2006

In Iraq, kidnapping can be a powerful propaganda tool or a way to make money.

Sometimes, it's both.

"The great majority are commercial transactions," says Neil Livingstone, CEO of security consulting firm GlobalOptions and author of nine books on terrorism. That's the case in Iraq, he says, where most kidnappings are "Iraqi on Iraqi — some of them sectarian, some of them personal score-settling, most of them monetary."

In recent years, Livingstone notes, "we've seen the rise of Islamic zealots in the current Middle East conflict who kill to show their power and to intimidate."

They hope, Livingstone says, to say, "You're vulnerable, and you can't stop us." He cites as an example the al-Qaeda operatives who kidnapped and killed Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl in Pakistan in 2002.

Videos of hostages are powerful tools used to spread the kidnappers' messages and instill fear. They get replayed on news networks in both the Middle East and the West. They're among the reasons Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and others in the Bush administration say the United States is at risk of losing the "propaganda war."

Jill Carroll, the American freelance journalist released Thursday, was shown in three videos made by her captors.

"(Osama) bin Laden and (his al-Qaeda aides) have media committees, and they sit down and they plan how they're going to manipulate the press," Rumsfeld said this week in a radio interview.

The Times of London last week called kidnapping "today's weapon of war" and urged the news media to report on kidnappings with more restraint.

Increasingly in Iraq, the two motives — kidnappings for profit and kidnappings for propaganda — are merging.

In Baghdad, four or five organized criminal gangs control the streets, prowling for anybody who looks non-Iraqi, says Steven Casteel, a senior vice president at the security firm Vance International. Kidnappers want somebody who works for a company or government willing to pay for his or her release, he says.

U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Elizabeth Colton told the Associated Press in Baghdad on Thursday that 10 to 20 Iraqis are taken hostage every day. Ransoms average $20,000 to $30,000, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0024458

But if gangs can't get a ransom quickly, they sometimes “sell” foreign hostages to terrorist groups. About 430 foreigners have been kidnapped in Iraq since April 2003, Colton said.

Carroll was held by a group that, in the videos, called itself the Revenge Brigades and made political demands. Even so, it's unclear whether she was released by the same group that abducted her — or was passed from one group to another for profit.

In its story today, The Christian Science Monitor says there were at least “a dozen false leads in the effort to free” Carroll, mainly efforts by scam artists who claimed to be holding her and demanded money for her release. One, the Monitor reports, “turned out to be a young Nigerian (who) was arrested in Germany.”

In Iraq, the biggest problem in negotiating a hostage release, Livingstone says, is “the charlatans.”

He says he grew hopeful about Carroll after a deadline set by her captors passed without her body being found. “That telegraphed they were not serious about wanting to kill her,” he says.

Shiite Ayatollah Ignores Letter From Bush (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, March 30, 2006

A letter from President Bush to Iraq's supreme Shiite spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, was hand-delivered earlier this week but sits unread and untranslated in the top religious figure's office, a key al-Sistani aide told The Associated Press on Thursday.

The aide — who has never allowed use of his name in news reports, citing al-Sistani's refusal to make any public statements himself — said the ayatollah had laid the letter aside and did not ask for a translation because of increasing "unhappiness" over what senior Shiite leaders see as American meddling in Iraqi attempts to form their first, permanent post-invasion government.

The aide said the person who delivered the Bush letter — he would not identify the messenger by name or nationality — said it carried Bush's thanks to al-Sistani for calling for calm among his followers in preventing the outbreak of civil war after a Shiite shrine was bombed late last month.

The messenger also was said to have explained that the letter reinforced the American position that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari should not be given a second term. Al-Sistani has not publicly taken sides in the dispute, but rather has called for Shiite unity.

The United States was known to object to al-Jaafari's second term but has never said so outright and in public.

But on Saturday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad carried a similar letter from Bush to a meeting with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the largest Shiite political organization, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

The al-Sistani aide said Shiite displeasure with U.S. involvement was so deep that dignitaries in the holy city of Najaf refused to meet Khalilzad on Wednesday during ceremonies commemorating the death of the Prophet Muhammad. The Afghan-born Khalilzad is a Sunni Muslim.

Elizabeth Colton, the U.S. Embassy spokeswoman, said Khalilzad had not sought any meetings and simply flew over Najaf and the nearby holy city of Karbala to witness the big processions of Shiite faithful marking the day.

"The ambassador did a fly over to see people on the streets of Karabala and Najaf. The ambassador did not ask to see anyone and did not go into either city," Colton told AP.

The United States is believed to oppose al-Jaafari because of his close ties and strong backing from radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who has a thousands-strong heavily armed militia that was responsible for much of the violence that hit the country after the Feb. 22 bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad.

At a news conference Thursday, al-Jaafari said he had met with Khalilzad a day earlier and that the U.S. ambassador denied remarks attributed to him about the prime minister's candidacy for a new term.

"I don't care much about these matters. I look at the Iraqi people and the democratic mechanisms," al-Jaafari said.

Al-Sadr, who is staunchly anti-American, met with al-Sistani in Najaf on Thursday but emerged without making a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0024459

The stalemate over forming a new government for Iraq, in its sixth week after the certification of the vote in parliamentary elections Dec. 15, is focused on al-Jaafari's candidacy, opposed by minority Sunni and Kurdish politicians as well as many moderate Shiites.

He was nominated for a second and permanent four-year term by one vote and with al-Sadr's backing. The Iraqi constitution dictates that the largest parliamentary bloc is entitled to select the prime minister. The Shiite United Iraqi Alliance holds 135 seats in the 275-member legislature.

At least 27 more people died in violence, meanwhile, including a 4-year-old girl who was killed when a car bomb exploded near the Shiite Ali Basha mosque in Baghdad's eastern Kryaat neighborhood. Police Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said at least 10 other bystanders were injured.

In Beiji, 155 miles north of Baghdad, gunmen killed eight workers from the city power plant as they left work, police Lt. Mahanad Khalid said.

Gunmen in two cars arrived at the al-Amin bakery in Baghdad's dangerous southern neighborhood of Dora and killed three workers, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq said.

The U.S. military reported two deaths. A soldier assigned to the 9th Naval Construction Regiment died Tuesday from wounds sustained in fighting in Anbar province. An airman assigned to the 447th Air Expeditionary Group was killed Thursday near Baghdad. A fellow airman was injured when a roadside bomb exploded as they worked to disarm it, the Central Command reported.

Iraq At The 11th Hour (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, March 31, 2006

The fate of the entire U.S. enterprise in Iraq now hangs in the balance, as the war has entered a dangerous new phase. It is the phase of barbaric identity-card violence between Sunnis and Shiites. In the late 1970's, I covered a similar moment in Lebanon, and the one thing I learned was this: Once this kind of venom gets unleashed — with members of each community literally beheading each other on the basis of their religious identities — it poisons everything. You enter a realm that is beyond politics, a realm where fear and revenge dominate everyone's thinking — and that is where Iraq is heading.

Jeffrey Gettleman reported last Sunday in this paper about Mohannad al-Azawi, a quiet Sunni pet shop owner in Baghdad who was abducted from his store and found murdered the next morning. His skin was covered with purple welts, and his face and legs had drill holes in them. His brother Hassan, the story noted, "carries the autopsy photos with him, along with a pistol. 'I cannot live without vengeance,' he said."

Once embedded, this cycle of fear and revenge is almost impossible to break. People conclude that the only thing that can protect them is a militia from their own sect, not the police or the army. Then these militias, which come to life to protect the neighborhood, take on a life of their own. They develop protection rackets, feel the thrill of power and, as that happens, start to do all they can to prevent the government from restoring its authority. Finally, as the BBC noted in a recent report from Baghdad, some Iraqi politicians are now concluding that "they can gain more power and influence from building on sectarian loyalties than from appeals for national unity." When politicians decide they can get ahead by appealing more to fear than to hope, national reconciliation goes up in smoke.

A Baghdad blogger, the Mesopotamian, quoted by AndrewSullivan.com, gave a vivid description of his neighborhood: "The confusion and conflict between the Americans, the army and the Ministry of Interior is producing a situation where the citizens don't know anymore whether the security personnel in the street are friends, enemies, terrorists or simply criminals and thieves. Everybody is wearing the same uniforms. Whole sections of the city have virtually fallen to gangs and terrorists, and this is especially true for the 'Sunni'-dominated neighborhoods. People and businesses are being robbed and the employees kidnapped en masse in broad daylight and with complete ease as though security forces are nonexistent, although we see them everywhere.

"I don't know anymore what can be done to rescue the situation. At least, those who are supposed to be in positions of responsibility should stop lying and painting a false picture. ... I regret sounding so pessimistic, but the alarm must be sounded. ... What is happening is Baghdad is something really awful."

Donald Rumsfeld's criminally negligent decision not to deploy enough troops in Iraq to begin with created this security vacuum. But the insecurity was compounded by the unique enemy that emerged to take advantage of that vacuum — Sunni Islamo-nihilists. These are a disparate collection of groups with one common agenda: America and its Iraqi allies must fail; they must not be allowed to build Iraq into a Western-style, democratizing society. When you are up against an enemy whose only goal is that you must fail, and which does not care about how much death and destruction it inflicts on its own people, let alone on others, it is extremely difficult to establish order.

The Iraqi Shiite community showed remarkable restraint in the face of the murderous provocations by these Islamo-nihilist gangs during the past three years. But that restraint is over. It's now clear that some Shiite militias are ready to match the Sunni nihilists, killing for killing. So the slide into a medieval barbarism has begun.

Do not believe any of the Bush team's happy talk. It doesn't matter if Iraq is quiet in the south and quiet in the north. If Baghdad, the heart of the country, is being ripped apart, then there is no Iraq — because there is no center.

There is only one hope for halting this slide and that is the formation — immediately — of a national unity government in Iraq, with Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds sharing power, and the deployment on the streets — immediately — of massive numbers of troops and police, both Iraqi and American, to prevent more of these tribal killings. If a national unity government is not formed soon, and if these identity-card murderers gain more momentum, any hope for building a decent Iraq will vanish.

It is five minutes to midnight.

Republicans Eye Modest Tax-Cut Victory (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 31, 2006

REPUBLICANS GROW confident of salvaging modest tax-cut victory.

Though hitting initial April tax-day target is unlikely, strategists at the White House and on Capitol Hill predict passage of temporary extension of the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains. Shorter extension makes it possible to include alternative-minimum tax relief in five-year, $70 billion package.

Other tax proposals seek election-year political points. Senate leader Frist plans May vote on abolishing estate tax, though Republicans lack the 60 votes needed to defeat potential Democratic filibuster. Former Treasury Secretary O'Neill's remarks defending the tax strengthen Democratic argument.

Conservative activist Grover Norquist pushes repeal of 3% telephone excise tax, with floor vote "close to the election."

MCCAIN GAINS from improving odds for immigrant guest-worker program.

House Speaker Hastert's openness to guest-worker compromise enhances Arizona senator's reputation for driving Hill action. Championing White House priorities, on immigration as well as Iraq, fuels his hopes for wooing Bush loyalists.

Tough border-security talk by Frist, McCain's 2008 rival, could produce inroads among conservative Christians; by 64%-29%, evangelical Protestants call immigrants a burden rather than a benefit in new Pew Hispanic Center poll. But damage to party efforts to increase Hispanic support, warns former Rep. Vin Weber, could be "so great as to be fatal to any chance of a Republican majority."

DEMOCRATS HOPE adverse polls prompt more Republican retirements.

Republicans' 1994 landslide was fueled by 31 open seats that Democrats had held. So far, just 18 Republican-held seats have become open as summer candidate-filing deadlines approach.

Battleground-state polling by Zogby Interactive2 shows slight improvement in Democratic Senate prospects since January, with the share of undecided voters rising. A Republican campaign strategist notes that "We haven't fought back yet" with TV ads; House and Senate campaign committees tap Republican Chairman Mehlman for get-out-the-vote programs to emulate Bush's 2004 success in exurbs.

Cheney steps up fund-raising travels for candidates.

OOPS: The IRS faults its own incorrect statistics for a watchdog group's report that audits are performed on less than one-tenth of one percent of taxpayers earning at least $1-million. In fact, says the tax-collection agency, around 5% of those 225,000 taxpayers' returns were audited in 2005.

JUMP-START? Drug makers and employers, frustrated by attacks on private-sector health proposals, form a new advocacy group including former Bush health secretary Thompson. They hope Health Care America will offset liberal Families USA. Administration insiders say Bush's proposed expansion of health-savings accounts can still pass if attached to another popular measure.

WAR VETS ORGANIZE to back Bush on Iraq. VetsforFreedom.org3, a nonprofit group of recently returned soldiers, cites a "disconnect" between what soldiers and veterans think about the war and what's portrayed in the media. "We've got good men dying and the politicians are using it for political grandstanding," says Wade Zirkle, a co-founder who served two deployments to Iraq.

CAMPAIGN TIME: French immunologist Michel Kazatchkine launches bid to head the multibillion-dollar Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. The French government AIDS coordinator plans a lobbying effort to reassure Bush administration that he intends to work hand-in-hand with U.S. AIDS programs. "There's no room for competition," he says.

RUMORS SWIRL of changes at Treasury following Bolten's elevation.

"This administration has no economic spokesman," grouses a top Republican strategist, who notes that voters complain about the economy despite its 3.5% growth clip. Yet Republicans acknowledge that Secretary Snow has been loyally on-message and doubt a replacement would get policy clout.

Dubai ports controversy hurts Deputy Secretary Kimmitt's chance of moving up if Snow departs. To replace Bolten at budget office, current deputy Joel Kaplan is seen as more politically savvy but less connected than colleague Clay Johnson, Bush's one-time classmate.

Bush waited until after 2002 midterm election to sack Snow's predecessor, O'Neill.

MINOR MEMOS: After Democratic leader plays down Rep. McKinney's "unfortunate incident" with Capitol cop, Speaker Hastert's spokesman asks, "How many officers would have to be punched before it becomes a big deal?" ... Errant marksman Cheney ranks second, behind Michael Jackson, on New York publicist Jeff Barge's "Most Foolish American" survey.

Wis. Communities Will Vote On Whether To Get Out Of Iraq (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, March 31, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Wis. — Cheryl Hurst doesn't hesitate when asked whether U.S. troops should be withdrawn from Iraq. “Bring them home,” the 47-year-old restaurant manager says. “They've been there long enough.”

Matthew Persons, 30, is just as emphatic. “Leave them there until the job is done,” says the Air Force veteran, who works for an aviation company. “Pulling out won't solve anything and will let the terrorists know that what they do works.”

On Tuesday, they can express their disparate opinions in a voting booth. People in 32 communities across Wisconsin, including Evansville, will vote on referendums calling for the “orderly and rapid” withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. This town of 4,000 is the only place where residents also will vote on a separate referendum stating that U.S. forces should remain until “unquestioned victory is clearly won.”

The outcome won't carry any legal weight here or in Washington. But if all the anti-war measures pass, politicians might not be able to ignore the results, says Kenneth Mayer, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

“If enough people are willing to say ‘enough,' and elected officials start thinking they need to be responsive, it will embolden opponents of the war, and … the administration will have to take that into account,” he says.

Anti-war resolutions have been adopted by more than 50 local governments across the USA and at more than 40 town meetings in Vermont. Wisconsin's capital, Madison, is the largest city that will vote Tuesday on the measure. Milwaukee will vote on it in November.

Here in Evansville, the competing measures pit neighbors against each other and have stirred passionate debate. No one from here has died in Iraq, but many residents have relatives who served there.

The withdraw-now referendum originated with the state's Green Party and the Wisconsin Network for Peace and Justice. Fred Juergens, 67, a retired chemistry professor and chairman of the liberal group Citizens United of Union/Evansville, organized a drive to gather enough signatures to add it to local races on Tuesday's ballot.

"The people have to lead the leaders out of this war," says Juergens, a city alderman. "If we didn't think it would make a difference, we wouldn't bother doing it. We're not protesting just for the sake of whining."

When the City Council voted to put the anti-war referendum on the ballot, neighbors Tony Ryerson and Ron Gay wrote their own referendum saying troops should stay in Iraq and collected enough signatures to put it on the ballot, too. "We all complain a lot, but I thought it was about time I got involved," says Ryerson, 45, a public works employee.

Gay, 51, is pastor of Grace Independent Baptist Church and has served in the Marines. Some of his parishioners wish he would keep out of politics, he says, "but American citizenship is a responsibility, and sometimes you have to face burdens for the better good."

National polls show that many Americans have soured on the war. A March 10-12 USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll found that 54% say U.S. troops should be withdrawn now or within a year, and 60% say the war wasn't worth it.

In Evansville, which voted for Democrat John Kerry in the 2004 presidential election, some people say they're torn. Joanne Dean, 60, isn't happy about the war and says President Bush "doesn't listen to the people." But she adds, "I don't support another Vietnam walk-away" that would leave the Iraqi people fending for themselves.
